utmost colossal level, far more that it should've done it. Far more than it was even possible for a jaw to open itself at the level where it arched. Out of it spat the liquid with the sand, the teeth and everything it once had inside of it. And so, on its feet, it waned and wriggled and finally, it forced the knees and the feet back on. Therefore, it came up on itself and finally raised. 'We will not fail so easily either. To a small insect which crawls inside of us. We are bigger than your petty god inside a box.' The wretch spoke, with a long black tongue lashing out. Behind it laid a pair of small lashing nerves which started filling themselves with as much of the substance as they could in order to grow a bulk. It forced Argus to stand tall and look forth. That's why it took out its arms, it pulled and took all its nerves from them. He had failed to notice that all the arms, other than the two which now became more like ligaments, stapled by bones, holding the skull still. There was only enough that would hurt him if he stood too much on the ground, for too much of the time, but Argus let himself touch the ground and felt it below of him. Splashes and ripples were visible as it travelled to Argus. The ground was shaking, the sky was falling over after each step it successfully made as it went on. On him laid the intent of murder which was suffocating in its own remark, yet, he couldn't deny the strength it bore there in his own realm. Despite using a body which was not of its own creation, it still did a lot more in manoeuvring it that he had expected. Argus looked away and yelled. It was still his dream, so some control had to be his, or so he hoped it was. 'Curve now.' The next time he looked, it did curve to a long long way which still leads to nothing. He didn't need to do anything but stall until the titan fell apart. Now splashes came from below of him, with each step which was forced to bring him closer to the end, it made him bitterly afraid to misstep and fall. There was an early memory which now popped out of his mind to explore. And the sudden occurrence, not only did pop out in his mind but also in his surroundings. The cafeteria from his school. He was standing in a row full of children of his age. It looked and felt real, but then again, that was the point of everything and nothing around to bring him harm. 'Have I escaped then?' Some mean looks were shown to the children, as they all seemed to know him. Others knew him more than they needed to know, hence the reason why a teacher, a guardian attended and look for them. 'That's enough talking, keep waiting in silence, you know the rules.' Like a guardian did she come and she made it feel like it was going as planned. Everything seemed that way, until the moment of the blast. The roof came off at the end, chewed and pulled, thrown on the side. The sky remained the same, yet now he was forced into the body of a child. Dark clouds were coming to form as they crept their shadow under it. Everyone looked in terror at the standing Titan, with its eye sockets dripping away. It confused it to feel so many children running around, wearing the same clothes, all forced into a temporary terror and flight. A yell came to be. 'Where are you wretch?' It was in a worse condition, which was better than he would've expected. As chaos went on, their guardian finally said, but not after the time it took her to snap out of it. 'Get to the door now!' It was a command which forced many to listen to her and head out. Others were far too deep into fright and ended up hugging one of the legs of the tables, never letting go. Some attempts also were begun, it couldn't just crush it forward, nor just jump over it. A harsh tall wall it was and it started chewing and spitting. The fact that it had no teeth slowed the process more than it was needed for it to be. Nonetheless, like a tall lord it started doing so, just as well, as below, the teacher opened the door. It was the road again, which forced the terror into confusion. Dangerously abrupt were the edges, and if it were for some children to wander too far and fall, she has to pay for all of it. 'Wait outside and don't make a move.' She returned quickly into the broken chamber to pick up the children. In their sight was the monster, which waited and wanted to go through the room instead of going around. Against children, so young and tender, it knew that it had the advantage. Not only that, but it also saw that some children were inside. It must know that I look like one of them, thought Argus. Out of them, he was the only one who kept his eyes, bitter, moulded by his real age, a wickedness to them, which was hidden before in the body of a child. Such a shame, though, that it might've ended another way. If I try to run, he'll know which one I am. 'We need to run now before it gets to us.' He started. 'But miss. "No miss, can't you see what's happening? If that gets to us, there isn't going to be any miss to save us, look at her, she's already lost in there. And that thing's almost through, it's going to chew her if it didn't already. We have to run and get to our parents before it's too late.' Speaking to a crowd of children who were more than afraid, they were docile and open to suggestion. He had never spoken to them like that and now, it seemed that this wasn't a child like they've expected. No, this was an adult in the body of a boy. Suddenly and fiercely, they listened and obeyed, going through and running away, hidden by the mist, a rain started now and then. Under the shadow of the sky and in-between the statues of tar, they were, or more likely, Argus was now hidden away. The sound of the small cafeteria being broken came like a thunder, and now the end of the curved road was approaching. Something was being created from the midst of his mind and he was aware that, with all the bait he had left behind. 'I am safe.' Said the voice, almost cracking with excitement for what he's done. It was a shame that he left them, though there was nothing he could do anymore. The screams didn't matter, for their bodies were lost there. One escape laid for it to be finally over, for the dream lead him to the final point, a single square platform. Nowhere else for him to go. Way back laid a thick musk which made it hard to pinpoint where it was. Nothing alarmed him more than the fact that he was still forced to stay in the body of a child in a place where the enormous size mattered. He felt his limbs be still and pitied himself for a moment. That's when it occurred, as hard of the head as he was before and has proven it, time after time, he thought of something. It was deep in the jungle, and luckily for him, there was just enough space for both of them to stand there and be lost. Without a doubt or wonder, the musk started being pulled away and it wasn't long until it reached the place. The sky was burning, the various examples of wildlife were not in a battle between the changing skies and their resistance to the striking heat. Plenty of the tribes laid around, yet he decided to hide away and wait. The tar must've become, at the worst of time, solid rock, as for coming out of an area where mountains were adjoined. A desperate cried indicated that it lost at least another limb to the sudden change of the scenery as it was still too large in mass to be able to walk around the bridge. Further away, beyond the speculation and his ability to see, there laid a limp giant. It lost the far end of his foot, leaving but a fragment of the bone. No blood laid inside and the liquid that was once thinned on top of bone became as hard stone, yet cracked and could be held as of no worth whatsoever. A superficial lay of protection, which laid all around the body, doing nothing but slowed down the joints which needed to move. Argus stood under a giant willow's end, upon which a leaf, big enough to encompass his entire body. The insects seemed to be a danger, but far too small to pose a threat for the time being. Moist ground laid under, as there had been a rain, long before, despite the fact he had remembered it just moments before. There were crawlers who managed to find their way on his hand, only to be quickly smashed before they made their way to his ears and a colony of red, sharp-fanged ants who'd love nothing more, if they were to comprehend, but gnaw at him. Humans were speaking, small animals had their cries, and life was adrift, even more so with the help of the heat. It was barely passable under the shadow, which made it cold. Argus couldn't feel the ground being harsh under, so he started digging inside. First there laid some problem, as it was harsh, and it hurt his hand, but under a layer, there seemed to be something hidden underneath. A taller shadow came into being suddenly after, as a head, partially made of stone was held by nothing more but a fully functional leg and a limped one. Despite that, it bent over and moved around. It was enough to cause a ruckus, for everyone who laid around. Doctor Finn Arfinien along his assistants, Tristan and Hallmal were already set in retreat. Their small camp was the first to be caught in sight by something which seemed to be blind. Though that couldn't be further away from the reality, which remained that, despite the many senses, it seemed to them that the empty spaces were tracking their every movement. 'Professor, we need to get away, now.' 'Wait a minute, don't you dare leave before you picked each and every note. My books too, and don't forget every single rock and leaf type and soil sample I've taken.' His mouth was barely distinguishable than one who hadn't suffered in the desert, far away from a cold starry night. Sweat had taken him all the way from the edges of his untrimmed beard to the confinements of his bottom knotted shoes. An eye laid partially awake by the fear he had shown and even with that in mind, he still feared for everything he's done there. The tribe wasn't far either, in their attempts to worship and cherish the coming of their saviour, they fled in terror or seemed to be caught in an even worse concoction. A statue, a golem, perhaps an ancient. Crack. The splinter finally came to the head, as everyone laid in silence, blocked, and unable to think or move ahead. For another moment the time seemed to have stopped for everyone, at least for those who were standing still, as for others failed in that and fell to the ground, bouncing as if rejected. It was the bitter taste of blood it felt, dripping from the top. It wasn't its own though, the redness left a trail of blood. Argus finally found what he looked for. Another strike managed to banish the forest in a thin gust of smoke, just before the reveal, of a small crater in the middle of the platform. There he laid, bashing as hard as he could, the bone was tender and easily, it was removed. The giant fell after yet another strike, in flashes that it could see, a small creature was bashing the soft, unquenched brain in half. Laying there unprotected, he kept doing it until the moment when he smashed just enough to see a bone which had long pierced it but stopped growing at an end. A smaller fragment had grown, and it was just as easy to remove now, as for his last moments of superhuman strength he could conjure. They ripped it out, like two animalistic tools at his disposal, and with a real tool, now he could do something more than gnawing at it. It pierced, it ripped and now with everything which followed, he saw how the entire small room inside the brain trembled. There was nothing to give it the power to hold the skull afloat. Argus found himself using the armed bone blade for self-defense rather than for any further damage. The arms which held it now loosened and got crushed under the weight they could no longer endure. It was over in less than a minute when it slammed and smash, spreading across the room like a blanket of bone and skin. Such sounds which he now countered were horrific, as from one end to another, there seemed to be pieces thrown and showed inside, moving and trying to sneak when he wasn't about to look around. There wasn't any doubt that this was the room, the real image of what laid about, and he has managed to crack it, even if it refused to die. In the direst of moments, he found himself still standing, with a fashioned blade made out of a wicked long bone, he started slashing the moving pieces of its brain. Argus slashes and impales, they seemed to be forming a gel under them to keep still and be able to move around, despite the fact that they were slowed down, too much so to be able to escape his judgement. Strike after strike and the count of decimated pieces came to a halt. The mass around him no longer could keep still under his might and started giving away. It was falling on its own and he couldn't do anything, other than his attempt to not give in and fall in the acid. It burnt through the inner wall and revealed just how rabid and violent it had become. A volatile boiling, blistering concoction which burnt through its own skin. Even with its best attempts, a part of the brain fell inside and wriggled before dissolving, leaving nothing but a desolate mark before dissipating as well. This will be my end if I don't escape. And it had become quite more peculiar as the room started tilting below. Now, without any other tool, he looked at the end of the spine, which was now on a slope, left at the ends of no brain to protect. And it was ever closer that Argus needed only a few steps to rip off another piece of the spine and use it as a sharpened spine for his own accord. Two of them laid in his hands, which he used to climb, through the skin, which was thinner. 'I've got to try this, do you hear? Does the name Ferdinand hold any more value to you?' This time there was no one to respond or depart. Looking behind, the way through which he came wasn't any longer a path he'd easily be able to take. Acid poured in and started making the hardened substance in a soft goo which seemed to be forming blisters on the sides from the doubtlessly high amount of heat. Whatever Argus had in mind, this was the time for it. And other than impaling through the skin, he hadn't much, other than the first attempts. He climbed and pushed whilst the acid seemed to be boiling up to him. When he thought he was approaching or coming up with something there laid nothing but a pile of empty bones, the remnants of the spine which came out of an end made out of the skin at the top of where the skull laid. Up where he stood, flat on his foot, he pondered, despite how dire it was, he found the time, then and there, with two weapons, he started digging through the meat. The first layers of meat and skin gave away under the power and deconstructed bones which had laid unguarded for so long. The purple around the point where the spine came out of indicated the fact that it wasn't planned for it to come out and grow so rough. Dead skin was even more obvious that the one which was alive, and cutting it out was just marvellously easy. At least at first, the first few layers gave away, though the others didn't. A first strike at the tender red and pink meat which now seemed like a common carapace, or even a tightly covered shield and his bone blade gave away and broke. Argus was crushed to look below to see a bile made out of melting bone and brain matter, along everything it had started absorbing inside. It seemed as if that at the point when it lost its brain, there was no one to defend to control what happened inside the body. Mutations went wild, as the moistness came around too late. There laid plenty of other bones from the spines which he took out rather with ease than his brawn. Not enough, they will break as well. 'Help me, can you hear me up here? I know it's late, but I have come to free you from your cage, please, I need your help!' His voice fell short without even an echo, the air was running just as short as he was, the sound being silenced as well as his speech. And the tender meat still denied him entry, as he was ready to fall asleep. Not now, I cannot do it now, it will be too late if I fall asleep. I need to wake up and escape. But there was nothing he could do, at least not from his point of view. Argus was desperate, so, he resolved to punch through, first, the meat seemed to be like a stone, but something else happened. Suddenly a chance of plan, and ever since it stood erect, the end of the spine wasn't the thing he was standing on. There laid another just pointing towards the ceiling, slightly above. It must've been connected through both ends. That seemed to be the right way it should've grown, as the one on which he stood was overgrown from a lower ligament which wasn't meant to be. For neither one of them there. There, in front of him seemed to be the answer to all of his current problems. After a few attempted knocks, he understood that it was most likely to be hollow on the inside. Argus needed no bone to break the bone, as simply punching it seemed to yield results. The only problem which seemed to have revealed itself, as he looked down upon the feverishly growing liquid. The fact that it would raise itself and come down raining at him before he even got the chance to escape. With the lack of opportunity and having his chances of escape flee away from him didn't sit through the nuisance of arguing with himself. Instead of that, he went on and continued doing it without a notice. There, the hollow was revealed, and it appeared to be a tunnel like. 'I can grab the rings and lower myself through.' It was abruptly raised, though he was confident in himself. The hole had now extended only for him to lower himself and not enough of the liquid to pour in. A devastating blow was made just enough of the spot for him to go on and crawl in. A glimpse followed as he saw the liquid start the reflection. In the various puddles of an organic substance, small little patches of liquid took the form of mirroring memories from various spots from his past. It would've been the last strike, an attempt to take him down with it before it died. Too late, at least that's what he thought. For once, I just happen to be right about it. And at the moment, and without a second thought, he decided to risk it and not play safe, releasing his grip from the inner bone rings and letting himself flow as if he was in a tunnel. The bone was long, the ligaments started becoming more transparent as they went on ahead. He could see, as he was stopped. A flat portion of the spine laid on the side. It stopped his constant motion, making him go forth. It was thin and uncomfortable to go on, though chance needed him to go on without any real reason to believe he was going to live. The cartilage above of him appeared to be in the process of decomposing itself, which happened in front of his eyes. 'This is it for me.' Said Argus, only to be followed by to echo. Another scent came from behind, death crept in and the promise of death approached fast. Suddenly, this became a gamble. If he was right, he'd survive. With both of his knees rigged, his shoulders firmly attached, he forced himself to hit the ceiling. Over and over again, he attempted to overpower the structure and crack it under his own force. And the sudden last strike did manage to fracture him, as well as the ceiling. He opened it now with both of his hands, only to be revealed in the open room. The bodies were still there. The bones still fresh. 'It tried tricking me. You tried tricking me, haven't you?' It was pointless for him to point his fingers now, though he had seen more than a glimpse of light. Like a small cheetah, he sprang out and leapt towards the teeth. They all laid at the bottom, fallen with an ancient appearance appointed by their pointy ends. Something happened that it managed to produce enough force for its own mouth to fall. Argus wasn't entirely sure whenever or not it was a good thing or not. The entire body was shivering and falling apart, just like in his thought. 'It could fall at any moment.' With that in mind, he jumped through, covered in the parts, which joined his clothes, rolling on the ground and looking through what now seemed to be more of a liquid than a parasite. The bones were not piercingly tall. They formed a tower, and everywhere around them laid the mass just falling and going as further away as he could see. Though he hadn't waited for that, he got away as much as he could possibly be allowed by his weariness. It took a toll to stand there and do that, and even further. He was haunted by the doubt of his escape. No one laid around to judge his fear. It was too late for him now. Argus laid covered in a primaeval substance. It crept as the growths started forming all around his body. Blisters, small patches of skin, pouches, long over inflamed bits of terror-inducing bile cysts that were visible to anyone who laid afraid of what crept in the unknown. Argus fell on the ground, forced to sleep so he could avoid the pain which forced itself onto him. He has pulled away, now half-awake. It was rough but solid, the ground that laid under his back felt comforting for the time being. The entire mass was being drained and absorbed, and now he had the last sight of the upper world and the colossal bone tower. No possible thought could be had at this time and as he went in the giant pierced tunnel which was once made by the parasite, his entire body got encompassed by the substance. It came into him, through all of his holes and small protrusions. Everything felt bad as he was encompassed by this poison. His eyes were polluted, his body fell into the same, yet he achieves what he had planned. Finally, he closed his eyes. It was a something familiar, letting go, thought it felt like a memory, now came the first thought. It wasn't his own, but it belongs to someone else who came there before him. The previous predecessors who came into his mind then and there. Their journeys at different times didn't matter until now. And at atop of all, it was only now that they came into being, rather than any other point in time. Fifteen of August, the day of the arrival, at noon, during the daylight. There was the flash of a taxi driver sitting by the edges of a corner from the mid-street during the expulsion of the brittle tender crops. It was the beginning of something, though what it was remained hidden from Champlain. A guillotine of tobacco laid in his mouth as he was struck by the sight which promptly stopped him from the constant blowing of the smoke rings, which already seemed to leave a bitter taste in his mouth. This place was a stopper. 'Are you coming or just funny business?' 'Alright, I'm coming. Just let me finish my cigar.' He spat it out and shimmered to the side to throw it in the litter. It was a curved cylinder, covered with wooden planks, stapled to the plane surfaced ground. They were laid all around the city. And it was big, huge, and more importantly, on the move. 'Where'd it'd be, sport?' The man retraced the edges of his front mirror and snapped his fingers with dust. Inside it was all warm, at least compared with the wind from outside and the signs of cold being present. 'Jefferson St. on the fifth avenue and make it pronto. I've business to attend.' 'Right.' There laid the man, striking at his wheel as they went on, he was the rough ol' man again. I swear he's as old as the cab itself, mad Roger, was it? Sure, perhaps he was a bit out of his mind, especially with his old speeches of war, which he felt more than keen to share. Champlain lifted his eyebrows at the man and listened. He was in no mood to be rude and the background noise could've been more than helpful for his case. From the glimpses, back in forth, from the road and the man, he had finally adjusted to hearing the man. 'Indeed it happened, the way I'm telling you, don't trust those damn filthy paper men, those damn bureaucrats do nothing more than scowl in their filthy beds while we the real soldiers do all the work.' This seemed to be the start of something that could go for minutes, or even more, which seemed to be lessening the mood already. I wish I had another cigar, but he'd be against in the car. His amber eyes were now fixed on the man as he driven, having to listen. The old veteran's speech halted, as he waited to hear, the magic words. 'Go on.' It was as genuine, for as far as the man could tell from what he's heard. 'As I was saying, it was during the war, just envision it, try to do so, I know you may be too young, but as a child, you must've seen them in the museum or around the city. Damn reformists took everything and made it into attractions, but we the men who fought for them remember. You'd better do that too kid, from who could tell, there might be another one coming sooner than later. There, just look outside now, that damn thing became almost like a statue for the people to laugh about. None of them has a single idea in their minds just how perilous and destructive those were.' 'Does it still work? Since they let civilians come near, they must be deactivated or out of order.' 'Indeed they are, son, indeed they are.' It lay by the side of the road, almost guarding a separation between the two, a giant cask of metal round like a cylinder, with enough of a bulk for a battalion to fit inside. In front of it laid a giant pair of drills, of which, all laid cut in halves by the design, an engine laid behind int, along a pair of fornicated long legs. However it worked was beyond reasoning as not many notes, other than witnesses like those who've seen them first hand. 'Seen one of them in action then?' 'Indeed I have, and many more of them, though don't be tricked by those drills you see there, those are quite fake. They replaced the old accessories with those props for those city folk right there. Just look at how those children look at it, and those glimpses in their eyes. They think it is for adventuring underground and thank ye that they don't have a real clue of the real intent behind them. Those legs didn't seem like they could support so much heavy weight. What was it then? Oh, you're a bit curious aren't you? Well, as you've seen all around the city, they come on all sides and sizes, boring a lot more than seemed to the common eye. So I seem to think. Well, it just fares to me that, they cushioned it for the young eyes since the war came to an end, there was no need for the apparatus and the various tools. So they took everything sharp and blunt and hid it away in an underground bunker or in the hangar. Heh, if I were to be called. A silence broke him then, there were plenty of stops on the road. I'm fairly sorry my friend but it seems as if our ride is to be delayed. Quite the traffic on the road today. It can wait, truly. Just tell me more about them, those hidden. All types of weapons, if one were to look upon them, he'd more than likely think they belong to an outlandish force. They were too peculiar of a design, even banned in some places to be still held. I wasn't aware of it myself, though I found out just by the rumours how grim their tale was. Somewhere in this very town laid an armament, old relics of the war that were just hidden and taken away, and everything laid under their noses. The air was stiff, the thought of it remained witty. Again, the creeping dampness between the space under them, somewhere at the bottom laid a small concave spot where they dumped all their weapons. Down, rightly piercing the end from at least a thousand meters going down there was a turn from another set of stairs. The way was thinned us and the lack of air made it hard to breathe, not to mention the fact that only one person could go through at a time. No one else, as a matter of fact, knew of the location, as it was a rarity for one to stumble upon this exactly hidden gem. Other than the rumours, and now, another one having been added to the pool of those who knew about the classified information. Champlain being a prompt example of the attention coming out of a drunk veteran driving him around. Neither of them knowing, of course of the precise location of the gate which leads to the deposit, which was more or less for a good reason, to be told. The city was filthy for the time being. Agents were almost every corner, seeming stress, or in distress, or anything that was beyond saving or their awareness. Their clothes were muddy, some still wet from something. It was even a wonder, or a curiosity to point at the fact that they never seemed to be vulnerable. Quite the chance of pace wouldn't you say? The window was opened, or so to speak, the weather seemed to be in the course of changing in from of their eyes. Dark clouds, but neither seemed to be bearing any sign of rain. It was just so, that this peculiar occurrence was documented and classified as being something common. On a sunny day, in the hemisphere of the world, rain clouds, or the whatever other name was given by tourists or passengers ended up as being duds, blokes, bearing nothing to a rain. The wind was a strong reminder of the cold-hot edges of the glass mountains he had dreamed of in the past nights. He wished he had another small leaf encompassed cut tobacco by his hand, just to pass the time. The last option which remained was for him to listen to the quaint tip of a long lost past. The war you say. Weren't they banned during the war? I remember something, vaguely, about being deemed as a crime against humanity to use them. So you know of that, lad? Indeed, they passed orders from upstairs, we needed to remove everything and make it as fast as possible. It was a shame that, I. It was an understandable gesture, especially now, that he turned the mirror around. He wasn't prompt in being looked into the eyes. A scar was laid atop and going over one of them, though there was more to the story than he was able to say. Were you one of the drivers then? With the window now closed, he decided to go on. Both of the means of fresh air were closed now, and everything that now remained was the noise of his voice. 'I'm ashamed to think that I was indeed one of those drivers, most of us down at the company used to be participants. It's an agency think, they said, since you're already experienced in that, you may already just hop on inside the next machine. The memory of our sergeant still rings on to me, even now, especially since he had such a raspy voice you see. He told us, well, if you've got so much experience in war and driving these things, make yourselves useful and stay in form, we don't know when the next bloodshed will come. So we might as well have you prepared beforehand. 'It was sad to hear that now since Champlain was already around the age. Such was the fact that the uncomfortableness began, there was still the troubling traffic and he felt like his situation was beyond saving. 'Face it sunny! Just as we did when we were in that position, we weren't exactly given a choice at all, yet we had to go there anyway. If you want to know what's down there, in the trunk of the world, at the bottom of the roots, in the ground, do it on your own time. That, if you manage to find it on your own. Even now I am afraid, what they may do to me if I were to reveal. 'With a turn, his face was revealed to its full extent, as much as his neck twisted to the side. The cut extended revealing a pale eye which promptly disturbed him. 'Do you see this right here? Do you think I've got this from the war from the cosy warm seat I stood? From one of those pale mountain walkers? Nay, keep this in mind, the price of silence, as well as the debt which must be paid, is quite a lot if you understand where I'm coming from. We've all paid the price and in the end, those who speak too much and too soon bite the dust, do you hear? His eye seemed to have been scowled by heat, an end of a blowtorch, not just a normal cut. The skin around it was ashen, black, barely reattached by the sides, yet the man felt content to share with him everything. 'Why me? What if I decided to speak of what you've told me, do you have any idea just how idiotic was for you to reveal this?' And what exactly have I revealed to you son?' Despite the fact that he was prompt, almost sitting on his feet, he retreated back into the seat. He said nothing, nothing really. 'Nothing of value, other than rumours lad, and a word of advice. Keep it to yourself unless you want to get yourself in trouble. You'll get the far end of that than me, and you can trust me on that. I bet ya' on my own good working eye. 'With that and the clearing of the sky, even with the closed window, the traffic seemed to have vanished away. It wasn't far from that point on. 'Just around the corner. 'The hand pointed at the obvious. Despite the fact that, his mind was wandering about. He got out without leaving anything but an unchanged bill, a big fifty, and asked for no change. Left by the nearest street, he peered outside by each corner in sight. Everywhere around those spots laid creepy blinking eyes that were so-so obvious in the daylight, despite the creeping clouds. Even as the cab driver left, he looked at it go. What could it be that they used in the war? It was quite a peculiar thing, of which he forgot to ask. Perhaps I phrased my question all wrong, I should've asked why he told me everything but what was that armament. Too late now, even for him, now the man had left as far from his sight as he could've been. Turned, he was greeted by an agent. His sweat was running down the shoulder, for as far as he could tell, this man was on the field for a long while, and no one would believe otherwise. At least not with those layers of stench with much likely disturbed Champlain. 'We were waiting for you, follow me and ask no question. 'Lips got immediately sealed at the sound of the voice. Despite the appearance and how thin the man appeared to be, something peculiar laid about him. It was the pistol, held by his side, popping out there in the cold, where his every single fraction of awareness was pulled out. I need to wait before I swallow, he cannot see that I'm nervous. They will eat me alive if they see it. The agent nodded his head and turned his back, knowing not to be attacked. I am a good man. For doing this thing. I am.' Champlain said, in a soft tone, which wasn't heard, just as he was being led into their dwelling. Again, down the rabbit hole, into the depths, the thought of it crept away, just as curiosity filled the gaps into the story. The bunker must've been miles away, more than that, but it so, how did it happen that they managed to put every single armament from the battlefield inside. Corks, and needles and piercing sharp spears, most likely pointed lances and razor blades that spin around, and go into round motion, everything too big to fit through a thin tunnel. Speculation began immediately, as soon as he was blindfolded. 'Am I supposed to trust you?' 'You've got no other chance other than this. It was your choice.' Blindfolded, he was not encouraged to find a distraction, and what other better thing could he find other than this. They must've collapsed the tunnel, or hit it with everything they had. Perhaps, leading below there was a giant hole that was dug long ago by an excavation crew. It was already damp and cold now from what he could feel changing around his body. A splash of water over his cheek followed. Could it be raining now or was it then? Back to his speculation, there laid at least, lined in a row, a few theories about how they were hidden, the reason and what laid in the tomb. Tomb, as a comparison of what truly laid there could be called more than a treasure, laid there by the general in charge. He said orders from above, but who? No, it couldn't be, to ruin an entire excavation just to make it thinner despite leaving it like that, a long tunnel couldn't do it. They needed them, they still need them in case another war comes. I may join the draft if called. 'Sit there.' The blindfolded came out? When, how? It was surprising as dark as it had been way before when he was still holding his blindfold on. A small lamp came to be, which lit only the square area of the table and nothing around. At its edges, there could be seen the flying fragments and bits of dust, which made it seem like a cellar. And old cellar, which was long before abandoned, at least judging by the dust it was. There came no voice but a file, a small encased set of papers which were just thrown in front of him without even a bounce. It seemed as if they were almost too sticky to bounce back, even after the first attempt. 'Read it, now. This is your first assignment.' As he began going on with each page, now it seemed too perfect that, turned flat, with both of its set of pages lying perfectly placed from side to side, to be just a coincidence. Did they make this table only to brief new agents? Her name is Sibyl, at least that's as much as we know about her name. No family name, no friends, no acquaintances, nothing more or anyone else that really knows her. The age, from what we know must be something in the range of eighteen and twenty-four, young. Place of origin, unknown, birth unknown, where she is right now, unknown, everything of her location is unknown. We know only from alleged sightings of her that she crossed the country quite fast in order to reach a spot. None of those upstairs is aware of where she may be going towards since we can rule out going out of the country. Do you follow me so far? 'I am sir, so what do you want me to do?' 'In your past, you were an officer, a private detective, and a damn good sniffer where your business doesn't belong. In other words, she stole something from us, and you were called here to become a temporary agent and get back what she stole from us.' 'There's nothing here to work with, what do you expect me to do? Get her while she's on her wild pops in and outs of existence?' Indeed, this was a case that would be more fitting to a witch doctor than myself. Fine, I'll take the case but. 'No payment, you see something, it stays with you. Everything shared here stays with you till the grave unless you want to end up just like her, understood? Now turn back the page. That is a map of the entire province, with its every vein, road, shortcut, city, town and whatever else you could think of. It's a modified old map, they don't make it like this anymore, though it has everything and more than you'll ever see in a normal map. Now, there, there and there."The man pointed at a couple of spots, all clogged in red circles, all around it, going through a straight map, stopping at a point."If she's going through a linear path, how come you still haven't found her?The way it looks, you should've caught her long ago, here, here and here."That's where the problem comes, at the last point she just vanished, and for a few months at that.It took at least a few ground troops around the area to look around and scowl at the place."And?"Nothing, at least nothing more than some dust balls and a harsh wind."Could she be on the fact that she was being hunted and hid away for months?"It's in the realm of possibilities, we've still got men there looking around at that.And more on the road we think she took.But here's where the problem lies."The man came into the light, holding nothing but a knife with a red pointed edge.It wasn't blood, at least Champlain didn't think he'd see that so soon, but ink, red ink.The man suddenly started marking the area in front of him, making sure to get it good everywhere around.'Done, this should be fine.So, if she didn't make it through, we believe that she might've either made for a straight path.Here, here and here.'Three red lines were boring through the map from the point of her disappearance.One lead behind, two into what started to be adjacent roads, but ended up straight ahead.'Why straight paths then?She could've gone anywhere if she knew she had it in for her.So, why are you suspecting it?"The way she made it, we may not know from where she started, only as much as we have asked and seen for ourselves, but if you take a look, a better look, you'll see."She took a.'There was a second pause for a thought, nothing else seemed to indicate anything that'd make her want to just run on ahead like that.'Other than, the curve she took now straightening at the end?"Exactly, or so we think, getting desperate, what seemed to be caution became a straight leap, a run, a marathon for escape.Take this with you, and this suitcase, passport, logs and papers are inside.'Get up.'Suddenly as he got up, he found himself standing in a half-lit room, with the lamp being now dark and a small window is open from the side.It managed to reveal only the eyes of the man he was speaking to.'You don't need anything else, other than.'A man whispered in his ear just as he stood beside him.He nodded his head as quickly as he was gone.'Oh, and put this on.From now on, you represent us, you are an agent.Whatever you do from now on will reflect both on you and on us.Instructions are laid in the logs in case you get lost or left an unaware of what you may have to do.I already believe that you've met your partner outside."The one that got me here or the taxi driver, is it?"The driver, nice catch.But he won't be waiting for you in a cab anymore, look for a silver car with dark stripes all around it.It should reflect the suit, in more or less of nature.And Champlain."Yes, sir?"Make good and find that missing girl, dead or alive.Find what she stole from us and return it home and you might just get more out of this than a promotion."Thank you, sir.'It was secretive, that he was blinded folded yet again and slowly lead towards the outside world.At which, the daylight hit hard, though he hadn't even felt the fact that he was wearing a hat, managing to promptly block even the slightest feels of radiation.Down, he noticed a suit, even though he had no memory of ever wearing on.And on the road, the people walking seemed to give him peculiar looks, which were just as much returned to one another.Suddenly there came the horn from a car.It stood just there, waiting for him, on the road, all suited up and acting professionally.'Come one already, I've been cooking up in here for the last half an hour.'Has it been so long already?Champlain looked behind and noticed that fact that the dark alleyway through which he had been now seemed empty, bizarrely empty and cold in a damp day.'Im coming.'Bursting through the door, he looked at the man.The leather was just tightly cut, too fine for his tastes, as he thought of himself, as far as he knew to be a rugged man.'So, you're an agent, huh?I never would've guessed."Yes, you see, after the war, the whole thing with drivers being used as that. It's all a frog's bullocks, none of it, they wouldn't risk having us near civilians unattended. Trust me on this, if you ever expect the government to give something to you back, other than a stab in the back, forget about it. "You were forced to do this, weren't you?" It was more like a forced suggestion, don't get me, the wrong son, I don't hate my job, I just love living more than that. When they came, they gave me another chance to set things right into the world. Atop of that, they also they gave me this nice suit, car and, well, just stay with us longer and you'll see. 'Us sounded a bit too forced right there, it was obvious that he hated it, as much as he wanted to cover it up. And as much as he wanted to speak, despite the fact that there was plenty of time, to look on the map, to reach the destination. Which was? "Where are we going?" "We're exactly to the place she's vanished. It's marked right there, under that small twin towns. If we keep going at this speed, we should be there in less than eight hours top, so if you want to take a nap in the free time, feel free. "I'm fine, just. Takes time to get adjusted to everything, taking them in and all. 'The map was marked with plenty of dates, mostly everywhere he could look. It was obvious that this was nothing more than the smaller size of something bigger, yet this was as overwhelming as he could think of. The latest date was as of today, whilst the oldest he could find written down on a spot was of at least five hundred or more ago. 'I didn't ask you for your name, by the way. "I'm Grant. "Champlain. Listen, I know this isn't really my business, but how old is this organisation. They just seem like they were here even before us, just popping in and out of our lives. I never even notice them, usually, unless they're moving into masses. "Wait, Champlain. Weren't you one of those that they interview during that incident. Damn it, which one was it? A terror attack at a station or something, or was it something else?" "Yes, that's when I saw them come to escort us out of the building. I was there, travelling, business as usual when it happened and it just felt like a loose dream, nothing more than that. An explosion was set off and all of the sudden, these men in suits came inside and helped to escort us inside, just before this place burst into flames. I remember it loosely, even so. 'A parade, the sound of a loud horn being blown in a fanfare of many colours, odours and instruments. A busy day, to say the least, everywhere around people who've spread around, as wide as one could look, it was no wonder that they chose to attack this place against any other. The only spot that wasn't full of people was the waiting area near the trains. 'If I remember correctly, I was sitting in a bar, with my back turned. I had both trains in my sight, they were empty, just waiting for the section. At noon, or earlier than that. I wish I had a drink right now, to loosen my tongue, you know. "Here, I keep a couple in case of emergency. 'It was a small bottle of cognac, aged well, at least older than the incident. Quite bizarre. 'Do you drink and drive then?" "Only on occasion. But what can you do? Once you work for them, there are some aspects of the law, at which they turn a blind eye. At least once they see who you're working for. 'After a quick bottom of his shirt and a sip of the drink, he came back to it. 'I might've had a glass filled with a drink just like this one in my hand right there, but I wasn't drinking from it unlike now. Don't get involved with a dame, trust me on this. 'What followed was a bunch of other drinks, which helped loosen the tongue and a few more immediately after. He waited to settle down and cross the border of the town. Now, it was too narrow for anyone to hear them speak, even though he had forgotten or honestly didn't know that the windows were sound proof. 'I was hired by her, Evair, or Eclair, or Claire, something like that, to watch over this man who was supposed to come here and take the first train and get as far away as possible from whatever know what. 'The sun was shining and if the heat wasn't already bathing most of us who weren't hidden from it, the loud sound of the fanfare was. 'Near the bar, there was this ma'am, to whom I fell in love with the first second I laid my eyes on her.'I got involved during the program, as far as I knew, after a few more shots, I finally got the courage to ask her.'A bar in a train station, this is the strangest place once could encounter such a thing.Especially since you know accidents happen."We're quite famous around here sir, hence I tend to disagree with that statement.It happens quite often for people who'd travelled from far away to spend time at this station before they go back to their long journey."You don't say.'Her amber hair flailed as she nodded her hand, in the cold wind.Just a coincidence, as he thought, that all of the sudden, just as she did so, a small fragrance in the wind came near him, on a summer's day.The man wasn't going anywhere anyway, this was his only ticket out and there might've been an hour or two at least before any of them left.'There's a reason why this place is so bright so often, filled with many boutiques of many of kind."All right, I get it, but what still baffles me is the fact that there's a bar inside the station.A bar, and especially decent one from the looks of it, with a looker.'She was clad in black, under the shade of the second level, it was like a two floored station, as in they wanted to add more facilities for the passengers to use so they added more.Noise, at least coming from all directions, from around, from above, even from somewhere from the bottom of the ground.A metallic, barely audible sound, which I figured for coming from a worker of some kind.We eventually managed to strike a conversation and It seemed to me that something was about to go from that moment on.'It was then that."Yes, well, a tad little later than that actually.'I've had some time to look around and leave her for a bit, to stalk the man I was paid to look out for.She wasn't going anywhere I thought, and a bit of fresh air could've helped.The only immediate problem was the fact that I managed to land myself in front of a damn levelled parade, which was technically unpassable no matter how I looked upon it.I had to turn around and take a long way, which ended up being as farther away from the entrance as possible.Quite a rookie's mistake, yet it couldn't be helped, the sound of horns and gongs, the trumpets covered the sound.Being close backfired, as they masked all sound, including what I thought to be the initial explosion.'There were more?"Yes, haven't you read the reports, you guys to have reported, right?"We do, but the only thing said and done about that, is that we found only the charred remains of a station, nothing that could be salvaged and nothing that could be taken from it."Were you even aware that I was there?Not you specifically, the agency, was it aware of my presence?"The man nodded, after all, Champlain knew he intentionally bumped and gazed in front of a man who was called there to escort him, right at the entrance.Though they were there more for the control rather help any of them.Indeed, it was something unmistakably familiar about the man, at least from the reflection, his eyes, though he said nothing on the subject.'So, back to that."Have you seen a woman running through the station?"It came like a flash, the memory, the sounds, how he looked above, right before the ceiling started falling on itself.'It can't be her, there's no possible way it could be her."No, stand down already, that's a different horse altogether, it's way beyond your concern now."She's dead then?"If not from the falling debris, who know?You've seen her right?We've got reports of her going in and forcing her way despite having nowhere to run.'At least that's what they said, they were lenient of the information, too much.She escaped, though that he omitted from saying.It wasn't important and it appeared that she has suffered enough, the place was already in shambles, and it was no wonder that there were not even firefighters near the scene, until a few hours later.It came and went away, the first blast then it came the other.'I never knew what happened to the girl either!'"The one at the bar I presume?"Exactly, the one that had her way blocked beyond the counter.I believe that the level above her was the first one to fall from the force coming off the blast."And you never even asked her."Shh, board patrol.'It appeared that vehicles were blocked on the patrol, though there was something which they weren't in the mood or time for.Champlain hid the bottle under his leg and looked away.Seemingly, it could take some time, if it weren't for the fact that he had forgotten for who he worked for.'Here it is.'"Thank you, sir, you may go now.'No toll, no inspection or anything, he was just free to go without even a warning or anything.The barrier was immediately lifted above and through the black curtain of the car, he looked outside and behind, plenty of other laid waiting while they cut through the line as if it was nothing.'It's something that will never get old.'"Will we get there until the night?"I hope so, I hope so.At least if we get to a gas station, this car and I are starving.'There was a rub on the belly, the road was just clear for them to go, up to a hill, that had been slowly raising itself for a while.'You can go back to your story and next time, don't worry about it.There's no need to hide the bottle if you're not driving.'"Won't they think me of a bootlegger?"A bootlegger and an agent?That'd be a first.'He said with a chuckle.To him, it seemed entertaining, but Champlain hadn't forgotten, not only that but his thoughts were getting mixed.He was being distracted by the armament, which, for a while had been daring himself to ask the man.This wasn't the right time though.'She died most likely and I still don't know whenever or not it was a terror attack or something worse.The matter was never cleared up over the news, as a matter of fact, no one really knows who it was behind the attacks.'"Fanatics, nothing more, don't trouble your pretty little head on matters like this one, you've better things to think of now.This woman, who stole from us, where could she be?Why did she pass us over like that?"Watch the road.'The sound of metal, as harsh as it were seemed to have been too sharpened for its own good.It blended and hid with the background, disappearing as much as it possibly could.Such was it, for a second that the man turned the wheel and managed to crash the car into a post.The strike was close to being fatal, almost for the both of them, and the giant truck that seemed to have just now passed them was only seconds before ready to smash their entire bodies in a numb motion.The flash came with a long string like sound, as Champlain could barely now see in front of his eyes.Something was going down.Out the window, the black curtains were pulled in-between the cracks made by the hit.The worst thing of all was the man.He pushed his hand forth and tried seeing if he was still alive.No sign of it, at least he couldn't check anymore until there came the first violent shake.It was also then that he realised that the car was left by the sudden accident in a slope, and it laid soon to fall.'Wake up, now.'Champlain tried emptying his throat, yet those words were accompanied by a spilling of blood which couldn't be neglected.He caught it in his hands but failed to do anything else, other than the unbuttoning of the safety belt wrapped around him.By the left, he slowly touched the doorway to shift and get away.'Help, help, someone.Can anyone.'There came the faint as he looked, caught in a position mid-way to escape it and go away, one foot remained still inside as he could look there, finally with the help of the strong daylight.He was dead, his head was bashed, lodged, at least part of his skull had met the wheel and became part of it.Just as Champlain took his foot out, that was the last of it, the car finally rolled and fell out of the cliff without the help of the extra weight to keep it in place.There wasn't any bag but a loud noise.No word to be said, he looked on the road but there was no one to help either of them now.Pulling out the map revealed nothing in it, other that it was now slightly tainted by blood, there was still a long way to go.The car was busted below in a ditch formed long ago, and now.Now he mourned in silence for one he barely met.'I barely even knew who you were and I already miss you.'There was something appealing about the man which made him hard to be forgotten.That truck started everything was now just gone without a way to be traced back, leaving me all alone. I've got to finish this now. The girl. With a clenched fist, and with a promise to not look back, he showed no tears to the dead and started walking away. The night was approaching soon, or so it seemed that he found himself wasted. A bottle had been hidden under him for the whole time, his suit was torn, he was tired, but he vouched never to stop. No light came into being there, but perhaps it was the sleep deprivation that made him hear the voices of the damned. They came from the confines of the desert, no doubt people had been buried there sometime before, long before he had decided to arrive there. 'Damn this. I wish I would've buried you here, and now, why? Why did it have to happen now?' Not a fragment of his lip was left aware of the stores of water that could've saved them, he was feeling thirst and the next day could've come as bitterly as it could with the sun. Turned around, as if scared, from the constant feeding paranoia, he thought he saw the rising sun all of the sudden. At least, so, until he saw that there was a light coming from behind. Someone was coming, most likely someone to pick him up and lead him away from the desert. He hopes, at least until it proved false. The light dimmed at they approached. Not a second did Champlain pause or wait at the sight of it. Despite the fact that it was already an hour in the dark, which he had spent walking alone after being in the midst of a tragedy. 'You're not here, go away.' It walked at a slow pace, though it was undeniable who it was, or, rather what it was. A smashed front and the sides, the silver was visible even in the night, though something was still stuck into the wheel, a dark figure. The image crept into him, even to the point where he believed that the paranoia had driven him to make it all up. Again, he said, though now it was different, as he said it with a turned back. 'Go away, you're not here.' The sound of the engine running seemed to say otherwise, laps were made and all of the sudden, a play of lights came into motion. First came the light, then it went away, then it was one, then it went away. It seemed to be taunting, yet not at him, but the lack of attention he was giving to him. 'What do you want?' The lane was just enough for enough cars to come through, yet something made it wait there. 'What is it? Do you want me to wait or something? Because I can't, I can't believe I'm saying this, but now, I've got a girl to find. And I can't do it. I can't do it on my own.' Champlain had a long look at his feet and they were sore from the looks and feel of it. He needed the ride, and the driver most likely as he thought needed the company and the occasional banter he knew he could provide. Though the closer he approached, again, he remembered what he feared, what his mind tried denying. It couldn't be him undoubtedly saw him die. Let's settle this then. Slightly off the road, he stood on the giant endless carpet of sand and left just enough spot for him to come near. Even at the moment, he profited off the occasion and pushed his hand in front, making a sign. Hitchhiking during the job, what would they say about me? What came next, though was utmostly more terrifying than anything he had ever seen of thought of expecting to appear in front of him. It was indeed the driver, still sitting in the same position, skull pushed and joined with the wheel. Perhaps it was just an illusion but it was more so joined with it than before. Skull came close to becoming part of the wheel, the skin almost stretched and joined the leather. Champlain couldn't believe why was this, what it was, his eyes widening in a spiral of pale ongoing numbness, as the thought of it is a lucid dream came into being. He made a few steps back. 'Ar..'. The first attempt had failed as he managed to swallow a few of the words instead of focusing, he had needed a few previous attempts, though the bottle wasn't empty yet. With a quick glance at him, to make sure of no sudden movement, he took the cognac and emptied it in front, or rather, on his side. 'Are you still alive?' There came the singing horn that couldn't still work or be accessed, his hands were nowhere near them. As a matter of fact, the door was opened, yet those hands remained stiff for the entire visit. 'Do you want me to come inside?'Oddly, there was both a guilt and a feeling related to the fact that he thought he owed him to come with him there and then. With small hope, he came by his side. A shiver came through his spine, with each breath he took, the body near him came colder. Now, despite everything feeling so peculiarly odd, as the car still went on, and seeing how he was now sitting in the front seat, he excused himself. But not before attempting to not look, or to glance anywhere other than the rotting carcass of his partner, all and all, while the car was still running. With a small slither, he came to the back and managed to do it with such a nimbleness that made him even avoid touching him, or it. It was silence now, and the mirror was cracked. Is he even alive now? Not quite rightly, nothing could tell other than checking his pulse, which was already out of the question. He was driving, a dead man, something which came closer to the darkest of phantasm he had read about in the past. Surely, it couldn't be happening, the matter of the occult belong to, well, the occult, and this must've been just something in his imagination. 'I know how to drive, I'm sure of it and we're moving, quite at the speed. It must be that I'm alone, right? You're clearly not responding and quite the stiff individual.' At the first sound of the gurgling coming from inside a throat, which undoubtedly came from somewhere, a few feet in front of him made it seem as if. As if, something was still alive inside of him or had been before, but by now, it wasn't long until those lungs were about to stop, and without a doubt, the dark speech that followed crept in Champlain's mind. They sounded unearthly, a combination of the common gurgling of the various liquids that had been in his lungs from the various years of attempted suffocation. The remedy of war, the man failed to tell the young man of the fact that he used to smoke entire packs when he was his age, some peculiar times. Even ten or twenty a day, no wonder his voice had been so raspy. Though now, it wasn't the voice alone, but the peculiar position and the accident which left the jaw forced open, to be pushed against the skull, making a crackling such when a hole in the ground came. They should've fixed the road. 'What do you want then? I can't understand what you're trying to say.' Soon enough, he'd not understand anything from it, as the exhaustion was soon to catch on with him. A lousy day, now, on a road, in the middle of the desert. He closed the lights now, the mirror, with each crack, left the reflection of many pale eyes watching. It was his own eyes, in the dark, before he fell against the chair, sleeping like a child. The bright light in his dream made the place for white, pure energy filled being, which he remembered he had seen in a sea of clouds with the eternal glowing sun. So he saw his mother again, holding him on her knees and brushing his hair while watching over him like she had done in his childhood. Her voice was a soothing thing for his years to be held, and for a moment there, everything anxious and filled with confusion or deep -fright fell away with an equal fell swoop. He was content to see her well, and to feel safe. Though something wasn't there, there laid a stain under her robe, right on her skin, where there should've been a purity of white, pale milk like purity, laid a dark spot. A bump of red skin that seemed to distract him. In his dreams, he was aware, though they weren't as often happening as he wanted them to be. Purity caught him in a glimpse of what he wanted the world to be, it ended exactly and right before getting to the palace of light. It was so close, to his desire, to see and watch, though disturbed by it, his watch was forced to be at the bottom, deeply into the earth which laid so far, far, through the bottom. There laid something creeping, the arsenal, they said. So, he ended up, almost popping out to awareness, awake, eyes dilated and breathing heavily as he looked at the driver. It wasn't a dream either unless it could be inside a dream, which was already too ridiculous of a concept, judging by the fact that he had only lucid dreams. 'You're still driving towards the point.' It was a surprise, that he recognise, on the map laying the road clear. They passed a road sign which was plunged, shoved into the desert sand, it read exactly route eighty-nine. 'We're three hours away then.' Something wasn't right with the man, though he had dealt with agents before. He knew that they were experimenting with things which were beyond his comprehension, despite the fact that this was beyond, well and ahead of his expectations, he wasn't as shocked and tired. At least not as much as he was left to think of the previous night. Sharpened by the ear and by sight, not to mention his nimble touch, Champlain started feeling the body, checking the ribs, finally the pulse. There was barely any to be felt right now, not to mention the coldness which laid inside, both the body and the car. With that in mind, the man was still alive, at least a part of his was, from the accident, it might've left him almost dead, nothing but a case of twisted humanity. Though Champlain dared not double cross them now, after all, he recognised him on the road enough to pick him up and they were going in the right direction. 'This must be the price of servitude I presume, you serve your country, join the force and this is what they do to you.' It was a sight to behold upon, the slight movements, tilting of the head, he was thought to be dead, and perhaps it wasn't long to it. At least, with the brain being damaged, he couldn't be thought to be alive. There was a crossing on the man which was approaching. The light came through the windows and he had realised that they weren't exactly close up and rolled as they should've been. 'They will see us and I doubt we could explain it as easily to the next people who try to stop us. He pushed himself forth, in-between the seats, just so that he could reach in front of him and pull the curtains on, covering both of the windows on each side. There wasn't any way to hide those small cracks, but this had to do it. From the spot now, he looked and saw those pale eyes, almost lifelessly pulled back and empty. As much as he wanted to think him of a human being, he wasn't even close to being one anymore, he was something eyes. Pale eyes fell with the road and looked below, it wasn't that which drove him to walk. It must've been the memory of it. 'This could prove to be a mistake and a problem too, friend. We need to take it away and hide you as fast as possible from their sight. If they see you, we won't reach our destination and fail to find that girl. And this, you, would've been for nothing.' The stylish suit he wore went away from him as he covered the support front of his body, carefully making sure he wouldn't be seen from the distance. What could they think if they saw him in this condition? The human experiments, the monsters. 'How often does this even happen?' What have I dragged myself into? As Champlain laid back, he looked at it from an overview, the sight of the broken mirror disturbed him so much that he hid it away. Rightly, they passed a giant road sign with one of those commercials written and made for the pass. It was a product of some kind, uninteresting, though under its shadow stood a car, creeping. Undoubtedly, the officers were there and just in time, he closed in to whisper. 'Slow down, so they won't follow us.' It happened at such, though inconspicuously, he attempted to look back, through the window, there wasn't anything to be seen anymore, just distant cars approaching from as farther away as he could see. They were coming, or at least, it'd be full of them. For a moment there, the realisation came slow, at least slow enough to make him lessen the fear of being caught. He went on ahead to test it. 'On the crossroad, take the left. We should be able to reach the point a lot faster that way if we take that part of the road.' It was a simple command, he wasn't driving by the eyes now, so he must've memorised every possible road, or so did Champlain hoped for. It was dangerous already, but getting caught was the road. They couldn't take this straight ahead road anymore, going near the spots where the trains were, not to mention the main point where there'd be traffic. Stuck with a dead man driving, in an official car. 'You also won't need this anymore, though I'm sorry, need calls me to do it.'He hadn't gotten one from the officials, sort to speak, they weren't trusting him as of yet.Now, they hadn't a choice to do so.This was going to be ten times more dangerous, especially since he had no license to carry.The barrel was full, with six long noddled bullets.The front of them remained stained with something.'No, it's the casing.'With the mere distraction, he hadn't noticed the red small patch around the ends of each bullet, left there for something.They weren't legal bullets.'Are we even allowed to.Oh right, sorry.'The guilt still crept, yet now, he saw that he was indeed following his order, despite being in the worst condition.It could've been worse, or at least it could become.'We're just two hours away, or something less than that if we take this way.Just focus, as long as there will be no other accidents and we manage to avoid bumping into others, we will be fine.'It was his dream, his desire, to go through unnoticed.There wasn't any other expectation to be had, though he hadn't foreseen what happened next, he couldn't have.Even though the map was in front of his eyes, he failed to see the sign of the train.Within a slope, the sight of anything in front of them went away, and Champlain couldn't see anything but an entire set of growths of leaves, bushes and small trees.Somewhere here must've laid a road, or at least so he thought he had seen it written down.He couldn't have been more wrong if he wanted to be as such.Ten miles at least and they could feel rocks, big chunks, knocking and leaving small bumps on the wheels.Some even going as far as piercing the material.Though the final blow was the command.'Push on the gas, we can't get stuck here.'With a dire need to listen to it, there was a shuddering audible blow, that came from behind.Something had happened to the wheel, just as they came out unscathed from the rock field.And into the tracks, after the car managed to get through, it finally got stuck.'Come on, what are you waiting for, a train is on its way.'There was none in sight, but that trail of that dark smoke was almost too visible in the daylight.And to bear hearing such a creeping sound, just as the machine finally had its last breath, was far too distasteful for him.'I am afraid I must abandon you yet again.'Seeing how, after trying once to pull him away from the wheel, that attempt failed horribly, this was indeed the time to surrender and finally let him go.Behind the bushes, he hid between the stones.This was no train but the evil torturous twist of a train, with its sharp upper from blade polished and its size, made the small vehicle appear as the one used by a child.This gargantuan of pounded steel didn't slow but even became faster to scare the man away from the seat.Below, he backed away.Champlain, that is, recognising that the car might as well just bounce back and punishing him from abandoning the man again, crawled through the mud but managed to get out of sight.This was truly the end, as he looked away, he saw the blade cut through, the hulk of metal was smashed, crashed and bashed.None of it was left anyway, and none other was alive to tell where he was.No bang, no burst of flames, just the front where the driver laid, it got entirely taken.'What now?'His hands were shaking on the man, which was already filled with his sweat in that crude hot, day.At least the shadow of the trees, on the small hill, the stool was slightly comforting, despite all which happened.Champlain was still close to the rendezvous place and they were waiting for them.Him, to come, now all alone and bruised.Since he walked on foot, it could've taken a lot more than he expected.A whole lot more, judging by the fact that he was tired.'There needs to be a story, but what could it be?Taken, killed?We were assaulted you see, and my partner tried to fight back.No, damn this.'There was his gun in the pocket, they wouldn't believe it if they saw that.Plus, if someone caught him wearing one without a permit, there'd be more to explain, theft, murder, this.'Now it's lost.'It was almost as if it disappeared between the array of bushes and the stones.There was little hope of finding it once he realised his fingerprints were still left on, though luckily a rain or the mud would wash them, at least until an unlucky man found them. After all, six bullets still laid inside the barrel, which, most likely would never be used from that point. It took a few minutes or an hour for him to pass alone. Looking like a homeless man, he came out of the bushes, tall and slightly bruised, into the residential area. This was not at all where he needed to be. Houses, neighbours, people who could see and watch, who could testify against him. The thought alone drove him back into the spot from which he emerges to hide away. With a small droning sound, he said. 'Don't look at me.' Driven into a full flight and as for the running, Champlain managed to find himself back on the road, though more roughened than ever. His sight was travelled, on it, despite the traffic and the visible look of all the cars and the people in sight, it still went on. The front was smashed, still, cut into pieces, yet it still managed to work on something and go on. A terrible fright came to be. Sort to speak, at least, so he thought the man to be of ghoulish descent, only something creeping could now be seen inside the boiled box in which he stood. The other cars avoided him as much as they could, but Champlain on the other hand waited. One way or another, he had to face whatever waited on the other side. At least the speed was kept relatively fast for what was going on. There was only a mere problem, which obviously became unavoidable. In the midst of every single one that passed by, he got inside and moved by the side, just so he'd avoid looking until it became unavoidable. A wreck of a car now laid in front of him, the edges were cut, it seemed to have been thinned and pushed in itself but only by one of its sides, the front one. The worst of all remained the fact that, the point from where the train had hit him was the driver's spot. How tainted was the sight, that Champlain was forced to look away from the gruesome image of his companion? Pieces of him were missing, the door from his left side joined now with his ribs, though in a way, he became more a part of it than the other way around. Now, he reached to him again, felt the coldness of the body and the stiffness once again. Still able to drive, he went on, now unrecognisable as a human being, his small suit had fallen by the side. He has covered again immediately, though no amount of anything could cover the front side of the wreck. The windows were in pieces, there was barely one on the side still trying despite being cracked and pushed inside. A grasping thought still haunted him as he thought of still, there is still a pulse inside of him. The man was still alive, despite everything that happened to him. And they were together for a ride that would last less than two hours, with barely any scratch on him, but this happened to the rider. It was already hard to hide she shame from those that watched them or through the various holes when they passed by. But even more shameful was going to be the explanation that would have to be given on what happened. On his account. I ran away but he came for me anyway, this is what happened, at least so I do recall the order of the events. 'Sir, I don't know what to say, other than I'm terribly sorry for what happened to you.' Usually, there would've been a gurgling sound of some sort to signify that he was heard, despite feeling as bad as he was at the moment. Though no amount of guilt could come to an end. The spot where the girl was found was getting close. 'Well, time to find that girl then, right?' At the top of the man, stapled was a blurry image of a running woman. Not much to go on from that point, but it was a beginning nonetheless. 'Wait, we don't need to meet them at that point, do we? Why don't we, well. Go ahead and find her on our own right? Remember, you told me that the government had backstabbed you before, and now this happened. Just, keep going by that point but on an arc and try being inconspicuous.' It was a madman's approach, but this was a death sentence to admit, leaving him, to run away, being followed by something that wasn't human anymore. A new way was now being made, a new road, a second path, hopefully, one with less curious of eyes, this was already a wonder how it could still move. Or the man, with his still living body, though doubtfully, was there something left of his brain. The way the door joined him by the side of his body, especially through the head, there wasn't any doubt of the brain damage. If he even had one, or if he ever was a human, to begin with. 'It's strange that despite everything, my side is the only one that remained untouched, right?' An awkward, close to being silent laugh tried relieving the mood. Such did Champlain thought about it, in an attempt to make everything less peculiar and awkward than it really was. 'Oh, remember, the armament that was once used in the war?' That was an interesting subject, I haven't realised that you were supposed to be my co-worker then. You really got me. 'It felt uncomfortable to wrestle his hands and shifted on among his elbow and thighs. The warmth coming from outside was coming to an end and the scent of the approaching death were still creeping. 'You're dying aren't you. You're dying in front of my eyes but still try doing your mission. Why? They failed you, the government, the army, these agents, the other. Well, human beings, including myself. Why aren't you stopping then?' There couldn't have been an answer if he wanted to, other than the fact that he stopped the car. In the middle of nowhere, with crowded streets, he stopped. The door was open now, unlocked. Champlain knew that he could leave at any time and needed to hear no words of it. 'I could leave you to know, and there'd be no evidence of me being here. I still can do that without feeling any possible guilt, you know?' Though the front mirror was broken, and there wasn't any way for the driver to see without eyes, he still knew Champlain wouldn't leave. 'We stick on road avenue fifty-eight and don't go any other way. With a bit of luck, if she's hiding anywhere, we should find her right?' Four more hours passed, two at least and a few minutes since they went by the rendezvous point. The car stopped within the range of a dinner, hidden by some bushes. There was just enough money left for a last fine dinner and something to grab back to the journey. A bell rang as he came inside, with a particular pair of sights thrown at him. A small ring of silence formed. People were more than obediently sitting at their tables, at least until he decided to come inside. The front row had plenty of empty seats as well as others which were full of the most notoriously looking people Champlain could observe. 'What'll it be, stranger?' Asked the woman behind her pub. From the looks of it, she had been cleaning a dirty cup with a dirty piece of cloth from some time now. 'I just need a good dinner, that's all and something on the road.' 'You're not from around here, are you? Actually, don't answer that. As a matter of fact, don't really talk to anyone really unless you want to get in trouble with Butch.' The last part was close to being whispered. Champlain hasn't been in front of a mirror, not could he had known exactly how roughened up he looked to others. This Butch had to be avoided now, as he nodded and waited. From each side though, two fellows seemed to be gazing at him over longer than it should've been the norm. And old man and a young countryman, judging by the clothes he wore, younger too, at least twice the size, lesser than the other. The waiting was unsettling at since he couldn't be turned around to look and who else was there trying to figure out what was his deal. Please, please, please, hurry up already, I need to get out. With a sudden care, he looked down at his hands to notice if there was any, as small and as lenient as it would appear, a smear of blood which could point out what was going on. 'Cold water I presume you needed or a fizzy drink?' 'Just water, thanks.' Bacon, toast, water and a pair of boiled eggs. He could've thought of anything about it, but this looked more than decent, it now looked divine to him. And none of the above seemed to be accompanied by the variously flavoured spit one would throw to a passing peculiar looking stranger. The ma'am came again and was greeted by other thanks before Champlain finally started eating. It might've looked like he was eating like a pig, something which might've relieved some people that were watching or had been watching him for a while. Luckily the waitress went back to cleaning her cup, which did more than getting his attention. 'Why are you doing that? Cleaning the cup with a dirty rag I mean.' 'Well sir, this isn't just a rag, it's the well-used cloth General Mayor William Charlston, which my grand-grand-grand mother met while working here and served the man while he paused during one of his campaigns. 'Is this really that old?' The woman nodded her head and went back to it. Though that failed to give an answer on why was it still so dirty. 'By the way.' Before anything could be said now, there came another man inside. The bell rang again. From the looks of the others which left the vicinity, or at least shifted sides, this was most likely, as Champlain thought, a ruffian who terrorised the place. The steps ended at the door as the man waited, looking around. Even the waitress stopped from doing what she was doing and placed both the cup and the rag to the side. 'Coffe?' She asked, but no response came. Since she went back to it, at least it was obvious that whoever was doing what he was doing, he most likely just gave a nod. Scouting the little man sitting alone. 'You know that's my place, right?' It was a heavy voice with an even heavier accent, undoubtedly the one you'd hear from someone who chews some cigars in his life. 'Listen, I want no trouble, just to get my food and get out, all right? I've had my share for today.' The man giggled, almost like a school girl in the summer, mockingly trying to imply he was nothing to be scared about. 'Oh, you will get your food all right, but at another dinner, understood? Unless you think you could take me on and get away with it.' Two big hands wrapped around his shoulder and turned him around the rotatable chair. There was a clear difference between their sizes, ages, and a bulk of the body. From the tattoos, Champlain knew that this man was most likely belonging to a band of some kind. His thoughts were still clear though and forced on the matter. 'I've finished it already but. The sound of coffee coming as the cup was placed as farther away from where he stood resonated with the table. 'Here's your coffee Butch, just let the man go, he's done nothing and you're not invited here to mess up with my customers, okay?' 'Oh, but I'm just messing with the kid, that's all, you know, deep down that, I'm a saint. Right fellows?' There was an uncomfortable yeah which travelled from around the room. As awkward as it was left, he was still left with a mean demeanour which was hidden or attempted to be hidden away. The bag was ready with some packed food. 'Your baby bag came, better go and grab it.' The big hands finally released as he said it. 'I'll give this free pass to you today, better not catch you sitting on my seat ever again.' Turned he took the bag and paid the bill, leaving some change. Champlain turned casually as if nothing happened and headed to the door. 'Wait, wait, wait a minute, right.' Lifted from the table and coming straight at him, Champlain finally turned on his own to face the man. He appeared even rougher while he was standing, though the bulk seemed to be off the extra pounds rather than raw muscle. Knowing they'd never see one another, Champlain took him by surprise and to that of others, he knocked him out the moment his fist made contact with the man's jaw. The bell rang again as he burst outside and started going for the car. Luckily, it was still hidden and still in the vicinity of him. Just in time, there seemed to be approaching more cars towards the dinner. They'll look for me now. 'Drive and don't stop. Step on it I said, my dear friend, he won't like what I've done to him and I've no other expectation that he'll bring friends.' Stamped, the thorny yellow bushes came down as if they were nothing under the pressure, as he came down on it and burst away. To the onlookers, it was obvious who was in the car, regardless if they saw him come inside or not. Butch, the hooligan came outside and eyed both the dark figure of Champlain and his driver, babbling to himself for the time being. 'I've really done a number on them and for that I'm sorry. But now we can't take any more breaks so don't give up yet, they can't catch us like this or else who knows what else could happen.' Past the point now, they attempted to skim the rest of the place, occasionally looking for the missing woman. At least a few hours passed, once again, off the tracks, off the road. It needed to rest from the looks of it, or die, at least, one of the two would most likely let him go. By the road now, and away from the desert laid a small bridge with a ditch and just an uplifted spot where a small stream of water came and passed under it. The car was driven carefully under the bridge, knowing that they wouldn't be found at night hiding there, in that exact spot. No one sane would go there while knowing they'd have to climb back up. Especially one who's engaged in a dinner like Champlain. 'Good night.' Sleeping with a dead now became more of a habit than uncomfortable since he wasn't entirely so, it took away some of the only charms and appeals it had. Danger on the road, no stars in the sky. The shadow under the bridge did more than creeping his dreams, especially the hole in the wall. 'You know, I kind of find it hard to sleep now. Do you think we could perhaps try to turn the car around?' It was kind of late for a request and with the going on lights, people were still pulling all-nighters. Some were driving just above of them, and perhaps turning up the engine wasn't the best idea, especially since they were hiding. In solely peculiar whispers, he said. 'Sorry.' And attempt came to be, for he found it hard to fall asleep with that thing in the wall. A giant hole covered with strings and webs which were pulled inside, slightly protruding outside. It crept him how it acted and filed against the wind, and especially more what laid inside of it. The twisted creature must've been something horrid which he had seen as a child, in his bathroom after taking a shower. A coincidence, though nothing more, it appeared there by the time when he was too tired to make any distinction between reality and that of a fantastic dream. In the exact spot, rightly above him, on the wall laid the hole, next to the drawer where his father kept all the towels and soaps and just by the light. Even with a strong light, the darkness in the hole crept and left him numb, there was something inside, making small movements, something that should've resembled a spider. Yet it didn't. There was always a fear as a child, or a presence creeping him beyond the hole, sometimes watching him, at his most vulnerable and alone times. The valve by the side was rusty a persuaded by the wall, another thing that crept him, especially since his parents never got around fixing it. A skull or at least something resembling one was embedded in the wall, out of which head came out the set of various tubes from which the water came. It was a combination of the image of the bodiless man and the hole in the wall which crept in his childhood memory, having to sit near it and see it sockless and toothless, with a half open grin. Or to hear the sound of the wind be twisted and be heard as voices in the hole. One particular night, coming out in the bathroom, he found himself dumbfounded as he gazed upon, or rather heard a voice come out. Something was looking out too, out of the web embed hole, but Champlain hadn't seen from where it came. All until he looked below and saw the cracked pipe, a long sturdy cracked pipe waited for him there. It glared at him as he did back. It repeated itself, though Champlain heard it only now for the first time. 'Wake up.' 'I'm awake, I'm awake.' Almost into a rage, he was forced to be aware, a few hours into the daylight. The blue curtains blocked the light, though not the one coming from the front mirror. Some hours were spent driving, at least, as the whole scene seemed to have changed, into a more, out of the borders kind off one. Houses were spread farther away from one another, more basic and on hills, long with perturbed levels of grass. In less than one word, abandoned. The water under them showed signs of the bogland, though why were we going here? 'Where are we heading towards?' Do you know something that I do not know, or that the other agents don't know?"The same silence was met just as cold.This was another chance for him to check the pulse, and apparently, after another attempt, it was getting worse.Some parts around his body were beginning to look especially thin and stiff, while the others which merged with the wheel and seat seemed to be melting slowly or falling my his side.Skin flakes were flying, almost unnoticeable to the human eye, or would've been so if it weren't for the fact that they came out of the decaying merging corpse.Parts of the car seemed to be rejecting his body and his promise of the extension.He'd have to be removed from where he stood, or so he thought, in the end, to be abandoned and buried in such a place.Or even worse, to be forced to become such an abomination by the agents, this wasn't the fate the old veteran deserved.It was far from it, far from what anyone would.Mid-day of July eleven, Champlain couldn't remember the year, though it was odd.Lights were coming from the back, and they seemed to be a bunch of them, at least judging from the broken mirror.'We're being followed.'With the obvious spoken, the sounds of their engines reigned supreme, and from the front of the car, which was the approaching, a big truck, with painted stripes of white and red by the sides, spiked ornaments, a familiar man stood on the seat.He was immediately recognised as the hooligan or roofing from the dinner.'That's the man that tried to threaten me.And he's brought a few men with him, step on in, we need to lose them as fast as possible.There's no telling what he'll do to me.To us, if he catches us here and with this, he won't care if we're working in service for the president himself, we need to lose him at all cost.I know I'm repeating myself now but, he just can't reach us at any cost, understood?'He must've been above the bridge we were hiding.Champlain looked with both a curious and a fear behind and the car and what was with the others.It wasn't looking as bright as he wanted it to be.Moreover, he was afraid that something could be going down between them if they caught him.'Okay, they're approaching, go through the swamp, understood?It seemed high enough for us to be lost in it.Please, they can't catch us now.'It was a remote, almost hidden place, the type that, if someone were to fall in an accident, his corpse wouldn't be found.The truck finally gained speed once he saw that Champlain was looking, and came in fast.With a fast curve, a shift of speed, he came down and fell into the swamp.It was indeed deep, the dark water seemed to have been filling in from all sides.Dark was the water and the approach but worse would've been it so.Most of the muck and the dirt covered the veteran even more than him, and Champlain's plan came all along until the song of chain came to be.There came a hooked chain which pushed and grabbed the car and started pulling.With a quick push, he opened the door and started counting.It was either drowning or facing those men to do whatever they pleased, and he's already had a hit to anger him.No, I will not die here, thought Champlain as he swam away.There were just enough leafs and other small rounded and squared long plants hanging above, that he could go for air if he just waited.Now, that he was safely out, he closed the door and hoped that they'd take the veteran in his place.After all, they were the same height, more or less and he came alone.The lunch pack, this came to him, he had forgotten it inside.It bounced right outside of the dark pool as he heard the metal leave a ring of jolly sounds.He saw away, all ahead, as far as he could be when he finally decided to look back.But not after making sure, only his nose and half of his face were left outside, covered by the long-leaf, breathing as if for his life.The sight was only that once could have a fraction.But it was enough to see that they found the means of identifying him, the bag, the driver was covered just as he thought.From what was being shouted, Champlain only heard.'Come out, right now, or it'll be worse for you.'He could see the car hit the gas, as hard as he could, those wheels wouldn't work again, he was caught like a fish out of the water.The cooling Butch was going to become his butcher until his nerves came out into the light of the day and he asked one of his companions to bring out the gasoline. A can, the big one came into being and was presented, rolled up he opened it and covered the car. What came next was a phantasm of his speech, just as he covered every last inch of it and even threw another one in the back seat. 'Didn't I tell you that you'll be eating at another diner? Well, it seemed to me like you don't do it anymore.' A burst of flame came into being just as another set of lights came from farther away. Someone was up to Butch's plan and was coming, only that it was too late for anything to be done anymore, the deed was done and in the middle of the road, a spark of flame. A spear of burning light came, the skin melted, bolted bone, the metal cracked and fell, a small implosion came to be given birth. The metal was pulled back inside as finally as an accursed spell was cast on the machine finally went into the effect and the car was finally cut into two pieces. More fire came into the middle and the sudden change of heat came too fast into the effect and it managed to sear those who were in front, including Butch, most of all. Unable to retreat back from where they came from, as those who were coming from behind would be the witnesses to the crime, they turned back into their cars and drove away and around. The charred remains and the unholy smell made him wither inside. Champlain swam away, under a leaf, to the small abandoned village near the reef. Grown everywhere around and inside were tall plants which had taken over and control over everything which once laid inside, including the humans if someone ever lived there. In the morning, it should be safe, so he thought. Though now he was alone, cold and scared, dripping on the wood after opening the door. Only by luck, he escapes and only by the same approach he found himself lucky enough to be sitting on a clean floor without a smell, and dry as it appeared to be. Exhausted and cold, Champlain stripped himself of the clothing and hanged them over the various wooden objects in the house, the chair, the table and even the stool. There was even a bed now and quite comforting as it was to be alone once again, he went away. A nightmare spawned in his mind just as guilt crept, the inferno, the furnace, the metal prison which was dragged to the depths of the pithiest holes in the tartarus, where small little-horned beings laughed at him. Swimming in a lake of blood, he saw his friend get crushed, despite never having told him just bad he felt. 'It's all your fault.' The face ripped itself while stopping the merging with the wheel and it was now that the ripped out moth finally spoke those damned words. 'I'm here because of you, cowards. You abandoned me and ran away rather than face your fears.' They were tall and covered with various picked up items from the road, round trash can lids, tall hats of straw, planks, all of which were nailed deeply into the skin and into the bone. It bore him a lot of nerve to look upon them, as they laughed, and the blood under him was becoming shallower. 'Shh, they'll find you if you don't stand still.' The sound of a cricket could be heard as if it was stirred away from its small shallow home. A dark stiffening sound came into being, the coldness of the blood match was grabbed to a hold now. Only half of the night had passed about and someone was about to come into one of the abandoned houses and find him sitting like a vagrant. A strong light came and made it supremely obvious that someone was indeed around. In the middle of the light, Champlain had his worst fear came to life. They found out that they killed the wrong person, it must be them again, wanting to finish the job. The wood was damp at the bottom and made no sound when pressed firmly. Something either happened or it was his own sweat which made it so wet everywhere around. In just a few seconds, all the clothes came back on him and he was ready to open the door and come down on whoever it was, bearing a chair in his hand. Old wood, but a weapon nonetheless, so he thought himself to be lucky in the regard, no last wishes, at last. He opened it for himself and looked as the light vanished. The second instinct came to the road, where he saw nothing on there. The trail of sickening disturbed plants and water made him feel anxious as he closed the door behind him. Did it see me now? Couldn't it be that? I saw it get burnt and explode, cut it half and smashed, there's no way it could still be alive down there. His organs must've been melted and replaced, the metal, the plants from the swamp. It could still fit the directive that he was once thought to serve. Such loyalty to them was both frightening and maddening, to think that one day he could be forced to servitude made him forget their deal and think only of the escape. All until the first set of knocks came on the door. Someone was outside, looking for him to open it and respond. Perhaps even more than that, he could be forced back inside the car and drowned. 'Does he want vengeance or what?' What could it be? Thought Champlain as this dire event came into being. One advantage still reigned between them, it appeared that it was even slower, perhaps even so tauntingly so that it couldn't follow off the road. I need only to get on the other side. There came a disturbing turn and he opened the door and whatever laid now at the bottom of the march was too puerile to be looked at. Too disturbing in a way, to be taken as a being of interest anymore. Initially, there came a set of splashes until his arms became like spears, driven by both fear and his paranoia. It could be anywhere in sight, his legs were tired, body and clothes still wet from the initial drop. Now he was in the middle and he felt something grab him by the leg and pull. He couldn't scream in the water nor was there anyone that could've heard him so. Not to mention that no one could've helped him even if they wanted too. Dark was inside, even more so, that the vision of the tartarus still crept in front of his eyes. Through the bloody swamp, he ran and the last pieces of air fled away from Champlain. The water coming in and the bubbles, these were the last things the man remembered of the world outside. Whatever happened after to either of them remains a mystery in the fragments of his memory. A huge gap, a lead, an endless descend into the water abyss, there, what wasn't filled by his eyes, it got registered by the rest of his senses before arriving at the bottom of the world. Something came into his mouth and his nose, it fed him the air needed but made him feel dosed and afraid to even speak or move. It seemed as if it bored inside his nose and body, going as far as to reach the lungs and give him something that didn't belong to him. A connection was made once the long bulbs came into his ears and he could finally hear. It was the voice of the veteran, an image of him in his mind which he could faintly recognise. Thought it was sea water and they were swimming through the weeds, into the fainting black abyss, he saw him on the field, standing there, just watching the swamp. Right next to him stood the man, fishing out of the bog swamp. 'It was a lie, son, nothing more than a lie. They were never after the girl because they were fools, the answer that they needed was always in front of them, to begin with.' The charred remained turned clean into the water, revealing nothing of the marks or the damage caused by the fire. Soon the metal was released and the various heavy parts which dragged down were shoved away in front of them, soon to disappear on the side. It was a pity thought that now, everything was revealed as it was. 'They thought that the girl knew the way to the bottom of the cage, but they were wrong about it. Plenty of entries lay around, but they're still too blind to see it.' 'I'm sorry' Champlain interrupted, at least now, that his guilt couldn't be any longer contained. There wasn't any care of the need of an explanation, as he was still driven away by the guilt and fear for what he's done. Even worse than that, he believed that this was his punishment, to be grabbed down and drowned. 'I know, don't worry. You couldn't even harm me if you wanted me too, but this is way, far more dangerous and important than you know. This is the real mission now, do you understand?' Out of his hand, almost like an ethereal spell, he manifested a file out of it. The hill became a busy office, with smokes and a transparent door. There was the piece of sound, which was distinct from people working, yet they were standing in front of one another, going through files. Same envelope like the one in which there were pictures of the girl now laid in front of him. Now there were plenty of pictures of caves and stalactites, stalagmites and plenty of other types of rocks and roads. 'What am I supposed to do with all of this?' 'Learn in, remember it, recognise it. You see those small creatures there and there? Avoid them at any cost and keep going and going, don't stop until you've found the cage. The way to it isn't secret, the damn thing is like a giant vault, spreading across the depths like a blunt party box waiting to be open.' This was now the recruiting phase, Champlain presumed. 'Do we really need to do this in the office?' 'Do you prefer the car then?' Within a blink they were driving on the road, feeling nothing of the conscious descent into the water, instead of which he felt the wind. The enveloped files still stood in his lap, half open in front of his eyes. He wanted to get out but the doors were locked. 'It doesn't work that way, you can't just run away from something you dislike and never return. You're still in the water going deeper right now despite what your eyes and senses are telling you.' 'You're not going to kill me then.' 'As long as you follow that plan and go on ahead, I would've done it myself if I still had a body, though I cannot do it anymore, not with what I've got here.' The thought of him being possessed came as a thought, but he was to be let there alone, having to figure out what the cage meant and why he needed to be there. 'Listen, it's not hard to find, but what lays inside it, that's important. We don't exactly know what's on the other side.' 'We?' There were far greater forces than himself in question, yet he didn't dare question this one. Especially after seeing what it was capable of taking. 'How far will we reach then?' Asked Champlain after the awkward pause he had been given by the elongated creature. It refused to tell him more than what he was needed to know. Now he felt walls of stone hit him roughly as he came to something. Ever closer as they were arriving, something was about to come down and take him to the very decrepit of humanity. The last places humans would go and last, the kingdom of the darkest ravines. Of which he saw nothing and felt just as much as he was numbed in thought. 'I won't be helping you from now on, but remember it, the map is now embedded in your mind, just push it through a little and your awareness will be forced into the gift I've given to you.' 'But, what am I supposed to do?' 'Find the cage, Champlain and open it, only that way.' There was an interruption as he was pushed away from it. The fall from grace was just as expected, pushed through the veil in which he fell, he was welcomed inside the ravine, pushed through, and thrown rightly upside. Champlain hadn't had the chance to see the body of what creature had possessed him, but as he regained consciousness, he felt sick and shallow, afraid to move. For some time, he stood, with shaking eyelids at the pool which stood near the marble floor in the depths. He recognised something of where he was, but the way or how he just appeared there was unknown to him. This wasn't to be the case of amnesia he could be so much more lucky to be given from the heavens. No, this was far from it and far from over, he moved with legs which didn't respond to him, arms got numbed and body became an automaton to his needs. Champlain could only look and shut his mouth, believing this was only a punishment for what he's done, he ran away. 'Please, just give me my legs back, I promise I'll make it up to you. Can you hear me? Give me my damn legs back!' The wail came from the emptied lungs which he just waited to unleash. Afraid of the horror, this was now a broken man, walking with a tainted program which was forced upon his mind, failing to see right from wrong. Stepping of sharp rocks left just painful bumps all over his feet, of which he couldn't even push away if he wanted or needed to. This was it, so he thought, it was hell, forced from Paradise at the depths of the burning Tartarus. The Bloody blue of cave turned into hot shimmering red, everywhere around, the veins, long as they were spread around the body of rock. Hot lava, shimmering magma was just hot enough to make him want to faint. Though something has changed now, both is his physiology and psychology, which made it easier to endure the pain and the mental strain. Soon, he was going to become mindless, that was more than certain. And the creature which kidnapped him, which revealed itself not to be who he knew still had a tainted string about it. One which came dip and sealed the wounds. It was unholy what else laid in the memory of the man, everything written and converted into the pristine substance made out of its melted bone. All of which Argus managed to see at the moment of despair was a glimpse of the creature at its depths. How it suddenly came, with a large shadow spread across the entire ravine. Out of all of them which he experienced, Champlain held the most painful encounter with it. It wasn't even something sudden as it knelt and waited as if it knew that he wasn't in control of his own action while heading directly into the den. And even more, into the mouth of the scale, bodied, the creature of depths sealed the deal. With a small leap, it revealed its piercing eyes and giant jaw, the primaeval thing of nightmares which would and could only be bringing in attention the front appendages of a spider. The forms which lay in its mouth were bizarre, tusk, teeth and other deformations were twisted everywhere inside, from one row to another. Some were long and pushed forward, others had belonged to a human. This thought shimmered for a second, that he saw in suddenly come down and rip out his arm from the forearm below. It ripped it out with an immediate efficiency which proved the pain which Champlain had to endure. Despite being numbed, he felt the entire thing shove it down with each moving teeth as it retreated from the cry. 'Aghhhh.' Is what was left after a series of dark cries and tears which tainted his cheek. The agent which was in its teeth stopped the bleeding and now what he looked at, the only one of the arms he could finally move was the stumped meat-like end. All, while that thing retreated back to its den to feast of what it had gotten, having no other need for, than what it was given to it. Pushed to the limit, he continued to walk, remembering only hours of silence, hours where couldn't fall asleep despite how much he wanted. No scream, as even his mouth came out of his control. Whatever either of them injected inside his body, this was to be his tomb and to top it all, he didn't even know why. We were. We were looking for a girl, Champlain thought. And though his mind was now numbed, the body still moved on its own as an abominable, merging thing, all the way throughout a hidden paradise of nature and finally to the cage. As broken as he was, the man took the bridge and came to the other side. Inside, as broken as he was, he failed to resist and in the end, he was pulled inside and knelt. Though there was something more to it. Something even more deceitful, which Argus had glimpsed at, once he got, these memories from the man, at least the ones which were important. The man, Champlain, wasn't looking for the cage, but he was a gift, the gift of merging skin, which came from above. That thing which took advantage of him, gave him forth to the parasite most likely. For, the most important thing to note is the fact that Champlain died at least two hundred years ago, to say the least. And now, it was that in his final moments, he wasn't even himself anymore, stripped and pushed away from everything he had ever been. He chose to be an agent and an enemy, though wanted nothing more than to help. His memories, finally written in bones, got released and everything that he had ever been ended then and there. The juices and the engines from the bones were just enough to feed Argus in the tainted sea he swam. The man wasn't alone though, there were other bones which laid inside, and other constructs of meat which were created to show me what happened. Where Champlain was forced, Esther came on her own accord into the depths. She lived with only her daughter in a tower full of books from left to right, to everywhere around, bricks became nothing but placeholders to hold in them even more. They were fiction, fantasy and at the cellar of the tower laid the smallest compartment of horror which crept even the thought of the small girl, Eve. It was a sick day for the small child, with the raining season has started a long time ago, the sun was scarce outside as it was. On a small hill, just barely outside the town, they lived alone, despite the fact that travellers would often come around and pass the tower all the time, they marvelled even more. There laid another thing which caught the attraction, the desolate tower which laid in front of it. The second one, which crept with decayed stone and pushed out sea weed which found its way between the wallings and between the cosy spaces. 'Don't look at it, you know the necromancer's just waiting to take your soul.' A smile was always caught on her face as she looked away. The tower itself was desolate, opposite of theirs, which was full of light, brightly pushing out candle lights and plenty of domed windows which used to belong to long and tall ships. But then again, they were repurposed as they weren't needed anymore. It was a cosy life, and easy one, to say the least, no one bothered them and in exchange, they didn't either. Even more than that, no one even whispered or see it as a peculiar thing, for a widow to live in a tower all alone, going outside, only at the time where resources were needed, and not a whisper, not a sound. Not a single ill thing said about any of them. Esther enjoyed her life and the cold lamp which bore light over her shoulder. Reading her favourite book. A third time. Looking over her shoulder at her daughter who barely even scratched the tip of all which laid there to read. It'd take some proper years for her to read as much as she needed. 'Mum, are you okay?' 'I'm fine sweetie, go back to your books.' She had been beaming at her daughter for a while, with or without her knowledge. It was a peculiar thought, to be in a tower to large, everything place in an alphabetical order. The funds were still plenty to last her a lifetime and grant her daughter a future, yet something still plagued her mind. The name of all the authors was there, going in a spiral, and she could read all the names in her mind as they were. Rodderick von Carr, from one side to the old respected Giorgiono S. Leone and even the esteemed obscure which was quite a bother to find, Gorr. Yet, everything in there was something she had read a long long time ago, and now, there seemed to be an impasse between her and knowledge. Looking around at the top and every single side which dragged itself from there, she tried to make mental notes of every writer, of their works, and what type of books they did. Autobiographies, checked. And another spiral went away. Strange fiction checked. One down the next one appeared to go even slower than the last one. Fantasy, then fiction, and romance, drama, all of which were done at one point in her life. Some twice or double that amount, though it was only now that she realised that she had read all. She wasn't going to admit to her daughter, who was ever curious, but even at the bottom of the cellar, she had read all the horror stories and books which ever had been written. At least those that were available for her to get. It was something that bothered her as she made lap after lap on the wooden floor. They were tall and plenty of space for them to go around, their sleeping beds, the curtains, the rugs and. While going, she reminded herself of the tower. 'Someone lived inside of it, hasn't it.' 'Uh-huh.' Both Eve and she stood near the window and looked ahead at the decay of stone. How it seemed to be an illusion on how the tower flailed against the strong wind and the falling tears from the sky. No thunder though, that was something which never crept near or even dared approach. 'From what I remember, that used to be used for military purposes, if I'm not wrong. They might have something from the time of war, a journal or.' 'Another piece to the collection?' 'Marvellous Eve, I'm fairly glad we're on the same page. 'It was enough to give her young foliage a chuckle, though there was something even worse than what could lay in the tower. The sickness which made her was more, the sadness and desperation of having to be forced on the mundane once her once seemingly supply of knowledge ended. She was denied and now. 'Sleep Eve, I will be back soon.' Now she placed her on the bed and closed the window, just when the silence finally crept in for a strike, Esther came outside and laid ready to face him. 'The Necromancer!' And as her voice made contact with the world, it was the first thunder, a shuddering blow of power, a lightning strike at the top of the desolate building. It wouldn't be enough to make a lower one cover, and for a moment there it seemed like she was ready to do so. But in her mind, the necromancer was laughing at her and her indecision to go forth with what she wanted to do. The door could open, and after it, there's be a paradise, most likely, with something that no one in hundreds of years could've ever read. Esther went nonetheless on the empty roads, seeing only one or two figures in the distance leaving a trail of smoke which started rising into the sky. It wasn't like she was bothered but aware of it. None of her business, she thought, just as well as it wasn't theirs to look back. With ease, she broke into the tower and went into the other side, closing the door almost as if it was the other end of a vault. There, she looked around, the dampness was obvious, water was dripping inside with much of the ease she had seen before. Drop, drop, drop, was the song of water. She asked. 'Is anyone here? Anyone at all?' There could've been a vagrant hiding from the rain, but that should've cleared it. Never before had she been inside, so this was quite the begging for Esther. Especially after she opened her robe and brought up a lamp, which she reluctantly lit. The first impression was almost a shock as she revealed herself to be in front of an artillery long cylinder with was pointed directly at her. The rounded slug, armoured with its legs stuck in the mud hadn't worked for the longest while. Curiosity hit in motion as she started checking it out. With the slam of the door open then closed, her heart was almost forced into decay. She turned to look who had entered, pointing her lantern at none other. 'Eve, you almost gave me a heart attack, why have you come in here?' 'I couldn't sleep mum and I wanted to see the necromancer just like you. Is that his minion?' The child was already past her mother and started trying to sniff and touch the various bony limbs it had. Once in the past, there used to be a layer of white paint covering everything, though now, what the rust has taken away, the paint being too old, this is what was left of it. 'Just don't climb on in, especially that tube, understood honey? And don't move far away from me or out of sight. Nothing in your pockets, unless I approve of it. Don't even blink at something unless you ask me first. Eve, I'm serious here, this could be more than dangerous and I'm in no mood of carrying you to the doctor if something happens.' The child was just as curious as she only waited for the word, smiling as she sat with both of her hands at her back. Her charming red hair and promise left a demeanour to the child, that the mother hadn't seen before. 'Fine, you may go.' Her eyes widened, though she remained in the range of the light. A giant ball of high ended orange and a yellow came from under her, revealing the area as much as the base of the tower was. Indeed, it was old, as the years hadn't taken away from it as they took from its skin outside. They spared some of the stone and foundation, though this, the giant war mongering thing almost blocked the stairs. And they already seemed more than sturdy and bizarrely unsafe to go on. 'Hold my hand, we're going up.' 'Yes, Mum. Are we going to see the necromancer?' 'Just you wait Eve.' Within on hand, the lamp, within the other was the lamp. It was dangerous already as the staircase started leaving a shark creek with each step she made. The fear of having to fall or even worse, her child made her stare uncomfortably long at her feet. 'Look out.' Said Eve, as her mother was too busy with it and hadn't looked at the trapdoor which laid just slightly above. It wouldn't have made her lost balance, but left a dire mark on her head unless it was for Eve to warn her in time. 'Hold this for a moment.' The lamp was withing good hands now. She looked at her hero how she was ready to strike at the door and throw the Necromancer out of his hiding. At once, just as her mother was still at it, Eve started encouraging the woman. 'You can do it! Slay the necromancer, bring him out of his hiding.' The tip just started falling away, and it happened fast that it was just open. Though the stairs ended and she would need to climb a few centimetres due to the old design and the fact that the trap door resembled more like the top of a tank. 'You go first with the lamp and wait there.' Esther had her arms coiled around as she pushed her further her above. Something other happened, once the light was far behind and could barely be seen. Mid-way through climbing, Eve backed away and with her came the light. There was another slam of the door below, audible through the echo. The door was closely shut down, she thought. And by her instincts, she came above and close the trapdoor behind, looking for something to block it while they remained there. 'Shh, there's somewhere below.' That's at least what was said by the sign language. Eve knew most of the signs and most of the slick twist of hands her mother had shown her in past. So, it was easy for her to understand. The child backed away and with a couple of heavy boxes, she blocked their only way out. Now they were both blocked, and even worse, Eve was getting sleepier by the second. Dropping eyes, slight coughing, and the need to cuddle with her mother now couldn't force Esther not to be aware of the presence of another intruder. 'We just need to share the tower, for now, Eve, it seems like the necromancer just came back home.' The girl nodded, with a drowsy look on her face. Despite the fact that she appeared that she was only half listening, her mother was thinking of a plan for escape. The roof was still being pushed by the rain, at least the sound of each drop was slightly more comforting and calm than it should've been. Such a mere fact pleased the child, though Esther came here for a reason and a reason alone. Henceforth, alone, she looked through shelves and in the shelter, at corners and in the various beds which laid around unmade for what seemed to be years. Below, came the morning star of holy glory, which she had found under the light. There laid a book under one of the beds, covered in dust, as it was more than a fair trade, she couldn't have asked for more. Immediately, with a slap, she opened to found it to be a journal, with quite the decent handwriting for a murderer. With the slight exceptions of the occasional ink smeared, the journal was in find conditions. From her robe, she took the bag and placed what she found in it and resumed her search. After all, where was one, there should be plenty more. One last thing she had to be sure of, taking the lamp even further and throwing a sheet away, under all the dust, the bed seemed to be clean and still properly laid, even after all these years. The child's face looked like one of an angel, or a perfectly chiselled face of one after being placed in the bed, which did more than pleasantly delighted her. Now came the rest of the search before having to deal with any nuisance. And there was still a lot of space and. The sight of it almost made her tremble, there laid another level just above of them. She hadn't expected them to be twins, in that regard, though she couldn't go there and leave her child to sleep, especially with someone down there just roaming. 'I need to cover the door even more.' Something heavy and hard, there must be something here to cover all my needs until I check the level above. It was fairly lit yet dark, and right about a certain moment, the bed seemed more than a fair deal for this task ahead. She pushed, pulled then stop after the first shriek of metal which came from under the bed. This will bring too much, unwanted attention before us. They could be hunters or something worse, vagrant, thieves, just roaming below. Or just someone searching for the same thing as I. 'No, Even, you don't deserve this to happen to you.' A smaller shelf should do the trick, and it was even easier to lift and push around, as it came to the top and flattened the various boxes which once laid on the trap door. Apparently, there had been only decorations in them and only one or two round globes were prone to crack and spread across the floor, which ended up not happening. This should've done it. Esther thought it now as justified to leave Eve, now that she was safe. 'Just one more book and I'll return, I promise.' Eve was left with a kiss, though she was sound asleep by doing so, this staircase is much more silent than the previous encounter, it made it even easier to be inconspicuous. There wasn't any trapdoor and going above wasn't as hard. She had finally arrived in the Private Quarters of the necromancer, where evil and dampness laid around. Everywhere in sight laid tools of destruction, sharp and pointy, weapons which hadn't any projectiles accompanying them, and plenty of boxes with ammunition. It was clear why no one dared come inside, or perhaps none even knew what laid, but to leave such a mass of weapons in sight was madness, to say the least. There wasn't anything that could satisfy her curiosity, until her eye glimpsed, through the small hills of sharp pointed needles, she saw a single catalogue. It wasn't much but readable, it had documented in it every single weapon in the tower? 'This used to be a warehouse, so much more than a tower. But what used to be mine?' There was a dirty window which laid just washed on the other side. Yet muddy from the inside, it blocked the sight. Something seemed to be happening outside, having plenty of people standing just down at the bottom where the edges of the rounded window were clean. Her glimpse turned dark at once when she cleaned with a part of her dress. Esther's heart skipped a beat and her breath couldn't be swallowed. At the sight, she rushed through the stairs and woke Eve up, which, promptly, she took in her arms and kicked the shelf about. It wasn't as heavy as she thought, though then again, nor were the boxes which were crushed. She hadn't any care anymore for whoever laid at the bottom, but when arrived and face with what laid on the other side, with a half awake daughter, she shrilled. Her skin turned pale one the door came open, and the fire with its embers and ashen sight became clear. Stuck in this phase, Esther came to her knees and started crying at the doorstep, in front of everyone present who looked just as surprised and in horror. As her only house burned from inside, with everything she had ever read and ever had. The cold weather and the rain couldn't match this unholy fire, at the point where people suspected that there was some alchemical concoction thrown inside. Red cinders came through the rock and the point where it seemed as if the entire tower was about to fall. Its stone was crumbling in front of their eyes. And there was only a dark curiosity, a grim sight in her mind of what lay on the other side, the ashes now fully and entirely disintegrated. It brought shame alone, just as she thought of it and hid away from the sight of men. With a slam, she knocked the door and fell with her back turned against it. Eve was too tired to even stay awake anymore and she stood there alone, blinking before falling asleep. We've got no home and my entire life got destroyed. And as she thought the bitter thought of how life had betrayed her, the shallow voices of those outside suddenly felt numb, and they would become and remained so if it weren't for the sudden call. 'Do you not wish for more?' Asked a voice and for a moment, her immediate thought forced her to look through the dark and search for the other intruder she has previously seen before. Though now, it was too peculiar to look around, she had failed to see anything move into the dark. 'Who's there? What do you want? Can't you see we're both suffering right here? Our house burnt down with everything we've had.' The temptation was clear and easy, as opposed to all others who have heard the voice and thought to struggle. It came too fast and at a point where she was at her lowest, cold and afraid. The voice came with a promise. 'What if I could tell you that you could own every single book you could ever set your hand upon? You could be in the library of gods and have everything you ever wanted at the reach of your fingertips and more.' 'Who's there? It's not funny and I'm. I'm starting to lose by tempter.' 'But what is that? Would you refuse all these?' Her daughter seemed to almost have vanished like fragments of dust under her, thrown like a carpet as the dampness became what seemed to be a giant maze, rounded like a globe. Shining in front of her was a strong light which came into effect and made the golden pages of the books appear even greater in comparison. Greater than an illusion, she couldn't believe her eyes, knees trembling, heart pounding, after touching the first book and looking above. Directly above, there were more levels to the labyrinthine, just mirroring, then moving in sequences, floating in the air, were shelves with even more plentiful. It was a paradise of knowledge at her fingertips and this could only mean. 'I died, haven't I? I died in that fire and this is my, this is my prize, my heaven for how I lived my life. Thank you, thank you, thank you, thank you.' So on and so forth, her heart sank at the sight of the small black puddles she stepped in the dark matter from which even the simplest book in her hand became, an amalgamation of sticky and hard substances that were found just around the room. The dark matter under the machine remained, just as the vision perished ahead. Esther was forced again to look back, past the door was the burning house, still going on most likely even now, in her darkest hour. It was indeed that she asked. 'Is it a dream?' 'It is yours in exchange for something I much need.' 'Anything, I'll give you anything to get there, I and my daughter could live the rest of our days. She never even dreamed, she couldn't have, about a place like that.' 'Then free me.' The amalgamation of voices, present as it spoke, gave a strange sensation about her head, a concoction that directly affected the nerves inside her head. Her mind was now just a piece of a tool, played like she ever wanted. 'How?' She asked, and repeated just the mistake Argus recognized as written in her memories. Though their stories were much more different, there wasn't much of a doubt who started the fire. But why her in particular, it made no sense. A common woman who's done nothing but spend her entire life reading, and now, it was revealed that she lived just next to another entrance to the raving. One drove there, one was forced. The two of them just went through, Eve asleep and in the arms of her mother, down the steps that opened from the side. It was more than clear now, as the machine was too large to have been brought through the door, it must've been taken from below and given away. Yet, it didn't ask for her to drive it. And much of the voice was concealed to whispers that could be partially heard. At least, in her case, the memory was written in both of their bones instead of one single page in the chapter of their lives. It was so easy to think of anything they could've done to get away, though now. Well, Eve was lucky to be standing alone in her arms sleeping, with the only way leading outside closed. Left in the gloom, soon they came to the old tunnels used for war, and even more obvious was the fact that plenty more abandoned machines soon came to be. Clean walls were at the start, but soon the dampness and the slight spill from below, of a substance which was unknown fell flat on the walls and dried there. Its stench was insupportable even to her, who hadn't had a smell in years. The stench awakened and made her go even faster to avoid the sight and smell it bore. And through the ruined tunnel she went, until she finally came, with slowed steps, to the sight, or at least what used to be a sight, of the war of the depths. What now laid in front of her remained the last remnants of what used to be, the greatest war the world had ever seen. Perhaps the last great one they will never know about, hidden in the best spot they could've thought about, almost in plain sight. Those dark blue hills used to be green, but now she was forced to go through them and not to face the grim machinery and the skeletons, the remnants of the people who used to fight. Even now, in one or two, the cockpits remain open and pushed forth, just carelessly sitting, blocked and unable to move from the spot. One, in particular, grabbed her attention as she looked at him. The army uniform he was wearing, or he used to wear in the past, still remained as clean despite the fact that the body inside of it just plainly decayed a long time ago. The field was filled with plenty more, which did more than cause nausea and despair. This was no sight of a mother and now she could barely hold herself, behind what could only be the tallest of the bunch, at least the tallest she had seen so far. A rounded piercing axe-like blade with had to poles attached at both ends, pulling up, pushing down, going into a motion at unearthly speeds. "Those madmen. They, they need to know." "No." Came an echo from the depths. Esther still had her child to think about and wanted to head back, chances were that it wasn't as worth as her life. Yet, with each whisper, it became more appealing. 'I cannot go through that, I never asked to see what happened below, please don't force me to do it.' "You will go on." The feeling was complicated, at least something about it was. It gave her and somehow took away some of the anxiety and fear, leaving him less poised to run away. 'Turn around and find it now.' So did Esther turn and this time, upon looking again on the fields, she felt nothing anymore. Other than her humanity not being where it should've been, not even compassion came into being on the dead. Some of which still laid around rotting. But not the apparatus, they were tormenters on wheels, stuck in the unholy of the battle positions. Blades pierces through, artillery in the furthest corners of her eyes. The two arms became numb as she stood there sleeping, luckily. 'Eve, I promise that you won't have to experience any of it during your lifetime.' There was little hope, even in her small words. For the sight alone was enough to banish every redeemable aspect of humanity. They were living over their bones and jagged fiendish metal toys. Rains of fire scorched the land, now this used to be a forest, those used to be housed where people used to live, and a river which went dry. Something was rough with the incineration as clear parts were either entirely abandoned or pushed forth in spaces unknown. It spread and ate the metal along everything flammable in sight, pushing itself even more forth. Blackwood below laid and black everywhere where the painted blue didn't lay. Some of it dripped because of the heat and fell below, leaving interesting patterns on the ground. The sight though, of the grotesque was still to be had, as this lane would still take a long while to accomplish on the foot alone. Her shoes were only slightly cold and wet, but there was no one around to see, other than the dead. Impaled, pushed, smashed, it became even more desperate than that. Small cabins with long metal limbs were pushed below smashed by giant boulders she had seen. It was a curious thing, to have artillery at hand and to resort to such a desperate attempt to take your enemy. There was one which still seemed to have retained its structural integrity, though chances were it couldn't work. After all, it was ancient, or so she believed. 'That's what they said in the history books, haven't they.' Though some bodies lying on the ground or over the giant metallic bulbs seemed to suggest otherwise. The lion's den soon became appealing as she lifted the cockpit door with one hand. Surprisingly it was still working, as she immediately went in and started going over the controls. A marvelous small thing on the outside, rounded with a top of the glass, which at the moment had no stain, no crack, not from the pressure nor from time. If one were to compare, this seemed to be new, left there as a gift, along with all the relics and all the spare metal in this endless cemetery of dark large masses and figures in the dark. Long poles were still pointing at her in the distance, and for a moment, the anxiety came again. They weren't poles, despite being as long as they were, their real intent was much dark. Something rounded laid to them, though Esther couldn't point out what, at least not until compared with the leviathan-like axe-wielding destroyer in terms of height. The large, apparently cylinders were actually large artillery pushing weapons, meant to shoot above it, hence the tallest of heights. Though the question still remains, which still baffled many, why is that it was fought inside the depths? Even those pieces of artillery were placed awkwardly against the wall. Not only that it didn't make any sense for them to be crammed like that, but. One thing and one thing only seemed to have distracted Esther from her line of thoughts, the sight of a singing universal key, just hanging in the hand of a dead man, just across the road. She needed it with a desperate look, as this machine seemed to be in the best condition, lacking just one small thing it needs to start. 'Eve, just wait here. I know you can't hear me. Just in case, I'll be back as soon as possible.' The hairs on her feet started shivering just after leaving her on the seat. The little spine almost came down as she was left on the seat and the door closed. No one in sight to get her, yet, there was still a strong grim and piercing feeling which prevented her from leaving the door open. The dust was visible, looming in the empty spaces, or by the side. Such tall machines shouldn't be still working, and the fear of information leaking outside. People could find out about them and use them again, left her feeling uncomfortable. It wasn't the fact that she was affected by that unknown tone which brought her her, but the promise was still enough to make her keep going and driving on. The bone just froze and numbed under touch, the way she managed to shift her hand into the pocket, how she looked at the skull just fall with the helmet still one. Down, below one of the rings of the spine. There was the on-going process of rot, which made her look away from the various colours and variations of broken, still breaking parts. A process which would've taken more than aid from something which was creeping there. A type of special infection that was only met there, where it was cold, where enough space for it to grow was a need. Not to mention the cold temperature which was much lower than what laid outside on the coldest day. And dampness, which only now, she noticed was present. Sweat ran down the key, despite the soldier being dead more than fairly a long age before. Yet, something made its house inside his neck and started the process of growth without his awareness. 'Enough, I need to go.' Esther realised just how soothing her voice was when she was speaking it louder, out of all, it was the only thing which banished those inner poisoned deviations of her own. This was all she needed and in there. With all the growing and small fuzzy floating balls, the place started leaving something grim about her. A nervous set of coughs came, as she realised, after all, it was the air. 'How could I have been so dumb?' Her knees were even number than the dead as she rushed to her child and started checking her breathe, knocking the door closed as hard as she could but only to block the only entrance. Or at least to attempt to delay the coming of the air and whatever laid in it. She checked it once, then again, it wasn't slowed, it wasn't forced, there was nothing that could be pointed as being wrong, at least not by her or anyone else who laid around. For the time being, to say the least. The key came in and made contact, being as it was, she was lucky to find it in the first place. Another forceful shiver to the right, made the engine made a harsh sound, which was followed by yet one more tone. The sounds were played on intervals, with each turn to the left and right trigger another sound. 'How does this even work?' In truth, this made her daughter frown, to be disturbed by the harsh sounds which were already heard by her. But not even Esther could even have thought of it to be locked by a maze of sounds, a lock that's even more complicated than a binding of numbers and keys. This was all sounds, as undoubtedly, every little and talks machine worked the same way. Echoes ran and bounced against walls and against the metal cases which protected the others. Ding, ding than a stop, so did Esther try to solve the lock. Left, left, left, the key could go forever in a direction as long as the loud sounding ding was there to signal that. It was a machine, undoubtedly, working with the rhythm of its own song. A sharp note came after a sudden right, taken only as a gamble, it triggered both lights, which still worked to pop out and light the way fully ahead. It was almost as if they were in the middle of a grim storm in the depths then, as it was revealed just how much dust, how much fungus had grown. And even worse, how much of it was the poison which wanted to come in their lungs and bring them pain. Relentless to say the least, Eve had been turned on the side and fell asleep again with a hand on her ear, covering away. 'I'm terribly sorry Eve, but we're almost done.' It was impossible to decipher or to think just how could such a device be so complicated despite being just two turns. Which prompted her to turn both left and right, and fall into a repeating motion of the two commands. The result was nothing to think of, the song was distorted, sounded louder and its long strings now appeared as if they were voices. Grim, dark voices, screaming like the damned in a fire, from the violent turns from the wheel, which pushed them forth. It made her stop and take her hand, as the key was twisted without her own power in the original position. This was the punishment for rigging the system. Or even, more, hers was the paranoia of watching the little creeps be humbled before the light, doubting that both she and her daughter were alone there. It was a marvel, to hear the notes go again, a twist to the light made her listen to a fraction of the song before deciding to go at it again. There were harps, flutes and at least two or three different drums which played in-between intervals. When finally she thought it to be the best chance, she twisted the key and heard a sharp bell ring. Steam came from each side and it appeared like it was stuck under the metal feet. Also, water was also released from the same four spots, despite the unfortunate fact that it was too hot to drink. The combination could've been on in a million now, as the next set of sounds were separated by a long and sharp drum. The beat was composed of many singing drums, of metal being sharpened against something hard. It was hard to listen at first, as it was, after all, something completely new and unheard of, most likely belonging and found only there. The metallic crickets followed and then hard strings came to motion, making it sound like a complicated machinery being smacked around. Such a melody confused Esther despite deciding to play along. Mostly because it made too much noise there, for something so small. Each twist of the key now reflected the sound of a drum. Each was the equivalent and adjacent twist in one direction, that made a set of different sounding drum beats. 'It's impossible.' There came the sudden protest against her own conundrum. It could take way too much for her to make any progress at all in a situation like this one, especially since she hadn't the time. Some intervention was needed unless she'd wait until both of them got sick because of what disease crept along the depths. A thump came and silenced the music, forcing the key into a motion of an endless twist, increasing in speed until it finally retreated inward in a space made of it. From left to right, two trap doors suddenly covered the key spot. The cockpit lit inside, though promptly darkened with a flip of the obvious light switch. Regardless of how much time has passed and how long it was from that age, they still used mainly the same switches and button met in the common household. Two handles laid from left and right, which were promptly used. One was driving forth especially and the other handle turned aside, leaving just enough space for her hand to push and pull, making the machine head left and right. It was easy enough for even an infant to figure it out. Roaming with the machine through the depths gave Esther a sense of excitement, feeling as if she was there, part of the war of the machines, a fighter, a soldier a hunter of the ravine. Hunting for the enemy and striking in the dark, despite the lights having revealed much. Now came the frigate, the giant ship which once roamed through the dark sand which remained there. She wanted to wake Eve and show her just how amazing the scenery was, but this was too much to ask of her. The child had seen enough, so did she think. And this was no place for one like her after all, despite the on looking frigate. This is amazing Even though wish you could see what I'm seeing right now.' It was indeed the unearthly sight, cut through the colossal sized ship laid a giant hole which was to , pushed through, smashed and crushed. The pain was redundant now, despite the fact that it had once hosted, possibly more than a hundred people, a thousand many. Even more than that, the many levels it had, most likely hosted a lot more resources than one could possibly need. A cargo area, the bottom, the boxes filled with their secret ammunition and the matter of the fact remained that Esther hadn't even entered through it as of yet. She had seen most of it from the distance. Though the sight of anger was soon to come as it became the encased tomb of more than a thousand deaths, skeletons, preserved. Some black spots were visible and not even ashes remained in the various spots where they had taken their last battle. One could spend months only trying to figure out what were the last things going through their minds before they died and still find new imaginative ways to make things up. Excruciating pain, fear, sorrow, the fact that none of them ever reached their families and wives, even worse than that. The fact that none survived was soul-crushing, to say the least, but this was the war. Now the feet finally entered that territory of the ship and looked rightly above. It was a sight to behold now that they were inside and a sight of wonder. How did they break through, especially if it was a reinforced floor of metal bricks, and stretched metal nails pulling from each side? Even the thought of a more damned machine could make her shiver, especially in her small little rounded box. It was getting hard to breathe, to say the least, especially then and under those circumstances. 'Damned thing.' It was a sudden leap which made her almost jump in her chair, the sight of a black cat, then and there. Somehow, it must've followed me from above and cut the chase somehow. No risk is taken though, especially when it came to a black cat, hence it was ignored and they continued through the wreck. Rats were laying there too, a bit larger than normal, but those rodents were as obvious as the great destruction. They were eating out of the boxes, cotton and other small, various small balls of something which fell from a chewed box. Nothing remained untainted, though now there was the cat. At first sight, she expected it to go just as it went in every other incident involving a rodent and a cat. Yet with a true, as the light shuns on the confrontation, it came as differently as it went. One bigger rat with sharp, broken pair of teeth suddenly went ahead and decided to leap against the sharp nailed black haired thing. In a confrontation that lasted seconds, those teeth got the best of the small cat, biting roughly through the chest and dealing a deadly, vicious blow, leaving it fall onto the ground, for an even nice feast. The meat was fresh, and suddenly the small vehicle came in making every single one of the rats run away. The dust pierced and floated in the air for a sudden series of adjacent seconds. The paleness of the fragments reflected in the light and their slow fall made it appear as if they were nowhere else but feet under the sea. Now, the rats were hiding whenever and wherever they could, but for the small cat, it was too late. It remained at its last breathe, killed with an almost quickness but left to suffer. Luckily for the small thing, Even was still sleeping. The smash came with a quick suddenness, and the harsh iron came down with a shallow speed. Esther had to return to her search now, she thought herself, they were to leave this place of torture and death and rejoin the rightful and so prized location. Though the ship was still ahead and would be for the longest time. The two bulbs of her daughter at once got woken up as if by a small lighter. It was just enough for her to look around and cough before going back to her. 'You'll be sleeping like a log soon enough

Even. Shh. The lullaby soon started to take a strange effect just as the notes came out of her. Half asleep, it did hit the spot there, and possibly, it could last just enough. For the distraction. A sudden crate fell from above, and just in time both her hands twisted to turn away and avoid being smashed. The small amphibian-like case of metal twisted just in time to avoid it. Even more than that, she hadn't stopped backing away until it was safe. Esther noticed that there was a bounce, just as it hit it, before going in and pushing with the help of the heaviness. The box hadn't been broken despite the fall, and it was soon obvious from where it came. As two pale light shone overhead, at the tallest of the levels, she noticed at the edge small dark figures, with rounded reflective eyes. Their fur was obviously dark and their number was still high, but so many of them looked from one corner to another that it was unreal. One sudden movement and they could all come down if they weren't getting ready for another strike as she thought of it. With a sudden sidestep, she came out of their sight, standing no under them, but on the other side. She had a veil of dampness over her, which didn't bring much to her sense of protection nor did it hide her. What it made clear was the fact that they could leap such long distances. Above her eyes, and overhead, she could see them leap from one side to the other, striking at the air as they almost flew on the side she was one. Undoubtedly they were getting ready for another attack, at the point where one could even think or say that they were acting with intelligence. It was an oversight to say the least, that they were not considered enemies earlier than that, yet this was the time for her to run. Pushing forward and quite harshly on the levers, she tried to force the machine to head towards the end of the ship as fast as possible. This was no longer belonging to humans, but to those black grim rodents in the sky. Creeping some, suddenly leapt and bounces away from the rounded screen. The sudden attack made her shudder, as much as her flight was imbued and removed, she still felt some of it. Her awareness went bizarrely insane, looking around every corner for any possible entrance one of those disgusting things could enter and infect her. At least some diseases gotten from the ravine must've been had. What Esther hadn't expected was the fact that it was a mere distraction to the fact that they all took tactical positions. Each level of the ship was filled with rats, some of them standing and waiting while other were eating out of bones. Human bones, animal bones, even that of an elephant. The thought alone, having brought an elephant to this war was grim and peculiar, especially since it wouldn't have stood a chance. And at once, bones started falling from each side, making it a rain, spine ends, skulls, pelvises, and others that were too vulgar to be described, twisted remains that didn't belong to anything recognisable if not by a professional in the matter. What made it into a sight to behold was the fact that, upon looking at them, she noticed that they were cleaned, down to the very bone. No skin, no meat, nothing rotten, but the clean examples you'd get to see the museum of a madman who became obsessed with furnishing his prideful possession. It would be over soon enough, once she escaped, though it appeared less and less for it to be the case. Esther stopped and suddenly pushed a button. It was round, and obvious with its effect, though she was hidden in the dark now. There was no way of telling just how well they could see in the dark, having spent multiple generations by the looks of it, but with every second passed, the dark sounds came into being. Twisted and pushed, small bites and movement above her. None on the ground so far, despite that one little rat having dropped. The bones were being swallowed as she waited, yet she could obviously see that for her cabin, that wasn't the case, at least not by the side. One rat did disappear after all, with a sudden shriek which left a creeping sensation. They were planning something there. Undoubtedly, those harsh sounds were the many more boxes and other heavy apparatus they were moving around in an attempt to crush it. The machine still left a sound as the engine went one but now, with a small shudder, it went resting. Now they waited. Not even them, despite how smart they had appeared to be could f a living human. They must've been deployed as curators and cleaners of the dead, caretakers who's sole job and the only task was to do this one thing. Though she hadn't expected to see the body of the cat still standing there, half of it still in the dark, with only the bit which had the tail being in the dark. The sight of it being pulled made Esther shiver at the fact alone. Some have already reached the other side, creeping along, eating by the likes of a feast. Others were still looming above and making sure she was going to be taken away at first strike. Esther hadn't waited now, mostly because of the child. At once, striking both sides of the crane like levers, the engine started and under the light, she saw the giant amalgamation on the other side is revealed. The rats had been grouping and hiding inside the cat's skin and other various war trinkets and bones. Such as those that weren't pulled inside the ground were ready to strike. What happened next was to deny their instincts and turn around, the exit was just around despite those little vermins' attempts to strike at it. Many started falling from both sides, small rats, big ones. And even those which weren't even looking like rats at all, being too bigs, their tails too twisted, having sharp on-going and overgrown nails to scratch. Despite that, it was still useless against the case of metal with which she went through, having to care none at all about the ones that bounce against it or tried getting in. Fear of the worst came, seeing how they weren't aiming to crack the thick screen, but to spread around and pull at the leg, holding in for the rest of the swarm to slow it down. For a while it had worked, being an annoyance and making the way for the others, more armoured ones to come, they forced Esther's hand. At once she yelled. 'Enough.' Without a doubt, none heard the muffled sound coming from the soundproof box, but her expression left room for interpretation. It was the combined manoeuvring and push of a button which revealed a hidden function at once. The small amphibian of metal suddenly pushed lower through the joints as it stood still and suddenly it leapt to the other side, where the light of the stone came and where the crack had been. A sudden impact at that too managed to push all rats which had climbed who squirmed and lashed with their backs turned, being pulled below in what was nothing more than an accumulation of golden dust. The metal wasn't being pulled in, nor slowed, despite the others being reluctant to come. One or two heavier ones seemed to have come, riding eight or more rats who were hiding inside a rib cage taken away from the back. From the hole, inside, the many rats who had been placed so they could move their small feet between each rib left a grim impression, even more than the falling debris pushed by the remaining vermins. Each twist of the light revealed than from the darkness they were still coming toward her. And what was in front was too abruptly placed for her to be able to see. The ship could've been placed at the end of a hill or the edge, making the place for a fall which could've been too heavy and too hard to be taken by her. The return wasn't an option, not now that, she thought. 'I've got nothing to lose.' With that in mind, she went on and pushed to the point, until, stopped by instinct alone, found herself in front of a fall. There had been a crater there for the longest time, in the middle of which was a tall barrel-shaped like a metal concoction of wires, metal plates which were all pushed deeper into the ground. At least it was going down a slope. Despite being as dark behind, some of the rats paused the top and deepest ends, though not the smaller ones coming ahead, trying to get something at last out of her, the last bite. Perhaps, even more, than-then, Esther pushed away. The legs stumbled and all of the sudden, the unexpected happened, the small amphibian fell on its side and started rolling on the side. Esther had her arms sudden come around and hug her daughter, holding her as tightly as she could as soon as she was reminded of having

one. Something had also blocked her image, even though she had been standing on her lap for the latest of time. It was in poor taste to believe it was fine, the pain of being smashed and tossed around everything was harsh and long. At the moment of stopping the forced roll, Esther worked at the sight of blood in one eye. 'Eve, Eve, wake up.' The first sounds were as sharply taken away by her as they would've seemed to be from one gone away from an accident. Blood was still coming from the side of her forehead. The case had been opened for a while. At least Esther was able to crawl away with the child, despite being as hard to breathe out there, it couldn't be worse as being inside that. Pulling her small, thin body was easy but worse. She had stopped breathing for a while, as Esther placed her hand at the top of her nose and mouth and felt nothing. 'Eve, please, I need you to wake up.' She came back again, starting a technique of manually forcing air down her throat. Her nose was pinched and with each deep breath, her mother took, an even deeper one came to the child. 'I'm sorry Eve, I didn't mean to say I've got nothing to lose. I take that back.' Her face was whiter than normal, even by her standards and each attempt proved to be useless in the end. Esther had neglected her now, carrying her small body in her arms. The way ahead was grim and dark and then and there, the sudden barrel-shaped formation of metal opened in a door. Seeing an elevator there, in the ravine was a rarity, to say the least. Someone was quite busy coming, going and planting them all around. Its origin seemed ancient with each approach, despite the metal plates covering it being so recent, as to date, by the time of the war. The pain of living with her like this wasn't worth it anymore though. She was sickened by herself and the reason she even went ahead to do what she wanted to do, a shallow reason and an even shallower end. 'Bring her back, please.' Only a madman would yell all alone in the darkest depths, trying to hear a voice of comfort. Yet a madman she hadn't become yet, the pain of losing Eve broke her and her will. The silence of machines, the eyes that fell behind, even the swarm of rats resumed their quest, going through the desolate place. It was just a few steps ahead, that instead of going through the timed elevator, she avoided it and continued walking. It'd be just a climb to get through such a slope, yet now she was unattended as if it a dream. No promise of what she wanted, not her daughter, of which she checked every passing second. Her pulse. 'Eve, Eve, wake up.' The violent shaking had made the little child's wrists red now. But never before had Esther thought of checking the little being's pulse, low, just enough to survive, but she couldn't be dead if she had a fever. A slight twitch came from time to time despite appearing to be so pale, her condition was worse than thought, but at least she wasn't dead. Her arms came even deeper as she closed around her daughter and held her. Esther didn't need more than an arm to use, as she hadn't had much trouble in lifting both of them just around the edge. The sudden appearance of a small place was almost jousting to her small nerves. It had been flying there once but crashed right in front of the crater. Such wings were chopped and marks of bites were resting just around every edge, dripping with a substance of pink and red. Still moist and with a dark odour. 'Who's there?' Her eyes adjusted to the slightly darker part of the ravine in which she was, the gloom and dampness made it worst, she thought. To be able to look around and sense a presence, a guardian of the side which was more than guarded, it had someone or something which devoured the metal. Steps were in the way, yet they were hidden and stopped once she looked in one direction. The darkness wasn't the problem, but the giant machines under which or behind where something could just hide away despite everything. There were holes dug up below, just in the same form of the crater, and undoubtedly, this wasn't a crater as she thought to be. 'I need to take care of my daughter, who's there?' An unholy crisp sound, of trifling muffled screams, going through a tight space crept among spaces, making it appear as if it was only the voice of the wind. Cold, from something which crept even nearer than whatever hid away. A hole, entrance, on-going source of fright and cold. It was shivering and nerve wrecking, and even worse for Eve. Her temperature was getting worse, and despite being away from being dead, she could fall, as Esther feared it, in an unbreakable slumber. Of which pain, of which might she couldn't disturb more, retreating back into the crater from whatever laid there on the side. It bore through metal and left its sticky mark on in, which still managed to drip for some time. This wasn't anything to go about without knowledge of the place, this was about life and death, and the ancient lift, despite looking as it did remain safer. At least there, a few steps away from it. Who knew what made her look back at that, over the head, at the figure with its twisted figure and three pairs of eyes. Small, but for one which was dominantly bigger, clawed with sharp teeth and covered in the texture of a rat. It stood there the only moment and stared at the woman before retreating back to finish its meal. Forgetting what else she saw, there were other pairs of feet which had been walking there, smaller than whatever that clawed fiend was. Despite the fact that the crater was unmarkable, Esther could swear she saw something there and spoke no word of it. Bashing the door closed, she could feel the fresh air inside the elevator. 'It seems like it goes on its own, right Eve? Eve?' The question went away for some time. Something had interfered with the memory, the bones and their marks and the memory embedded in it was tainted by something which didn't belong there. Argus could see something which was missing a creature that wasn't there before, yet it managed to mark itself in there, just as they went on. Even the sounds of the beating at the door were being replicated in the mind, mark, mark, mark on the bone, translating into the substance which he absorbed. And in return, they became knock, knock, on the other side of the door above, despite being already of some distance forth. There wasn't any way for it to open but to find another path to find the woman. But why? Such ancient walls around, covered in soft foam in which Esther stood. They were wrapped and used for their tainted desire, undoubtedly dug out by the same creep that lurked around with all that time just tied to its claws. A single thought alone was more than enough to leave a peculiar sensation to it. There were bones it carved itself in and the message, and yet. Here it was, nonetheless, with a presence was as felt by her as was by him, the traveller of her deepest corners of her subconscious. It had to stop eventually. Both of them were still alive despite being in poor condition, after all, they had received a part of the gift to come around and go. A clicking sound came. The door opened to a right space, twisted walls from left and right, pushed by something heavier and mightier than one could ever think of. Some were covered with cloth, despite their wooden edges, the floor was more than clean, to the point of being polished. Another gateway like the one Esther had previously used was now creeping there, waiting to be entered. As soon as she stepped outside, to her surprise, something called the elevator back. No doubt about that. Despite being tired, first, the caution came into mind. As she took the first steps first she asked: 'Is anyone here? It's just me and my daughter, we mean no harm.' It was a tight fit of a place, yet the dampness and the small dark corners could hide small creatures, of which no doubt she had to be aware of now. With such shallow rats as she had seen before, there was so much more to expect. It was a short run to the other side, when, at the end, suddenly the entire conundrum on which she was on became tilted to her side. An entire room just came to be forced into a damp position, making it not only awkward to move, but for the traveller and the one who was hunting for her. 'Shh, shh, shh, hold on Eve.' As low as they were, there needed at least a slightly lighter jump for her to reach the button. Nonetheless, now there was the time when she had to wait for it to come. 'Come on, come.' It's meaningless, it will down here before it come, we need to hide and we need to do it now. Her thoughts were running dry, as the fear of the sight for even a glimpse at it. It could bite, it could claw, cut things in half and even melt the metal. That substance that was seen, Esther could even see it in her mind as it ran across her body and bones, how they'd take it apart in unison. Both the striking and ripping of claws and the liquefaction of her organs, skin, bones. It came faster, as the failed attempt to hide came into motion, suddenly, the opening came into being. First was her daughter, who was pushed just above her head and forced rolled across to the other side. 'There's still time, hold on there Eve.' Her echo was only slightly appealing to the still sleeping child. Slowly, at first, she had to force her way back, only so that the ground would even out. There had to be courage somewhat, since the other way in seemed to be closing in. With a headstart, now she started running and forcing through, to the point where she suddenly jumped, even twice after reaching the edge, bashing her knee and shoulder. Pain and the slight shouting remained meaningless, as the door was closing. All of the sudden though, the elevator wasn't working anymore, and it was the one she was on. Before the doors closed, the creature just popped in the existence in the middle of the small confinement, having no effect on the weight of the trap mechanism. Yet again, before it could reach and stop the doors from closing, they were already on the way. Both mother and daughter caught in fever, haunted by the hairy demon and its unknown desire. 'I'm sick of this already.' Her muffled voice said much, there was nothing of the warmth she once knew. Only that of the fire which crept in the child's mind. She had to deal with a lot since then and so far, it had managed to take over her mind. It was shallow to think of a promise now. 'It's too late to say I'm sorry Eve. There's no library out there, is it though?' Guild still reigned in her as there wasn't any way for them to return, at least since there was no control they could figure out of the elevator. Not with that thing on their tracks. 'We lose that thing and I'll get you the first doctor, understood?' It was the time again, yet another conundrum of twisted walls, now sharply pointed above, as they crept into the black gulf. Hot air was coming from above, yet below it was cold. Esther was already hurt but went on carrying her child in her arms like she had done so far. The walls started taking more shapes, having now words written on them, going into various sides and all across the various objects. It was here that the touch of a man was no longer felt, the elevator side having become more rustic at that. Cold, green and black stones laid around, the mist was only thicker with each side taken, it could've been a maze if it wasn't for the fact that the path was linear. Made for someone like her to have access and go on, with another turn which revealed a wide room full of stairs which lead to a closed gate. So wide was the room that it could harvest a hundred people as they stood next to one another, and this was at least from one side to another. The rows leading downwards could hold even more. The echoes from behind were just coming and heading by as they ran on and on, the chain was finally heard. Chains dragged the elevator up and down, and now it was the time for it to be pulled back at it again. Gates, as tall as they appeared, and as heavy, they were easily pushed through, only to revealed the openness of a monastery. The damned still crept on every side, with their rotten bones and meat, not even they could've resisted death for so long. Dressed in black robes with red markings embedded by their edges, they stood as if caught in an endless prayer, standing at an altar. The middle stone upon which a lump stood covered in a torn reverse robe left the impression of the sacrifice. If there was a body underneath, it was more than small to fit in this morbid crypt. Suddenly, Esther closed the door and have no time to find a way out, though feeling that from a point there came a cold gust of air, the exit had do be somewhere. Hidden from her sight, to say the least, it'd prove a trouble to ignored those damn sculptures that resemble the old gargoyles, stone dry but in a way corrupted. In animalistic resembles which seemed to take more than their human side, to the point where arms were longer, harder and bigger exposed muscles at the base, where the end and the hands were small and thin. The bodies seemed to resemble more of the primate side, as the smallest hairs were actually sculpted to an utmost position. Wings that didn't belong to bats or any creature, in particular, were more domed and twisted. Their texture seemed to have resembled of the common cockroach and that combined with the rest of what she saw attached left a grim impression. Such, at these were, or at least had been the pagans of the depths, a long white ago. Pushing their idols on every side, it appeared that the deviations between them were too far away from one another. Iteration after iteration, wings which seemed to replicate skin, pulled back, dropping, a bigger skull which seemed to have been sculpted at the prime of the mammal. The real animal from which the head was taken seemed to have become unrecognisable, at least, not to Esther, who had read at least a couple of manuals on every known species. But far, from all which crept in the room, was those twisted antennae, long and pointy, coming from a wingless abomination. Behind it, there was just enough space for a shell, crafted in a way so it could leave the impression of having a place to hide and hunt, to defend itself and ever more. The sight alone made her be more aware and it was only now that she had looked around, really looked around. Each row had hands attached to their ends from many different species which were analysed. Above was the reek though, worse of all, the inscription revealed much she hadn't known and the things they were showing to the common eye in the anatomy book. The twists and turns, twitching and pushes of the human body, to the extremest points. It revealed much she had dared not to look again. But the distraction was revealed to be damned, as the chain stopped and the echo came, from the further side of the other side. The beast arrived and the path was clear. Without a way out, she found herself standing by the altar, praying she wouldn't be taking the worse choice. If it were to search everywhere, she prayed. 'Let it be just a damned dumb beast, spare my daughter!' Said Esther, as she removed the tattered cloth which stood on the pale altar. A child laid, roughly the same size as the child, promptly dismissed by the end of a simple slap. At that point she looked around, slouching and trying to see if it's obvious. The danger was obvious, but she had to try. Placing Eve careful in the place where the sacrifice had been, and covering it, but with a small modification. Esther made sure her head was placed on the side, and a small bit of the bone kept the cloth from covering her nostrils. She had to breathe after all, despite her condition. And breathing would make it too obvious. 'Now for me.' First Esther looked at the bone which she threw. It spread just enough and far apart to appear as if it was part with the rest. Something laid behind the altar, doors, which were close to being hidden if one weren't to look directly for them. I might rethink my plans. Esther thought, despite being denied, it turned out as if she was wrong after all. On each side, they were reinforced and close, the obvious steps made it clear that something was approaching them. There wasn't anyway but for her to crawl, but at once it was revealed just how thin was space, she couldn't move if she wanted to. The alternative once again, as she took a robe and threw the skeleton away, placing it over her body was to pretend to be dead, while standing in the third row and wait for the monster to go. It was the only thing she could think of. And to say the least, the last chance she had to escape it. Her daughter was still alive. Eve, I know you cannot hear me, but I won't lose sight of you anymore. As she waited, her eyes could move around and do nothing but see in the limited direction she had set for herself. A constellation written in the language of skin was just under the many images and small carvings of humans which became barely visible now. Something was about to happen, as steps had taken a long while since they had stopped. Did it figure it out what I was planning? The creature had thin ears, muffled in the vast amount of fur, now etched into the wall, it stood there to listen. Neither of them gave in to make a sound. Eve was still in her sight despite being slightly bent down, though perhaps it wasn't to be enough. Nearest to her presence was, standing just near her feet was a remaining jaw that fell off the skull. It must've been a bigger man than her because it was way over her size. Since the risk was mighty, Esther still dared and bent down immediately resuming her position. Back against the tight space and with the skeleton jaw which just fit and left the detail outside the gloom which was under the robe. She tried smiling despite being limited but eventually gave up on it. Everything she had planned was now coming together, and just in time. The gates which once stopped it came to an ending. As they were opened, that thing came in rushing, on both arms and legs, which were long and thin, pushing through, dripping with sweat, looking around and sniffing. It was trying to hunt us all along. Despite all, it couldn't read thoughts as well. That stench was getting worse with each attempt it had, no wonder it. Same could be said about its body, that head and what seems to have the peculiar features of a human soon became twisted. Desperation was divine, as it approached each side of the small monastery, looked around with a damp look, then came at the altar. The smell of ancient bones muffled the small child, not to mention that the breathing was too faint to be heard. This is when she had lost track of it when it turned around and at once smashed the sturdy wooden door that had once blocked the way. It left nothing behind that the small remains, broken and the shriek of anger the beast had hosted for a long time. It was now time, as they dared. At once she pulled out the robe. Esther was on her feet once again, releasing the jaw and coming to her child. Without a doubt, the beast was going to its endless chase for nothing, leaving them just to seek the freedom and finally be free. Just a few steps, and just a turn. 'It hadn't noticed us, Eve. We're free.' The twist ended and at once she found out that freedom was compromised. To her knees, the bitter demise forced her to fall and hold her child. Only one way out, and it was crushed along the entire chain mechanism, smashed in an utmost bizarre and peculiar way. It happened inward from the looks of it, as it fell from above, but somehow it managed to get out before it happened and get to start the chase. For Esther though, now it was meaningless. Eve was burning and her sickness reflected in her skin, despite being for the first time she showed any sign of being alive, she was trying desperately to breathe. It wouldn't be long for the worse if I don't get her fresh air. But where? Since no chance remained, there was still a bit of hope for that in what laid after the altar. Left unscratched, Esther made her way back to that point from which she hid. A robe should help nonetheless, as it helped before. Another one was taken from that room just so that Eve wouldn't feel as cold now. Her forehead was burning though. The way ahead was grim and shallow, as the roles reverse. When they arrived now, the gate was already smashed from every single possible angle. Something of enormous power made its way, and as the light finally came in, the sky was revealed through the long, long tunnels which lead all the way above. They were thin and long, not made for climbing. From the looks of it, someone must've made them long ago, in a twisted hidden place. The sight, at first was a marvel, a promise to escape, but one which Esther got to a point of hating. After all, there wasn't any escape now, but salt on her wounds and the gaps between the shimmering light and the charcoal ground were too much to count upon. The beast could see in the dark, it was possible after all, they hadn't counted for it to break this through, but to pop in and out to the other side. Once the light ended, they were left on a slope, in pitch black. Paranoia made her weaker against the sound of the wind and the small insects which roamed around. If it weren't for the lucky pick when she bumped against the door, she would've been left blind. The knob twisted as they entered a room. It was small, and caught in the middle of a sealed question, right in front of the road. Even more obvious was the switch, which was still working, but not where the beast had laid. The light came into motion, even after these many years and right through the window, which she opened, the hidden long wires were revealed. They must've run all the way back to the monastery, only to give power to this little outpost. A carpet, yellow walls, a closet inside and a comfortable chair. There was even a backpack which she took with her now. Some extra weight didn't matter against a beast which could outrun you. But it was just as strange how it managed to get away without a trace. Esther knew it hadn't come that way. Though, a conventional flashlight was on the table, attachable even to her shoulder, which left her hands less occupied. The small shoulder pad which had that attached easily came over the robe, it was almost as if they were made for one another. The door was roughly closed yet the keys were just plainly left around as if no care was needed anymore. One thought crept in Esther's mind. 'What just happened in here?' It made no sense, how it was that those people, out of all ended up dying. Something did creep though, at the end of an eye. For, Esther, had to check then, once last time if she was followed. It was a surprise that made her smash the window closed, then the door and lock it at once. That creature with its bizarre appearance was there, just waiting in front of the light. Some seconds passed since it stared at her, not moving, watching her moved closely, before deciding to make a move. Now, she turned and tried fitting every single key with as much agility as she could twist, pull and back to pushing. Rightly, she opened the door and ran to the other side. It was unreal, a nightmare, to see it pop there out of thin air. But nonetheless, Esther was in no mood of risking her life or that of her child against something that couldn't be as real as she thought it. There had to be an escape somewhere, if there were tunnels upwards leaving to the outside world, chances remained on her side. What she saw next was still too strange to explain, not in itself but over the fact that they made their houses just under the war. Houses, various shaped, pushed through stone, rustic, some were cottages made through stone. They tried replicating roads, paving clean stone under with materials of their taking or what they could salvage. Most of them were just metal cases which were carried and replaced. It was obvious who took them from there and lead them to this place. Even the elevator seemed to be new, despite the corpses, at least from the jaw she felt, it was old, older than time. Ancient even was the quality of their bones. But, they seemed to have been new, tall, pushed around, rounded stones placed, getting wider with each approach. Paved paths laid everywhere and from the looks of it, there was an entire carved city, filled with their remains. The robes some wore into the open, while clothes were still waiting there. At once she realised that she was watched, and Esther jumped right over a raised, windowless overly formed structure and hid away. Esther knew that she was being watched, not by the beast but by something other. From the distance, the various levels revealed that it was more than a small commute created by those who had survived, but an entire city that was meant to take hundreds, perhaps thousands. Some silhouettes were visible, walking from afar, though now she couldn't risk approaching them, especially since some had some resemblance to that twisted form that creature turned into. With each leap and each trick of appearance, it seemed as if it grew thinner, pushing its feet and body to an entire new trim level. The mouth got, even more, slouching, dropping at the thought of meat, despite the fact that the dust had crowned the smell and made it unbearably hidden from even the strongest nose out there. It was a pity, that she waited, for each second there made Eve suffer more, breathing harder. Still no sound. Had it become silent? Esther couldn't wait and hide, especially with a free run just in front of her. Jumping and sliding over the tablet, she made it to the other side and kept going through open doors, only to jump at the first window. The houses were being to be taller, despite being as shallow as they appeared, though now, it seemed that the stone was becoming more ancient and evolved, rather than carved and reinforced. Plates were covering ancient stone, it was obvious now. Even a slight look at the edge below revealed the many rows where one could stumble, making it plenty for a single human being to venture and explore for a lifetime. Despite that, no one from above even knew or would believe, that this was the entry into a dark, seemingly endless abyss. A fall would kill her more likely, though she'd be sparing herself. There was no way out, now she realised, and that creature would just end her suffering as well as Eve. One last chance, she gave herself, to find a way in these raised crypts, tall buildings, which had become shared from one side, with their raised sharp spike, and tall cutting edges. Inside there seemed to be creeping the same carved statues of the malformed partly made creature, though move farther away into shapeshifting than ever. 'They sculpted their idols into their homes.' Just as she said that a creaking noise of a large step was made itself known. A large mouth revealed a hungry beast. The empty shrieks were covered by two pairs of claws which bent just so it could be muffled. But the woman came out of sight just in time. It could've seen her, but she heard. The various set of deep and pushing breaths were hard to take, even for it. And the creature had a hard time muffling its sound as well as she had. Somehow though, despite being as silent as she was now, after taking her sight away, she was met herself facing directly to the side of the statue. Those muscles were that of a human, though the head took a slithering appearance with scaled and a longer neck. Whatever they did here was done a long time ago, and she could see it from the room and the position it took before it died. The man who sat on his chair looked more than content, with both his arms wrapped around. Still no pressure for Esther who avoided that thing more than easily. It'd be a pity though, to end up like that man along with her daughter, in these unknown depths. Unknown, they must've thought she died along with her daughter in the fire. Without a doubt, the rumours already started creeping beyond her awareness and sight, going from ear to ear, mouth to mouth. Esther was already dead. But, what was worse than the petty rumours remained the diminishing concern of Eve. Her body was gasping desperately for air, and not even now had she opened her eyes despite the roughness shown to the body. It'd be a miracle to find her alive, but that wasn't the case. There was still a way down, and a way to get further away from that creature. One chance, as the platform on which the rustic sharpness didn't seem to have an opening leading downwards seemed. She had to find her own way. A look by the corner once the muffled shrieks went away and she noted that the creature was gone again. 'This is it, Eve, hold on.' 'We will find you some medicine, there has to be something around here. Though the best scenario went through her head, time wasn't entirely on her side this time. Whatever she could find, or look for, would end up most likely to be one hundred years, to say the least. Only a cabinet, somewhere, it had to be. The next one she entered, was already a ruined thing that'd been converted into a suite. Truthfully, the dead ones were sitting by the corners, they had been passing a small cotton ball which stopped in one's hand at once. 'Do you think they knew? Come on Eve, you need to eventually wake up and talk to me. You know as well as I am that it helps.' At once she placed her on the soft, partially cut sofa and opened her eyelids at once. The paleness was a bad sight, though going by her small flashing device, it yielded still no result. Least of all, something had to be done at once. Left there, she went upstairs, going through every single corner and every unlocked box she could find. Finally, a cabinet came, which she promptly took, with every needle and a small box, and pills, creme she could find laying around. Just as fast they ended up being dumped on the ground in front of her. Eve, poor Eve, standing there dying. Pills were forced, despite being old, morphine, and other substances down her veins. Something for her cold, another thing for the shock and anything other that might've forced her to come in this condition. And another shot of morphine on herself, followed by some more, to get even more of a displacement out of the world she was in. It felt like that voice sprouted out of a moment of madness which came out of the sight of her tower and of everything she had to go down in flames. Abandoned, she wanted no more but to head down below, but stopped her sprint at the edge. The absence of light in that hole crept in her mind, especially the more she looked inside. Various shapes loomed and swam inside there and she could see them clearly. Oh, so clear, they were just being formed. And the more she stared, at once the revelation came, it was no hole but a deep pool. Still, the altitude was too high for a jump, so she turned around and scattered every dust and every entry. Now that that thing must've popped away, she was finally left alone to explore. Despite the fact, there was nothing but. But something she hadn't noticed, growing on Eve arm which was left falling by the side. There were small bumps and growths on her arm, but no creme which hadn't decayed or had a stench of it was in that cabinet. And the twisted road took a turn, here it was a pair of stairs which lead below. Below, where the silhouettes were moving from far way, it could've been an illusion if the blood on the walls wasn't fresh. She was standing there just at the edge of the stairs, looking at the fine end, and just how fresh it was. Still dripping, and the amount was way too high to have come from a pair of rats who stumbled and came around. Was it that creature or could it have been another human? 'Is?' The need to know stopped once she realised on what side of the argument that thing was. It could've dragged and killed, eaten a human and disappeared. Not beyond the realm of possibilities, to say the least, it was worth a chance to be given and said. The pain was unnerving, the twisted way with those grinning teeth at the end. Someone was busy stealing the teeth of the damned and rearranging it over. The proof of others being here after their death occurred was more and more obvious. Even to the point when she fell below in a flight and ended up looking by the first thing around the corner. A couple of masks laid there, wrapped around metal hooks. Eight at least remained, followed by plenty of rows which had been used or had disappeared. Perhaps it was last, or not, but she immediately recognised the fact of what she had. Down her waist and undergarments, she took out the book with everything written in it. Bent below, she kept Eve on her lap and went on to read the book. Something had crept about, and it was obvious that the manual had prepared them for everything. Right around the corner, there was a page written by the gas masks. A crude image was forged to resemble somewhat like that which was above, of which her arm extended and took two of them with ease, placing them near. Gask mask, this should be it, the same height, width, extendable straps. The only problem which remained, of which she read, was the fact that both of the filters were filthy and used. Nonetheless, they were easily attached to her side. Wrapped around her arm like small wristbands, just looming there, reflecting in their clean protective window-like bridges. This was so much different, to look around. 'The dead here seem to have a mind of their own Eve, just keep silent and don't make any eye contact. I don't want them to snatch you when I'm unaware.' Her vision was set on a repulsive account. There were at least two adjacent birds, long and pale, at least not the common specimen you'd find around above. Black feathers and grey, nodding their heads, twisting them like owls, searching both of them around. As peculiar as it was, she had no other chance but to avoid them. They resisted just as long as those dirty rats and chances were that they had become just as rabid or worse. 'Shew, shew.' In an instant, they went away from the sound of it. It was only as if she had struck a chord in those little pests mind and then it popped there and in the distance. Something was moving around, or at least the sound of carrying was there. Whatever it was, there was no open window nor any visible door for her to use. But further away, a small clock, vintage as they used to say at the sight of such a marvel which reigned even before there was even such a thing as a war. Twelve o'clock, midnight, in the depths. She resumed her side stepping and standing still against the wall, looking abashed at their dance. One should've met her eyes if there were eyes to be met. It was almost as they had indeed entered, the lair of the necromancer. 'Eve, they're alive.' Esther whispered, in a tone just as usurped as it were. Another distant look followed and it was obviously the corpse of a soldier, made of a suit and cleaned bones, moving a wheeled trolley around, carrying as much as it could inside. Then at the crossroad which leads on one side, from where Esther came and on the other side leading to the main road. It turned slowly and still made no move. Now it was truly obvious that she should've been seen, yet still, no sign or real acknowledgement was shown. It went back to it, that reanimating slave, how lower they've been degraded from a soldier, she thought. They used to be mighty and died for our country. Now, in the end, they were forced into a reanimation. They, as it was obvious as she went along that special one, her first encounter with the automatons, was following the same conduct as the rest of them. Some were carrying planks and metal plates with them arms. 'Don't touch the road, stride just along the small huts and buildings. Make a note of that Eve.' Her voice wasn't even being dissected or heard. Though that simple fact didn't change a thing at all. It was still a pain for her to be there, under those conditions, under the constant fire and pressure, her end was in front of her eyes. And even more pitiful than that was the fact that everywhere around, there was no body of a child worker, despite the times. It was about to be if things kept that way. Three stopped at a block, right in the middle of what seemed to be the main avenue of the place, compared to what she was used to. Down, it sloped, going to a more concave and bent part of the platform which was directly connected rather than had a stairway leading down. Even where they lived there remained more pronounced, much often would she see adjacent buildings, separated only by a thin road from their rows of eight tall sharp ziggurats. A settlement was done with ease. At one went the first to its left, then followed the second to the right, going rightly by one another, and never passing or touching any of the areas of the huts. Why was that? 'The Necromancer, Eve, he's the one that must've sent that beast, that abomination made of stitches and long paws. We can't give up, yet, can we? No, we can't let the necromancer win now, not now that his servants had all their skin and meat fallen off their bones.' They were just bare bones, going on motions. Plenty of them which laid around too, working at that, for the first time, undoubtedly in years. What they were preparing was a grim fantasy she expected to be nothing else but a nightmare, out of which she still failed to awake. Like a grim totem, she followed it, as it leads her, despite the others having peculiar paths, this one went straight. Straight to what was important, down to the pool, from the likes of it, where, from where she stood, Esther had the whole sight in front of her eyes. It crept like that, to think of it. As nothing else seemed to bear such a unison as the servants and how they worked. Even from the other side as she was approaching, them getting ready and being active just felt right. But for a second they forgot who they were. There was a tag on the uniform of the ones who was carrying all the junk and metal plates on his small trolley. Esther read it. 'Lieutenant Charles.' The insignias were long rusted and had fallen away most likely, leaving only the band which had held them in his suit. A case of severe anxiety came at the realisation. Despite her story of reanimation and beyond what peeked her curiosity, they had been once humans. And that struck her only once, the unearthliness of it all. 'But where? Where are you all heading to?' Remained the question, and just in time, she found out of the junk, what seemed to have been a rounded clean filter, abandoned on a broken mask. The air wasn't as shallow for her now, but the change in her skin was apparent. Her daughter became a fraction of what she was in the past. In the short amount they managed to survive there, it managed to leave a grim mark all around their bodies and minds. To say the least, the filter was on and came just tightly fit to a mask, thanks to the manual which had a nicely written and coherent section about attaching it to an end. Eve was breathing now through it and the sound of shrapnel inside the mask was apparently there as well. Someone had shot the mask, but it hadn't managed to get through. It was stuck near the filter which now made a clicking noise every single time she took a breath or made an unwanted motion. Such a thing filled her with despair, now that she was alone, sleepless, deprived, filled with anger. Flying over the moulder, she would hide now behind those bones, noticing that there still wasn't any interaction between them, nor any notice from the automaton. Esther walked freely and thought just as well as she might. 'But are you going there then?' The looped roads all seemed to have lead to the same place, the pool in the middle which became utmost apparent in its details now. Small waves were visible, vibrations and what not. It hadn't been disturbed as of yet. But now that they had passed again, it became apparent where most of the action continued, on the other side. Hundreds of dark figures just roamed ahead, going from side to side in an utmost efficiency. It made the small automaton seem quite insignificant and slow, which she, at once decided to outrun with her bare feet. No mention of the remained anymore. It was a shallow thing to do, but it didn't care. Care was for the living, not the dead, Esther thought. And top of that there was someone else who needed her immediate attention and care. Her daughter Eve was caught in a hole that was just as unwanted as it was. This was to be the reasoning that they came? No other voice came to warn them. The various little ziggurats now turned into nothing more than monuments with no entries. Rather, those that came now seemed more ancient, formed, spread at different sides. And the most important feature, they had no entry, at least none to be seen. No one had even lived in them, despite the fact that they were placed everywhere, on every single side. As she walked, her instincts made it apparent. There were holes in the ground, above. Rightly, in what had now become the ceiling were plenty of well-rounded holes made directly under the ziggurats, as they reflected the same positions as those here. Still, something was off, despite the position and arches which crept on every one of them, the tall spears which seemed to accompany some of the designs. It still wasn't tall enough for someone to creep inside, not to mention just how dangerous. And another look at the undead automaton, she reminded herself that they were flesh workers of the damned. These ruins instead could be hundreds of year old or even more than that. No way remained to date those things, at least not one which was fully certain and aware. It wasn't long now to another slope which leads down below, closer to the figures, hidden by the side. She looked at just how tall they were, these ones. Two at a time seemed to be the rattling bones of giants. Something must've been exposed to them, that the fact which they were carrying those heavy ziggurats away was nothing more but a fantasy. For a moment, the illusion of sentience came into being. Both of the tall workers, with their bare, white-goldish bones seemed to have stopped at her presence. 'You can't see me.' With a trembling voice, the last of the substance which had managed to keep her nerves still seemed to have disappeared. There was something now boring in her eyes, something that was her since the time she was conceived, fright. Nonetheless, they resumed their going as she did hers. This place was filled with the giant clean skeletons which hadn't belonged to the sizes of humans but rather overgrown apes of a kind that lives in the depths. It was a tribe, no, a commune, it must've been, to hold so many of them. An entire species in front of her eyes, at that right moment, Esther reminded herself of their anatomy. It didn't find any type of animal or mammal in particular of which she knew. The features were too distinct, other than the height, those teeth all seemed to bore were twisted and forked like those of wild boars. And the bone structure must've become way too strong for them to carry what they had. It was a marvel and a miracle to say the least, what was done for them and in return, servitude. Such a time as she stood in place, the automaton finally came and passed her. It joined its taller brothers in their quest to lead every ziggurat and ancient piece, closer to the bottom. 'Eve, don't fear now. I need to keep as much courage as you can hold inside of you. We're heading directly to the necromancer now, Eve?' The girl still was caught in that endless sleep she feared she'd have caught. One which could've ended in that pool. It was only slim dark, and the battery was just enough to last for hours. The curiosity now took place of the fear as she seemed those tall bone figures as being nothing but passive. No aggression but only harsh work, down to every bone there. And plenty of them roamed around, taking pieces from the wall, inscriptions, barrels, boxes and armaments which hadn't worked and never seemed to. Each step made this city of ziggurats appear more like a whirlpool of metal and bones. The sound of stone being crushed was apparently obvious even to untrained ears, which Esther couldn't deny. A tall black blob laid in the distance, moving, at the end where the entrance to the pool laid. No hole, no thin arms, but a gluttonous form, just sitting there unable to move. The ziggurats seemed to have been ruined by their constant work. Broken foundations, crack stones, dust spread everywhere she'd look, plenty more rubble just wriggled by the side. It wasn't surprising at all that some of the ancient formations were taken down. Hits were given and taken to the metal plates too. As she approached the last moments, the last confines of the pool, this was her chance to finally hide away. From the real threat, she barely avoided sight, but it was there, sitting with a little stubby foot stuck in that dark pool. It had grown too large for its apparent stature. Left apparently blind from the looks of it. Esther raised up and looked at it fully, a gluttonous form, humanoid but grey of skin, pale white eyes, stubby feet and legs. It had overgrown nails which seemed to clean the bones unwittingly each time it tried grabbing a ziggurat. And that mouth, which was apparently a maw, opened and swallowed stone without even bothering to chew any of it. Is it deaf as well? Esther asked herself. 'Eve, look, it's the necromancer, we have finally made it to him.' Perhaps it was too late, that the form stopped from eating stone. Instead of doing so, it became aware of something, starting a furious attempt to sniff around. The bone figures at once appeared from behind, kneeling the woman and her child. Both eyes became engulfed with fear, though it wasn't because of it, she hadn't had a scent as much as swear or fur. Two tall bone constructs were carrying the beast. The beast yelled and shouted, too slim, too thin, with its arms caught in a trap, unable to run or get away. Those things broke its small bones in an attempt to restrain it. And in the end, despite the fact that it had noticed her, each attempt to bite or scratch was utmost pointless in the end. Such a restraint couldn't be countered by brute force alone, especially by one so small and weak. Frail and beaten, it attempted but gave up, as that sloppy thing wrapped around it. Even though it seemed rubbery, the beast took everything it had and tried biting the small gluttonous arm, to be dropped at once and wriggle on the ground. The cry that came was not only unholy but it left a dark impression on Esther. It was a moan of pain which went as low as to end her light, letting everything around is only lit by the pool. Echoes bored the cry all the way to the top, making it seem not only ancient but strong, in contrast with those ziggurats. The cry of the dead ended at once, and a trail of tears could be seen on its fat face, going as round and away as it could. Such a form was nothing more than an insult to the mind and body. First bones came and crushed the face and every tooth that attempted to bite their master. A creature couldn't even cry anymore, as it swallowed a good deal of teeth, which pierced it. Immediately, it got pulled from the ground and given to their master, who, at once started eating with that maw, going as far as showing a bunch of teeth, which it had. An apparent hunger was aghast, which made Esther was to leave as fast as she could. Eating a beast alive was cruel to any human to look at, but this was worse than it. Rubbery, and jerked, the skin was pushed, and it seemed like it had just finished with its arm and pushed the bone away. The beast still shrieked now that it had pushed away from the teeth out of its throat with a vile the necromancer had eaten. But now that he was distracted, it was both of their chances to run free. They have descended into the confinement, all the way to the pool, and only one way down remained. 'That's our escape, Eve. And none of his servants are aware of us. We have only this chance.' Her voice finally spoke her utmost desire. Though she had forgotten before, deep inside her, she knew that below of that pool laid the entrance to her promised land, a library with all the books they could both read. What she hadn't know laid about the contamination she had been exposed to and the meaningless of her action. As she ran, step after step, finally she jumped and avoided any touch of those bone-like golems. The glutton was distracted with the food, though it heard the splashed. First pushes against that thin layers of muddy water left something grim about it. It wasn't deep enough. 'Why isn't it deep enough. We need to get lower than this, we need to get through at once!' Her voice got desperate, her attempts to run to the middle left her looking around it a shock. She wasn't even an entire shoe deep into the dark water that she realised, there was nothing else to it. Nowhere to go down below. At once, her presence was acknowledged when her jerking in the water ended. The last tides left just enough place for the necromancer to observe her. It threw the last wicked remains of the last thing she had eaten and at once it sends the guards. From every single direction and even from the pool raised the giant formed bodies of skeletons, all coming towards her, dressed in steel and armour. Some were great, others small and frail. The number was meaningless as she became too frail to resist the call. Esther threw the mask away off her child and started walking at her own pace. No word spoken in the end, it was almost like in the end she had just accepted defeated at the hand of that hellish creature. Not a single bone touched her of course, as she came on her own accord along her child, another being to be sacrificed. And each step revealed nothing but the pain she felt, for herself and for her child, but there was nothing else she could've done. Not for her nor for others. It was now though, that Eve stopped breathing, her body became pale and cold. It was a while for Esther to accept it, but she died in her arms a long time ago. Even longer, as the marks on the bone said, as Argus noted. She came right into the trapped and was tricked by the parasite, the same like the others. And everything she had ever done became null. In the end, though, she faced her fate and came forth the giant embodiment of horror, which took the gross form of the necromancer. And a blob governing over bones, it didn't do much but wait for her to see that there wasn't any end to it at all. One thing perplexed him, as he still swam through the liquid mind it had become. Was she the one who gave him the gift of bone. Necromancer, master of bones, Esther along her child must've given it to it, in time. Though it could've been any of them. The way below was deep, as the parasite cut through, and it was now that Argus was getting through the cage without his knowledge of his once human appearance. He was more, and more he was about to be. There was still another whose memories still got pushed relentlessly inside his mind, but this time it was that of an old man, as old as one can be. His life had long been forgotten or pushed away, his road to the bottom of the ravine as long as it appeared was lost just as well. There was nothing more about him or what he's done, other than the last moment of his life and how he was already there. Whenever he had arrived at day or night was redundant, as, in the depths, you could never tell unless you brought the time with you. Which he had done more than enough. His journey and destiny had brought him on the steps of another, he had filled his pockets with clocks and small trinkets and machines with various redundant features. Out of all whose memories he had got in touch, Argus recognised that he came below with the desire of death, knowledge of the celestials, though he called them a different name. Looking for a cage, which he knew that was a trap even before others knew what it was they were looking for. If he was even younger, say in his prime, he would've opened it by himself undoubtedly. Pierce was his name, once a soldier, now he was nothing more than a relic of the depths, at the other side of it all. He was standing there where Argus had once gone through, the small town which gave the man a Victorian feel to it all. The water above was cleaner than what he had experience and the technology which kept it floating above still remained. Even more important, despite that, there were other bones around, all remained silent as Argus was being taken in the viscous substance. He was about to be his last, the last words about to be heard by another human being. Or at least, the diaries written in bones. Whatever creature embed itself into one was redundant now, as it hadn't shown itself now. He was about to tell of what he saw and finally vanish from existence like the others. More blisters on the poor man's body, Argus' eyes closed again. He saw the old man how he was standing at a table, looking and simple people who had grown there and never even saw the sun. None of them had ever known what laid above, and against everything Pierce had ever seen in his life, this was the most interesting so far. The robes and dresses they were, clothes and trinkets so far were made by themselves, by their own little hands. And evenly as polite. 'Do you need another drink, sir?' Asked a maiden who stood close by just ready to be. 'If you would kindly please.' A quaint speech to the man, as he was approaching his end term. Despite Argus in his journey, he stood and enjoyed it, knowing that it would end just as worse and he thought it would, he decided to really drag it over. It was strange now, that Argus could freely think now, rather than be blocked inside as a watcher in the others' memories. He insisted with himself to approach and see the man at every possible angle, the wrinkles, the old grey suit. It came off as peculiar against all those bright clothes the others were wearing or even the guards who were wearing a deep blue. He walked around with a drink and greeted any and any back. 'Madame.' 'Welcome.' Through the long, deep tunnels, twisted with water, where Argus had failed to look around other than the tightly fit room, he now came into thought. There were other mouths which could've lead to anywhere and everywhere at all, just at the end of a push and pull, then a slide. None were ancient as one would've thought, but then again, this wasn't his body to control. Argus could enjoy this in his sleepless lucid dream but remained unable to control or even the slightest touch. Pierce had a different view and speculations than him, having been around and being more experienced in spelunking than him. He'd been witnessing a lot lately, during of which notes and crude drawings revealed much. It was the way his memory acted which made it apparently forged in a way. The distancing from the noise and the various sound sources which were completely ignored as the old man pretended in that joyful crowd to be reminiscing of the past. His long gazes over the various mouth-shaped and the architecture of his travels remained too long and intense to be taken as mere distractions. Purposely, his hand moved slowly towards the key features which he observed during his study. It was almost as if he was guiding his hand to a child, as from a position which he could show how they worked and just at what extent they were twisted. Metal was bent, pushed in the walls, apparently they were of an ancient design and the various mark of silver left on the paper by the side left nothing more but for the crude. Sloppy, too tall, some of the perspectives had been disjointed, yet the signs for melodies or sounds became apparent. It was a shame though, there could've been hours spent on analysing the various devices, with each page revealing just how many iterations of that had come into being. Tall, pushed, blunt, no sharp edges, some of the features which made those mouths resemble their predecessors weren't even there. Such a thing was out of the ordinary even for him, as Pierce had never gone as far as exaggerating his studies. With a point where they ended and it was revealed that there were other devices, long, worms, which laid flat on the ground. They opened concaves and by the sides, being connected by a symbol he had drawn there. Was he the man who wrote the note? The writing under some of the drawings seemed too mechanical to be hand drawn. Or at least now they seemed to be indistinguishable from the other note which guided him. Though this revealed much of the intricate mechanism of his choice. Worms, with dead ends at their tails, but domes opened as other ones of their kind came into contact and extended. Sound activation seemed to be just as apparent there and everything else, though his voice had become too rough to be able to manoeuvre them. This was his fate to be, which he expected, though he must've realised by then that there'd be a watched at the end, someone who'd come and take his place. As it promptly did happen. Such a desire to be able to keep up with him was unexpected, but Argus took as much out of the devices as he could. Were they below the cage? There was no telling if these were part of the thing which would've kept the rest of the locks or spread around the ravine. Pierce hasn't seen the others that Argus got to meet, yet he had made an effort, to say the least, for the understanding of their ways. As obvious and hidden as it were, these were all the remnants of those who fought in the war and went away, hidden and forced to spend their lives there. Punished for their loyalty and service, most of the camps chose to spend the rest of their lives there rather than be forced to return as traitors. Loose ends, written at the end of a page. The various war machines and their engines were described, written and illustrated in the most intricate detail. It was a shame that this small illustrious set of notes and details were lost, ink embedded in bone and skin. The last note of his life remained at the end which he avoided to go through and look at. Plenty of chances remained for him to turn around and go through everything but only important notes were shown and where to look. He was blindfolded after, where his life remained nothing more but a shimmering leaf in the wind. Shame brought to his eyes, his demise came just like the others, a lamb for the slaughtering, old and adjacent. He had come only to leave his imprint in his mind, as the last mind and the last pieces of bone marrow which were strong enough to last. So was the petty creature disjointed at the sight of it, but one last time. One which couldn't be denied, a will that waited its turn with as much content as it could muster. It was the abominable blob which had caused every single problem that had been, the parasite which was defeated, which came into being as the last fraction of what it had been. Despite the other specimens of its species, it had managed to get through as far as it could. Only to be defeated in the end at the hands of that small creature which roamed the depths guided by a mad voice. He felt his body fall through an entrance of skin, of which he could grab by the various entanglements which were left there hanging on the walls. They were dripping as much as its last entries of coherent speech were decaying, with green and yellow and marrow filled, falling apart. The ink was revealed under the mass wall which dripped, words, that were meant for him to read despite the fact that the mind now spoke to him directly. No, this wasn't a simple memory but the last fragments of something disgusting and nothing short of extraordinary. It was something that not even he could deny, despite the abuse and how much pain it went through, it couldn't do anything else but lay there and watch him lower. The way down should've been easy for him to take, yet it had melted as well, leaving only a slope leading to a formation of pure blocks of stone. They were filled with shades of blue and purple, then came the red dripping from above. It had always been a part of it, certainly, that perfect connection between stone and skin appeared to be nothing more but a shell. 'You won't make it.' The voice whispered at once, though it was obviously not belonging to the one he knew that well then. It was the voice of that wretch which still seemed to form something despite its ruined mind. The confines of which, had its chambers even deeper now. A wretched sight to be looked upon, covered by steps alone as he didn't have any need to run away, he just came and walked as if undisturbed by the sight he beheld upon. It was the grimness of the situation which held him to a point where he was too quiet to be told how to act. In the presence of such a creature who knew it could do a lot of harm as on last well-used attack. 'Why are you still alive?' It asked Argus yet again, he remembered hearing that question some time ago. The gates opened in front of him and the room in which the amorphous substance which hovered in the air laid. It hadn't any form no longer, definitely not the one of a brain, yet thoughts still managed to form. Word after word came banter, strike, attempt to dissuade him from his quest. 'Do you see the pillars which lay around? Look closer at them.' As he did so, Argus took the bait and look at the stone masonry. They were infected by those mouths, eyes, growing small holes which made little people. A proto-human was created out of them as it said. 'This is the future you're about to come back to if you ever escape. These are your new masters, your leash holder, your death.' Stone crumbled under his feet, yet nothing changed as he fell on the stone floor. It was the same twisted room with its pillars going down as well. And under the mass, there was another, which gave form to a new set of whispers which continued over the other. Poor thing was smashed by the rock before it even managed to show if it could speak a word. It was a shame that these things didn't evolve when I needed them. Argus thought as he looked at the remains. They were still warm and blinking, yet the lifelessness was utmost visible in those wicked eyes. 'Are they parasite just as you?' 'Nay.' Answered the thing, though not until crushing the stone above so it could claim the other part of it, become a more bulbous thing at all. The creature appeared to be too heavy to call it a simple procedure of hovering, appearing more like the beginning of a flight. The arms that formed around were long, filled with holes and empty cavernous pointers which tried stretching the pillars and their sons. A deep blue substance started dripping by the side. 'Do you see it now? How much we cherish even the lives of our servants? Fool, in life I was no parasite but something more, the next form of evolution in the chain.' That thought alone gave Argus a chill. Looking around for a way out he was surprised to find out only now that it was sealed. The conflict was quite inevitable now. 'What do you want now then? End my life, but it won't matter now that yours became apparently ending just as well.' A petty remark from a corrupted little primate. But don't underestimate what we are and what we can do. After all, you were deceived before. In the middle of the crowd, it laid now, with the face of another. The town with its morning fountain. 'I've been here before.' 'We've been here before most likely. Walk. Now!' Said another voice in the crowd, at least three or four of them had been taken over and were forcing him to move around. 'What's this that you're trying to accomplish then? You can't escape and it's already too late." You understand nothing primate.' Said one of them, as the other continued his sentence. 'We deserve to escape just as much as the others. Continued two at once. 'How long do you think we've been waiting for you to come?' "Did you think you were the only one who expected that to happen? That one service that would come to get rid of the parasite, yet. There was none there, but a mirage." Look around you, at this town. 'Every single stone had a little shine about it, every brick of the house painted by hand, even those that laid by the side, the humans as they appeared to be. 'Don't they look real now? More real than a memory?' Some look at the bizarre group around that one man who looked as roughened up as if he had been through hell and return. Their expressions really did manage to sell in the feeling of alienation which Argus now felt. Everyone was being turned against him unless he tried. 'Help, I'm not being let go. I'm being trapped and in need of. Assistance.' It ended on a poor note as some old maidens took the children away from the streets. Even the lanterns which hung from the roof of the house soon became pale with darkness. 'They don't care about you, no one does now. They're no different than any other scum you've ever met before. Rather than helping, they'd stay and wait, afraid to interact or even give a helping hand. "You're wrong, you've made them act that way to make me feel paranoid." Have I thought? Or is it that you've been away so long that you forgot what other people are like? There was no denying of the oddness which they displayed. 'Now can we understand one another?' "What you want then?' It was quite a simple thing, the Supreme attempt to have at him and the caged one at the same time. One shot and two kills, he made Argus be aware of that. Most importantly, it said. 'We are one now, as you have noted. I'm not to die anymore but we will both travel as further down below and have at him as I planned all along. "You tricked me. "Indeed, little man, it was part of our plan all along to have one smaller and more potent to carry what remains of our mind. "Your body was too big to fit. "Too shallow and moist, too much of a liquid to reform once we were down there. "We needed one strong and sturdy such as yourself. "To control and go on to that which we have fed upon for so long. 'Argus was held aghast by the sight and sound of their dark tongues. 'We won't be able to march there and get him at unaware. I thought you'd know better. "We're already heading there, what do you think those distractions were? They were nothing but forced images for you to see and look upon until we got there?' "You won't be able to get him, no. You're nothing but a small mad fragment which had no idea of what it goes against. I've seen what it's able to do and I know that we will all be obliterated at once if we go against it. The smirks were enough to leave grim faces all around the crowd. People were already heading in different directions and trying to avoid even the smallest glance. 'We know the punishment for treason and for failure as well as you do. "We were counting on it. "Enter' Said the older of the controlled ones, pushing Argus in the open house and entering as well as the others. They slammed the door and locked it by means which were unknown. 'Finally some peace and quiet' Now open that door Argus, open it now! "There was no telling on what was about to be on the other side, yet he was forced to follow their guide. There wasn't any visible mechanism or fancy lock to be seen. What laid before was a set of intricate turns and twists which worked together maliciously. There were blocks of metal which were rubbed to one another, which pulled and pushed, and came forth then below. Each attempt thrust the other further away in their dance until something clicked and something just pushed back. It was a motion so unearthly that he couldn't recognise if it was part of a sequence or for an attempt to open it by chance. 'I cannot open it. 'Argus protested to the now standing council. They were standing in, almost a circle, watching, rudely creeping as his each attempt seemed to be a failure. 'I still cannot open the damn door.' 'Try again then. You must've realised by now Argus that there's no other way for you to go.' The creeping corners were black and pushed by every direction. Something wanted to intrude, though it was obvious that the creeping parasitic thing had failed to see or take any notice of it now. It was creeping them, engulfed and most likely sentient, reaching with small finger like protrusion of blackness and just moving in twisted ways. 'What will you do after I open it?' 'Go towards the other.' 'And the other after it.' 'Why don't you open it yourself?' Argus asked both of the twins possessed humans which seemed to gaze into his very soul. It wasn't enough that they had taken over his mind, but now they were just trying to push him to the edge. 'I don't understand why it isn't working.' Time passed, though he hadn't become as shallow and pale as he should've become. Beyond his realisation, time passed since Argus used to be a human. 'There.' The clicking sounds of the lock behind finally stopped after a sequence, which only came naturally after he heard the melody of drums and beats. 'Need to carry on the back, just go on.' The door opened to the twisted maw, which promptly opened. No power could change this to anything he had seen and appeared proper. Especially every single ring which it had, both on the outside and the inside. It was a shallow thing to attempt to run, though he did it nonetheless now that none of them was there in front of him or even close enough to stop him. The door refused to close itself, so he was left only to that. To jump and feel just how slimy each ring was, to describe it as less sorrowful, torture. It stung, the oil could burn the skin just as harshly as fire. The marks left on his hands would last for at least two lifetimes, to say the least. Though, if it was going to be the only punishment which meant freedom, he had learned nothing. At the end of the worm, the dead end laid nothing but them. 'Do you still not realise that we're in your mind?' Apparitions now, nothing else. 'Their forms became just as twisted as that of the rabid beast he had seen in the vision of Esther. Plenty of them to go and come around, to witness him.' 'Cross to the next one, come on return. You know the map and the device as well we do and we won't be able to get there once it closes?' 'What will close?' The uncertainty of the voice lost its appeal and prudence. Now there laid another set of angry moans, shivers and gazes, which weren't set on Argus but on the one who seemed to have revealed a grim secret. 'It's inevitable that you escape.' 'Redundant.' Said another. Argus went on ahead, having no other chance than the one presented to him at the time. Could I not banish them?' You may not. 'His thoughts remained unsafe even now, despite the fact he had even the slightest whisper imagined. The claws it had were too deep inside, grasping and pushing, holding as tightly as they could. It was already too much of an expectation to go through a maze of worms alone, especially with those sickening oils which seemed to be hurting him at every touch. Promptly he stopped as none seemed to be penetrating the material of which his shoes used to be made out of. 'We can't avoid it now that it detected us.' Said the voice in the dark. It was a fairly small protrusion which had not enough space for all of them to roam around. 'It can feel us inside you.' 'Like an organism, in the depths of which it tries to remove.' The dripping oil left some marks on the skin now, due to the prolonged exposure. A thick gust of air now roamed and brought the mind to the thought of an ancient temple which wasn't his but of his predecessors. It was a mirage which changed them, making them twisted as they were. It fit just rightly in his mind up to the point where he forgot. 'The tunnels, do you remember them?' 'We're going to watch you now go back to those wretched abominations and converse at their curled abode.' 'Shouldn't they have been slain a long time ago before they decided to live past their usefulness?' It was in that heart of their meeting that he found another worm which bit inside the other. This was short and it revealed that this wasn't the maze that was drawn by the man named Pierce.No, this was open space, one which was changed by that which had possessed him now, to the point where it wanted to creep and take over his mind.Even the smell was apparent and behind him, the noise of feet coming towards him as he ran, came as a recognition of his memory.They were taunting him, making him run and trip.His hands touched the rings directly on the ground, his knees scraped against a pool formed of the oil and he screamed at once.This time they were rabid, twisted beyond hope, sharp teeth, blue and red eyes, on each side.Even their weapons seemed to be sharp and shallow, along with their approach.At once he was forced to feel pain again as he touched the walls and forced himself to stay.He ran and jumped through the last ring of the carrier and landed just to see how much fun it had twisting his memory.All those men and women who had been tainted below had been pushed against one another, to make barrels of meat, keeping only parts of them aghast.Hands and legs were being left to roam and fall, most of which couldn't control themselves but fall into the water.But this time, it jumped outside and tried to slash him, which was avoided just in time.The blade fell and scraped the knee, cutting a part of the meat and leaving a confused glance as he felt it.The pain was strong but the confusion was even stronger, making him run through something which he wasn't even aware if it was real or not.It was diving, there was a sting and the melody of singing wailings of what was his entire memory just pushed together.There wasn't any choice he could take.Driven by nothing else but his instincts, he managed to avoid as many blows as he could.'This is the fate you were promised for your failure, has it not?'As it said it, the movement of some of the giant bulbs of meat began to be restricted.The meat finally came into being and started becoming part of the floor and walls which surrounded it.Now all the attempts to run or to grab anything became meaningless, as they were forced to sit there for an eternity.Some of them recognised Argus as well as he came to the same realisation in return.Tears ran down from one side to another, despite the fact that it was too late for anything to be done.It stopped just before he could pass them, and went ahead.The island or at least half of it was strung against the wall only to stand in front of the long wide bridge.Even the water seemed to have been twisted and tainted to the point where it produced heat.I need to find a way to free it and escape.'You will fail and we will take its place."And you'll be trapped forever with that thing as much..'.Argus stopped from his slight jab.The ridicule was too sweet to be avoided.'As much as you'll be trapped with us, won't you?'The shimmer that came was almost as cold as if he was in an arctic area, this memory wasn't about to last any longer.But, it was just strong enough to slow those two executioners who were hunting him and the meat.It was a snow storm in the depths, which made it quite plainly clear that this place had something in it.The walls seemed to have scratch marks and missing bits which had the same substance on which the mass was feeding upon.But now, it was roaming just in the air and everywhere around.It became apparent to Argus once he started concentrating upon it.Seeing how they fell to the cold and the last fingers stopped moving, he took a second and closed his eyes in respect for those who still served in his memory.'This isn't the time for being petty.'Argus felt in control for once, especially at the moment he started approaching the gate.A stronger set of whispers came behind now from there.It muffled the previous ones then and there just as he approached.'Have you gotten through at last?Have you opened my dark prison?'The voice asked expectingly, waiting for an answer almost as if it hadn't waited for the longest period of time ever known by man.'I am infected, do you hear me?Something was at the top of the cage guarding it, trying to take over."I know.'It responded with a calm, understandable demeanour.There was nothing for it to fear now, pain couldn't be felt, as it waited for the moment to be told.'Who do you think placed it there?"The question came as it projected the answer in Argus' head. That was nothing more but a guardian. 'Something that would slay and cast away those unworthy to get through and open it. No one would dare waste my time but you, the one destined to set me free.' 'What must I do then? You know I've done everything you've asked me to do so far in order to earn my freedom and escape.' 'And you shall be rewarded once the gate is open. Look behind.' Argus turned to see the damp wrenching twists and mechanism that worked without a stop. On the bleak platform stood the last remnant of that parasitic guardian who had tested him, which stopped at a point. 'They cannot follow you now that you can hear and approach you.' A pain came from behind the head, one that was apparently as familiar as he had thought. Slowly, he rubbed his hand behind and saw that something had come out of him. A large, blob which fell through his fingers and on the ground. There were bubbles visible in it and somewhat of a replication of the liquid in which the brain swam. Just as it fell and started going, the vision disappeared, of all those hounds which had been placed to ask him and watch over his every move. 'Won't it grow again.' 'Its purpose is complete, now it may never be whole again. As for you, come.' The gate seemed petrified with runes and words, incantations and plenty other. The sudden change of dark images seemed to have tainted some of his minds, even more than he felt before. 'This is one of the seals, the last fragments of what kept me locked here for an eternity. Growing, growing in a space that rots. Free me and you shall have freedom at last.' Said the caged beast, as it appeared. Though this appeared to be a portcullis unlike any other. Horror fell onto Argus as he threw a glance at his hand. Growths, small roundish forms were there, all over his skin with blisters and plenty of melting spots. 'What happened to me? Answer me at once.' There was a creeping silence now, along with any answer. Argus fell at once, breathing heavily and shaking. His world got shattered once he had seen his other hands and looked at a shimmering pool which laid under him, made out of the sweat. As his hands ran along his head, he felt just how the hair had fallen. It must've been a while, though since that happened, as not a single long pair of strains could be felt. What did they do to me? 'Bastards, bastards, bastards.' He repeated in his pool. With each glance as his once gently rounded face, now he became afraid of himself and of others. 'I can never be free anymore.' Tear eyed, he still laid there, unable to deal with the fact that he had fallen to the corruption of the depths. The price of loyalty and freedom was much, paid in pain for him and for every other glance. 'They weren't afraid of them, they were afraid of. Me!' Argus thought, as his mind came directly back at that crowd which stared at them and walked away. It could heal me, it has to. The denial came into being, at the last of his desperation came. 'I want to be human again if I do this, do you hear me? You'd better be damned if you don't make up for everything you've put me through.' His hands touching those perfectly chiselled runes on the door, made him feel like an un-goliath of a creature, touching the ends and pieces of something above it. It was hard, as he had to look away and avoid even the slightest gaze upon himself. Filled with angst he studied and understood nothing so far. Backed against the door, he turned and waited. His mind just went back to that moment where he had tricked that field which was stuck going over and over in its motion. Now he became something like it, but worse, to the point where Argus desired to befall the same fate as it did and be slain. It was all pointless. Hours passed in pointless attempts to force it open despite it being as massive and colossal as it was. No backbone was put on in, as the thought of deciphering came into being. Something was whispering in the dark and moving and it wasn't the voice nor the moving blob. I'm all alone, Argus thought. The sounds of crickets there was just as alarming as one could possibly think of. Such small creatures couldn't be denied of their place though, with the existence of those rabid rats. Now aware of the possibility, his eyes scanned for pairs of red or blue eyes, trying to see whenever or not there was any group of them just laying around. Waiting for him to be dead. 'I cannot open the damned door alone. This one you've chosen apparently has failed you, making all this waiting be for nothing.' There wasn't any logical way Argus could think to open the gate. Everything about it somehow found a way to go beyond his abilities, including the size and the endless possibilities of the words. 'Is there a magic word then? Open it, open it now!' As it came, the accompanying strikes and punches did nothing but add a numb feeling to the skin and nothing more than that. The material not only did seem impenetrable but was just as well, left with no scratch of even the slightest temporary mark. No dust stood in the formation of each word, the empty spaces, holes which laid above or corners. Simply put, there had to be a way to get through which laid beyond the normal means. 'Damn you, I can't.' Argus stopped at the point where the return couldn't leave his mouth. The door opened inward to reveal a giant humanoid body with a giant rounded face. Its eyes seemed to belong to a doll, especially the sharpness which accompanied the head. That dark robe and size made it unmistakable something of a mammoth and the candidate for that thing which paved the way above for him. Despite being covered in the gloomy field, the robe was obviously placed and tattered, covering the body to the point. Those hands which held the door seemed to resemble bones though, at a point, they were human-like, especially the constant twitch and the mannerisms. It gazed and waited as if for a command. The mouth did seem as if it was fully formed with lips, painted white. And as it was, the only peculiarity about it, other than the size was the fact that one of its eyes was rounded while the other was distorted. 'You made noise?' That mouth's movement filled the entire area with horror, down his spine, to the bottom, to the top of his brain and his supper. 'You know why I came.' Erected Argus as he stood in front of it. There was something like a construct to it which laid, unlike the others, the skin, perhaps on one side, while on the other was the appearance of a doll. 'Follow me.' That giant hand took just as big as a lamp. Argus quickly entered as the door closed by itself slowly, then got slammed. It was a library as well as everything which was collected or one would desire there. Books and the memory quickly flashed to Esther and her desire. Ammunition for war, and sharp needle like planes which were just kept above by metal strings. The veteran and the agent, the curious ones. But what did the old man want in the end? Peace and quiet were never there, but instead, there was much of everything and anything, as well as gold, and statues, sculpted much divine. Bells and growing trees that needed no sun to grow. Punished people most likely, as the sight of damp fright revealed itself in front of him. That lamp couldn't have been made so tightly rounded and big, it used to be a cage which was fashioned for him to carry. And in that strong flame, there were multiple bodies which were burning there as a fuel for his fire. The metal was just as hot as he had thought, to leaves blisters all over his skin as he still held him. But now, now there was a distance kept between them by Argus, something more than he had expected or had thought of doing. It wasn't dangerous yet. 'May I touch any of it?' 'Be my guest.' The Colossus paused as it waited for Argus to mess around. The grin was shallow, dark and deeply pushed inward his mouth, but it was as honest as it looked. 'Won't I be killed and placed to burn with the others if I do so?' 'None of them reached this place so far, making you the only one. Everything's yours to use as much as your heart desires, from one terror to another.' 'Then what have you done to them?' 'They were above trying to cover the entrance and block your way. I was ordered to do nothing more but come about and take care of it.' 'So you're the one who's dealing with all the cleaning around here, right?' Asked Argus impertinently. No fear laid in his eyes, nothing which bothered either him or that which had been cleaning. So far, there was no answer, but slight looks in any of the books and bites of the golden coins which he threw away. Barrels had rum in it, but most likely it got contaminated. At once he places the book back and put a finger, stirring the rum in the barrel. As he tasted it was sweet. 'Why isn't it stale from sitting down here?' 'Everything is to be preserved by his word.' 'Why haven't you opened his cage if you're so strong and so far inside.' 'I was unable to do so. Unable to move one past the other guardian.' The words rang inside his head like dark bells, another guardian, other, his thought repeated. Was he taking him to a trap then? After he grabbed a cup and had only but a drink to moist his soul and lips, he returned to see what was he to do. 'Lead the way, let's just get on with it.' 'As you please.' Just after a quick return, Argus tried to shift his hand around his waist, to find any weapon at all, be it a tooth or not, there had to be something there. Anything sharp or blunt that would break him from behind, or crush it. Alphabetical ordered, seemingly, an endless supply on every word from every writer from the last twenty adjacent centuries and even further than that. The list went off on what they brought, ammunition but no weapons to load them in. The ancient swords and spears had their edges dulled so that they'd not be usable against it. Such was the plan all along, he was shown what he could have and be distracted by the fact that there was nothing of use to defend himself. So, he might be indeed a guardian then. Argus was fairly shallow now, through the body and mind. His muscles were as thin as they had ever been, being messed up at a cellular level. There were bits of skin which tried crawling deeper inside, as well and those that were falling. Pain brought him to his senses now that he touched and felt it alive once again. Each simple action brought a reminder of it, and one which would last for minutes and minutes more than that. 'How long them?' 'As long as it pleases you.' The first sight of a dome which seemed to have come from behind one of the bookshelves seemed to please him. It was too small to fit the behemoth, at least, that's what he thought. Even if he attempted to force himself in, he'd most likely just get stuck midway or even worse. One moment he flew to it as the mouth opened and before he could slide and go ahead, a hand just came right through and grabbed him. The immensity had only now become apparent. It wrapped and coiled and felt much bizarre as it crushed some of the blisters on his body with only but a soft touch. What followed was the thrust, forward, as far as Argus' body could be thrown. Through pain and gloom, he found himself fallen on the ground as the result of an unearthly fashioned motion. That thing bent its bones, to a point where a normal human being would've broken his hand if attempted. One hit was enough to push him in a recoiling state of which Argus tried to struggle away from. 'The pain, the pain.' He repeated in a tone which he knew it did not belong to him now. It was the embodiment of pain speaking as the pain he felt was way too strong and shallow for him to admit to himself. Even more than pain, he feared it now, after revealing its true self and purpose. 'My excuses but that part of the library is out of reach. None may enter it at any point or any resembling orifice.' Still, on the ground, the shock of the casualty it displayed through speech was enough to bring him to his senses. He had been hurt before, but now, this was harsh. It hadn't noticed yet, but as Argus now felt numb, under the light he noticed. Something had come on that hand which grabbed him. Little bumps and formations that had to belong to him instead of it. No burning hot black tips or small rounded marks of circles. Only fast forming patches and small liquid filled menacing bumps which threatened to spread. It's made of skin, that's it. 'He's just as vulnerable as I am.' Muttered Argus while he was on his feet, now walking alone in front of that thing. It kept a steady pace and didn't dare touch him anymore. Now his mark was left and there was no need to take him so fast now. Pain still continued creeping even there, in the dark. It wasn't as safe there, especially with him coming closer, bearing the only fragment of light. 'You may not go alone unattended, that's the other rule which lays here.' 'There was nothing which said anything about rules!' Argus replied aghast at the fact that it still treated him with a certain expectation. 'It's never too late to be informed, but this place has a certain conduct which must be followed.' 'Or else what? Will I become one of them kept in your lamp to burn for your damned vision?' 'It is not for me but for you. Look closer at my eyes.' At the edge of the shelf, where the path to multiple roads to walk, Argus crouched and looked. It stopped and brought the light closer to its eyes. Closer now, and getting even to a point where it was dangerously close. The outer rims and services of every edge would've made it seem like a maze, though there were no seemingly dead ends, as every piece of book holder was movable under a set of wheels. Ramps, metallic moving glances, distractions at best, as nothing else but a strong beast or a mountain could move them and get through. But even more than that, it was the apparent paleness and jerkiness they had behind them. That damn thing is blind. 'So you heard me.' And felt you just then. There could be no mistaking now if only I had a better sniff off your body when I had the chance. There'd be no mistaking now and nowhere to run. 'Am I hunted then?' 'Are you?' Shifting from shelf to shelf, a simple touch at the right place, the wrong timing made a lot of noise. The wheels turned under one of them and started moving to one side. It did much to reveal from one side to another where he was, what he did. 'You are a guest here but must you really overstay your welcome? Must I make the light perish at last and replace it once again?' 'They died because of you, because of your damned need for light.' 'And they'll suffer now for an eternity or at least under their bodies run dry of the liquor they have. Must I repeat myself then? There's no need for you to replace which still keeps on burning. Despite being fresh, moist, ready to burn to a crisp and be filled with icky and a carapace of black and blue. Your eyes would burn first!' It yelled as that boney hand just came around and pushed some shelves back. There was silence then. The torch it carried was placed as far behind as it could've been in order to hide the light. 'Afraid of the dark Argus?' It came with such a grin that it could be seen from the dampest depths in the dark. Only sounds now came into being as he waited to make a move. The placed objects were there for a reason and one alone, as a distraction and a way to encumber Argus. He'd fall or grab something he didn't want to, and his location would be jeopardised. It was so obvious that he got it immediately, to the point where he stumbled to crawl like a dirty animal rather than stand tall against it. I need a weapon that is sharp, he thought. One that could pierce his leg so I could run. 'There you are.' The stumbling legs came into being as it rushed. A tattered robe went flying above, leaving a dark shadow as it flew against the flame, one which came to the ceiling and covered the piercing plane model that now laid. It's coming and it's coming fast. There was no telling from which direction it could've been, yet in an attempt to guess, his hand grabbed a barrel and pushed it in the middle until it broke down. The lid wasn't there anymore to keep all the various shining metal marbles and the others. Argus threw as much as he could grab from around the area until he couldn't do it anymore. That's when he dropped and rolled to the side. It made a distinct unrecognisable sound which seemed to have been muffled by his expunged skin. There was at least a while until sound could be heard from the giant but at last, it came and tripped. A sound came as silently as possible as it crushed the box in its attempt to regain its footing. 'Where are you hiding worm? I have no time for games, you won't reach him, you know? Give up while you're ahead little-broken abomination. Can you not see what's happening here?' As those words were muttered, Argus was still cowering with both his hands above his head, just waiting for it to be gone. It hadn't come to the point of getting him yet. Does it even know where I am? He asked himself, but the answer was quite hard to answer. Whenever or not it was trying to toy with him before the murder, there was no saying. Each stepping leads him closer, to the point where those scent infused feet laid just beside Argus. Were it not for the dark, this would've been the end at last. Some shelves were moved at last, not as far but not close either. Those far reaching hands just grabbed from the stop where it stood and waited. It needed a last jab to see if he was there. What's it doing now then? 'I offer you this, something which he most likely never done. Argus, yes, I am aware of who you are and even more than that. Something which he never offered to give you lays in my hands and mine alone. A quick release from your torment.' The voice suddenly started crawling away as it moved the shelves behind of it. 'You will not even feel pain, none of them did before I turned them to ashes and burnt their bodies crisp. They will become nothing but charred remains and nothing of their broken bodies will be left behind. Did this happen to others? Even in the dark, the various spores and formed that had been going under his skin were obvious. It had gotten to a point which was too far gone to be repaired. Doubt came that it even cared for him. Memory dictated of the others he had met, the one that was stuck on the same road was just as much as a human once as he had been. 'Have I become him?' It was asked on the side of his palm, enough that it could hide it away. I can't return that way, the marbles and the metal plates would make too much sound and reveal where I am. I need to follow it instead. The mouth laid at the entrance and there wasn't much of a doubt that once it got made enough, it could return for the lamp. Blind, but the flame was hot, just enough that getting close enough to it, even if Argus was hiding, he'd scream for the pain. Little to none of the options, one came into his mind. Where the woman would've been repaid, Esther. 'Esther, I can't thank you enough for a part of you now.' There was another close call as he came around. A path should've to lead around unless he could attempt to climb. The edges were too steep and it was too hard to grab anything but a book. Even the top seemed to be too rough after the many times it was grabbed. But now he had a plan, one which could possibly reveal his way back and even play that thing in its abode. I need only to get there, Argus continued. His eyes started adapting, leaving behind both a curiosity and a fight for what would happen from now on once he came into contact with the light. There were books and more apparel, clothes and even standing statues there. Argus could see them as well as he could, almost to the point that for him they were standing in the daylight. The various forms waited rigidly and the only thing that moved into the distance was the shaking shelves moved from one side of another. A speech was mumbled, undoubtedly, an attempt to get at him whilst searching. How could it not hear me now if it was so precise before? If it knows the right direction, I will be damned either way. There wasn't any other way around it. He had by now a good deal of sight where to look just how far it came through. At least fifty meters laid in a good run, free of any debris or anything sitting on the road. Though his hiding spot was quite decent, there was something he had yet to try. It worked once, he thought, so it will most likely work once again. Grabbing a book from the shelf, he risked his life doing so and threw it as far as it could reach. There was a thundering sound but the mounting figure didn't do anything but continue going around. Before he could make a sound, he twitched and moved and found himself almost frozen. It found itself standing just by his side, a face standing there, bigger than had even been, watching and slow breathing. Perhaps, it could've been standing so close that the small beating heart could've been heard. The darkness didn't seem to be covering as much of it as it had done before, but now, he became apparent. Those giant fish eyes and steeply rounded face, something had already come over it. Shuffling was still audible in the distance, undoubtedly, this was another. A dumb look at least, an open mouth that was kept that way, as it caught a glance from rather aerial peaks. Luckily, Argus had been caught in the best position to stay, exactly where no one would try to reach. Is it just as blind or have I given my position away? The paleness made it quite obligatory to be suspicious of its intent and what it knew. Those eyes seemed to be looking quite intently at him without a pause or remorse. It was waiting, shimmering, shallow and pale. At once it started moving, in the same way, the other went, bearing the same dumb look it had once born. This one was slower, even when it failed an attempt to push one of the wooden blocks away, it had thoroughly failed since it was connected with the other adjacent bookshelves. Such figures roamed in the dark. Though this meant that, if it came the other way, it could've clumsily cleared what was on the bottom of the floor. Some period of gazing came as he focused on the ground. Argus could see them form around, the small tiny metal marbles spread as far away, with no barrel standing there. 'Obey.' Came a dumb voice from somewhere beyond, it wasn't hard to look above the shoulder and see the top of that grim hill just roaming around. I need to go now, Argus dictated to himself as he started glancing and finally decided to go. It was slow, like a beast, walking on both hands and feet, crawling as much as he could. His fingers were spread on all side so that he could put less pressure on each, while his feet only touched with the tips. This seemed to be quite a failure as he couldn't hold much to it, especially when risking such a manoeuvre had quite the chance to fail. Now, he came into as much of the fire as he could, deciding to just walk as soundlessly as he could, going just round, the original way he went through. The flame was still burning, though it was slightly hurting him with every gaze. Whenever it was the fact that he was getting more used to the dark or something of a fear that he might get there, he couldn't tell. It was avoided and he continued on the damn thing. He saw what there was the need for and gasped at just how fast it did it then. In the dark that meat golem-like abomination still kept a spreading smile across that damned face, knowing that it had smashed that worm and the only way to go ever further below. It heard that book reach the other side, that was obviously his thought. I will be trapped if there are others. And from the sight of it, the dome like mouth was as smashed inward as it could've possibly been. Without outer help, there was no way he could open it. Damn that thing and damn its helpers, I need to. 'We will see who get to do it first then.' From the nearest side, he started grabbing a hold of manuals, various history and fiction and other connoisseur's delight. Ripped and trashed, pulled away, he took the pages and made damp pages out of it, taking them to the fire, which promptly helped it become a small fireball in his hand. It dropped immediately in the pile and he could see the smoke rising up. It was a tick, that he almost choked to the point where he got away and started back. Some fresh air still came, as he took another deep breath and came back it, adding more fuel to the fire. The flame was almost so strong, that it joined the caged one reaching for the wood. Book after book fell and started forming a line of fire, a wall of fire immediately at his command. Soon, everything would be engulfed. If not for the realisation that the place was entirely filled with barrels full of firepower. One small mistake and everything would just blow away. He didn't care anymore about being heard, they were taller and able but could hear the flame going on just as well. It was quite late for that though, at it started spreading way too fast and out of control. The pandemonium was in full motion and the escape was the night. Why would it carry such a torch in a library then? It must've known this was about to happen. Argus thought of the innermost contingency plan it could've had, as secret as it could've been. Their life was to become forfeit most likely rather than give up the chance. 'Why did they let them stay there then?'Argus mumbled as he looked for a reason for the delayed destruction.'Worm, where are you hiding?'Came another set of voices which were looking.Whenever or not it was an insult, there wasn't any telling.Argus couldn't wait and risk that chance now, he'd been through too much already, his view adopted an entirely new area of sight, the smoke was chokingly getting to him.If not for those who rushed and came through, he didn't know what he would've done.A giant fell victim to the horror of fire, which in return finally lighted as far as he could see around.There laid a blunt spear on the corner, which he promptly grabbed.It wasn't enough to hurt one of them unless you'd count for the fact that those eyes, pale as they were, soft.Shrills of fear came into being as it fell on the floor and wriggled in a dark motion filled with pain.There was a shuddering approach as others were coming.Argus hid again by the corner and avoided the marching one.They were indeed as big as he remembered, but just as dull and reckless, leaving their posts.'Come one, come on, where could you be?'Asked, Argus, as he jumped around and found another.Smashed, with the dome suddenly forced to the bottom, still rounded, with its neck being shoved and almost pulled inside the ground.The rest of the entirety of the library, as massive as it appeared to be, wasn't much by the simple fact that he was looking for only a dome.Another condition just laid above, which could result, from the looks of it, in a rain of sharp pain and cuts.They were the blades from the war, all of which were hung above.If one flame goes to the ropes which were holding them and spread across the entirety of the ceiling, the death would come swifter than the explosion.The fire started spreading even faster, even with their attempts, the giant burning mass was visible even from distance, as the shadow left by the corpse just laid there.Where could you be?Each turn revealed even more meaningless toys and trinkets left for distractions, small machines left for entertaining, music boxes which he took and started, just to throw in random directions.Undoubtedly, they weren't looking anymore.A dead end came as he thought of safety and he had no choice anymore.Above the rafts laid just enough space for him to move.'I should've risked it then!'Said Argus in a furious tone.Just as he started to pull books, he threw them to the side, anywhere they could land they landed.And much more were thrown and pushed, just so he'd have enough space to push his feet and hands, though the rows were many and the burning sensation was disorienting.At once he was caught again mid-way standing almost frozen in what was soon to become the charred remains of his world.The dream of Esther was being sacrificed.Another stood by his side, blind, pale, in flammable robes, just standing as if it caught the sound of something.His hands were sweaty from all the waiting, and that dull face didn't give him much to go on.It might've not been as intelligible as the other had been, with that dumb stricken face left upon it.Up to that point, he was trying not to breathe too hard, even though the smoke was beginning to be felt.Fire devoured and it felt it as well, as it disregarded Argus and went on before it could attack.On the top now he laid, resting for a moment, looking where to go.The distance between him and the weapons above was still far too great and unfortunately, he had abandoned the spear below in order to climb the steps.Now with the better view and light, he could walk above, almost out of reach.Looking to see what happened, they were all coming to stop the fire and attempt to stomp it down.For the first time came an explosion not so far where he had been, a small burst of fire in that remote area which blew all the marbles around and some of the other passages.Despite that fact, one was still too far to be seen, being busy with the destruction of the domes.There wasn't any doubt which one that was, the main guardian as it seemed.Though he had the sight, he looked around, jumped and walked, until he reached the middle point of the region and managed to get a good look around and into every single corner his eyes might glimpse upon. They were no more, every corner and every single hidden one managed to be found and crushed. As he traversed the region, he realised why it had so suddenly stopped and turned. The fire blocked that dark corner in which it laid. One last dome, if it even existed had to be there on its side. And the worst part was that it waited there for him to come. Argus tried getting as fast, even to the point of jumping from side to side and even the smallest gaps between the moved rafts. It was a risk he assumed, falling, for he knew now that there wasn't any other way to escape or to run. One thing baffled him more, the fire was being stomped at one side. The Giants managed to sacrifice limbs and even far greater parts of themselves up to the point where they were burning and had used the liquor inside them to put it out. Smokes arise, just another set of fiery torment fell to that grim liquid inside those walking abominations. They had the possibility to end the fire, judging by their ability which emerged at a time most opportune for them. 'Why are you standing still then?' There was just enough between them for a few more steps to be had. It was no easy task to get through and sneak behind the many giants which had the group so tightly together. And in no way, would the fire just muffle the entirety of any possible sound. They hear me alright, Argus thought. Every now and an again, they turned their blind glance only to have him stay still. Was it the wind for them? Are they even aware? For Argus they looked like nothing more but mindless servants, looking to kill the afflicted. They waited around the fire in their sick little dances and waited, tattered robes and all. Many seemed to have been aware of it and more were coming from directions which weren't even possible to be. At least they were busy with something, leaving him to go and approach the last one. It was the most disturbing of all, to look upon that which had spoken to him and see him wait for him to make a move. He had been destroying and crushing in his path, moving and pushing as if they were nothing to him. Nothing at all. There must be a secret behind him, that must be it. Something that made him, unlike the other mindless slaves. He, the one who lit the torch and gathered the corpses of men, too many to count in that dark pile. Too dark now, it had become once the flame got to the point of being extinguished, but not without a great price. Their deaths would be counted, charred bodies, laying in front of that torch which still managed to burn even to this point. But everything around was left in a smoking pile of wreckage, tainted forever, or at least for the longest period that it'd get to be known. This approach left them standing, as he had seen, enough that he managed to stick the past and approach the closest he got. If I get any closer, he will see me. Argus muttered in a low voice. It was true enough that the area of sound gave them a far greater vision than his own in the dark. Yet, it still baffled him why that dark stillness now. What made it wait for him to make a move instead of coming and striking him now? Everything could've ended, if not for the last dome which had been crushed. Argus looked as much around as he could, to find nothing, none of them laid there unless hidden even harder than the others. If he'd been, it might've been a divine strike now that would end him. But they were beginning to make their move now, regardless if there was no escape or not, he jumped down, letting a thump be the sound of his arrival. It didn't matter if he was heard or not. 'This is it then, the final one.' His body seemed colossal. If he had been once human, this was the time to find out just how much empathy and mercy had been left. It could've spared the last one and something could be seen from where he stood. The stillness was unnerving. His dark gaze bore into that body and waited for a move, but as for now, nothing came. But for the next set of minutes, would leave Argus in a dark shock, out of which it may never leave. He leapt in front of the Colossus and wailed. At once he stopped once he realised that the last dome was safe and opened to him. No scratch and no mark left, even though those fists were ready even from the start. That body froze under the effect which had spread around his body at once. It was grim, dark, shallow, a gluttony of skin and corruption which had taken place and swallowed the entirety of that giant beast. Nothing else could be said, other than the words Argus muttered. 'I am sorry.' It was something of a pity to be looked upon, as it was, after all, his mistake. That touch alone had transferred some of the infection or the virus Argus had carried and managed to make the humanoid form into something of a fungus, torn and pushed. Bones and legs became almost liquid as they touched the ground. The body kept coming apart by every second, up from the splintered fingers of the once burnt hand which was now falling apart entirely. 'Is this what will become of me?' To Argus, this was an image of the effect which would come into motion just after he had come there, into the depths. A cold gust of air was coming already as his call. And it wouldn't be long until the others would become just as infected as he became. 'I will.' But it ended before it could even properly begin. Nothing came into his mind to say, he was the enemy, perhaps human once, forced into submission as he was. And this is where the hill turned and he came inside before the sightless gaze came into being. Everything was muffled in the dark as he could feel himself both falling and walking at the same time. Something made him look deeper and see through another layer of darkness. Argus was now piercing the veil and could clearly see through the floating fragments and small beings which floated around at every time. Perhaps a gift or not, he could lose not seeing with the help of a reflective ring that his eyes were beginning to change as well. Those visions of beasts and monsters which were following Esther seemed to be more comforting. A fair being with a fair chance, which only did what was needed, to look upon her and be gone. Despite how comforting their memory remained, there was something which made him still remember who he was, what he used to be. His memories are what made him human, and what brought him here, to begin with. Long, in the past, the knowledge of the existence turned him into the best candidate to begin the journey and release it from there. Despite how close the others came, none of them knew what the stakes were as they weren't ready to go through and sacrifice everything they had. The voice hadn't spoken with them either as much as it did to him, which was already bizarre. Chosen directly, he stooped as much through as he could, tumbling as the worm tingled and tightened, leading him to an ending dome. 'Is there a maze then?' Not even an echo could be heard anymore, but for the sound of his blinking eyes. There was something lurking, it had been there for a while, following him directly at every corner of the edges of his eyes. It disappeared just in time. When he turned, he could swear he saw it get thin and hide between two rings, twisting the body just to hide. A simple task remained and now his mind was getting to the point of breaking. Everything he passed through had the solution come to him when he needed most, almost to a point where he doubted it was him who did it. Another open domed, though it was the last one which I have gotten the chance to get to. Is it even true? Nothing so far was doubted, despite how out of the ordinary and fantastic some of it appeared to be. But before now, Argus had it all. The dome opened at the end. There wasn't any other worm that would eat or bite through or any other type of damp penetration that would've managed to push it to that point. It was a secret that he was there, once it opened, he realised. This was the maze, though the sketch was wrong, oh, how very wrong. 'This is amazing.' Argus said, knowing that he was there, almost alone. A tall creature awaited, seemingly not as dangerous as the others. It tended to the very rubbery veil that they had as they seemed to have infested everything around. Long, blue, old, almost jerky worms seemed to have come and bore through every corner and part of the ceiling, including the above and the bottom of the floor. Argus stood now on a flat platform which had its edges just ending around the corner. There was a dead drop at least a thousand feet below, leading to a white mist, through which low standing worms were creeping undoubtedly. Even their heads or domes were so much stronger and easier to get through, having edges extend at least to every side, being easier to open by hand. Their forms vary, as being taller, small, pushed, thin, some which were, unlike the others. It could lead anywhere, and perhaps even to the bottom where it laid waiting. Undisturbed by the living thing, Argus studied it from farther away. It bore a mechanism attached to the neck, having a small block shoved in the chest which popped out unlike any other part of the body. It was made out of metal, though organic on the outside, how it moved constantly on the metal, receiving and keeping the motion until it pushed out a pair of bulbs to see. They immediately came back and went again in that motion. The rest of the body was thin, tall, slender with its pointy sharp claw-like hands which kept something of the human side. Through the mask, nothing could be seen, though it had notice Argus too. It paused its motion and studied him as well. The fact that he just pushed his arms by the side as well as his legs in order to reveal as much as he could don't do much to help his case. Once he was done, that thing came back to its task, moving another pair of almost invisible, a transparent pair of hands around each ring of a worm. They were vibrating under those motions, up to the point where another look would make them appear as being alive. It was a shallow promise, to say the least, to get through and expect to be safe. It tended them as if they were its babies, and he was a foreign organism after all. Be it that it was once a human or not. Clearly, as he moved, by their side, it somehow made, these immobile being uncomfortable. The many heirs over their bodies could be seen, is a way of transportation of not. Many of them were smashed because of him at one end, perhaps even infected or burned to a crisp. And anything was beyond their protection or even desire. They were trapped there. Argus hadn't notice, though, despite his attempts to be as silent and remain at unaware, he was watched again. 'I won't hurt them, you know?' The words fell on dead ears if it even had them, this slave of their desire. A silent thing that did their bidding. It didn't dare approach, even to the point where a few steps towards it did the opposite. Slowly, it retreated despite having the advantage of height. And most disturbingly, was the thing on its chest and how it moved analogously of its body. It was clearly not belonging to it, a proto creation which seemed to have long been unable to work. Once he bit his upper lip with his jaw, he understood exactly how it felt and why. Something must've been placed through him as well as it was forced on me. Though now there was no time to judge or to be curious. There were too many paths to go below and plenty that might lead him to somewhere else. Only one mistake was needed and his doom would finally be nigh. This tall caretaker was useless, to say the least, being afraid of its own shadow despite its size. 'I must find a way to go through the right one.' Said Argus, despite the fact that there wasn't any way to truly know. Unless it followed the same way like the writing had said when it had guided him before. There had been holes which had been filled when he was hunting for a pale thing filled with ink. Only one had been real and undoubtedly, this might've followed the same pattern as before. The chance was almost as real as he made it, looking around for any difference or any chance in the bottom of the floor. With a bit of luck, some golden dust might've been sprinkled on the rock, if he had reached this far. Though he knew about the worms, the old man might've known much more than he had shown. Indeed, they looked quite tainted on a look, this time, having a part of their bodies going as far underground as there'd be a death fall. This he hadn't planned for, at least to the point where he wasn't sure what to do. Argus felt confident but not invincible, he was far from it. Even now, the mark which was left by that hand which grabbed him still lingered there. Pain still coursed through his body, despite the fact that the grip was released a long time ago now. 'Which one could be?' After going as much around as he could, Argus noticed none of it being any different than the other, nor anything else around them. It was already hard as it was for him to make this choice, but now, now he was pressed. 'You, I need your help.' Argus continued as he pushed the creature farther behind. Fear could be seen in those small, pink rounded eyes, behind the leathery mask. The marks where one had embroidered it became obvious which each step that was taken towards it. At once it became so consumed with fear that it pulled that metal plate out of its chest and left it on the ground. Now, it could move a lot more freely, faster than it had even been. Even to a point where it had been forced into a flight out of his sight. Knowing nothing else, Argus approached, looking where it could be. Though now, it would take too much to find where it was hiding, since he found out how big they were, too big to be used only for transportation. There might've been something more to them than the normal eye was shown. Regardless of that, Argus came to the block of skin and metal, grabbing it by the sides with much care. It was smaller than he expected, though at least as wide to look like the tablet of a prophecy. Nonetheless, this brought a dark memory which he attempted to forget. His jaw jittered on what that snail-like creature that had been hosted inside acted and attempted changing like. At once, it tried imitating too much of what it felt touching now. Eyes, a mouth, a nose, multiple attempts just came on that flat block. Neither of them knew how to act properly or even close to the natural thing. Eyes didn't properly close, the mouth couldn't be open, not to mention the fact the teeth were just begging to be forced outside. It had failed to replicate as Argus dropped it and left it on the ground. A desperate attempt, it was, as a small hand almost came from this portal-like block of skin. I tried coming closer until Argus pushed the blunt side of his shoe over and twisted. The sound which came out of the closed mouth and nose was one too mechanic to resemble anything that would've come out of the lung. Soon, it retreated and reverted and he walked away just as much as it would be possible, taking a spot to hide until it came to retrieve what it had. I must get out of this place already. Argus thought, but each time he said it, a bit of his faith fell. Just as much as it did now, looking how this poor creature made him shiver with the fright of what his future just might be. It came from side to side, almost leaping in a dance once he was out of sight, at once retrieving what it had, just to reconnect it to the missing spot. It had born a damp hole inside the chest and from the looks of it, a good job in digging flesh, bone and organs. A sacrifice at least was needed, though he still hadn't found what was needed. Around there, still laid the same mundane rock to the bottom, pale but true, nothing different, other than the thin layer of mist which had been forming for the past minutes. It made it difficult, though not impossible to find where it was laid. Same type, same crack. Another one that looks the same, could it be the dome? There was another small hypothesis he had, making it clear to himself that the answer might've been the closest to his eyes unless he was wrong all along. Clearly, they opened when he approached, the memory, as it happened before, made it too clear already. And none of the others so far even did show a sign that they were even alive. This had to be the answer he was looking. His hand at once brushed over a dome and felt just how strong and sturdy it was. No wonder that some of them were just pushed deeper in the library's floor. There wasn't any other way for some, to break the access, other than restricting it. At least, judging from what he'd seen, they were night-unbreakable. Some way had to bring him closer to an answer. Weariness and pain came with a stronger impulse as he approached the right way. Argus thought he knew it all, every single answer and every turn so far. They all seemed a lot easier than they had been, even to the point of arrogance and fear. I was punished so much that I have no desire to return. Even if he thought that way, he wanted to go on for a reason he was not entirely aware of. Something compelled him to banish any idea of self-inflicted pain or taking his own life. What he wanted now was to open the cage and witness what was about to happen. So far he went, that seeing it open was a mystery on its own. He searched and went through so many to see one open, a shiny, almost colourless dome which just laid there for him. As he was about to go through, he saw through the reflection, that trembling thing creature trying to touch and stop him. Argus turned and swept at its hand, making it suddenly start retreating backwards. Without looking where it could go, it tripped on the longest tail he had seen and fell. The chest smashed itself even deeper and a slight shimmering sharp sound came out before both of the hands fell by its side. 'What was your purpose then?' It seemed quite strange how much it had failed, even more so if it was intended for it to be another guardian, which he expected to be no less than the others. As a last requisite, he came to it and pulled the block of metal, with quite a bit of effort at least. Luckily the body was stiff as a board, moist even upon the removal. And they were even close to the edge and into the mist filled pit which laid below. Seeing how important, yet strangely bizarre it acted, he threw it away. This way, he knew that another thing wouldn't be growing or corrupting the place. It was obviously dead now, the broken rib cage and revealed organs didn't do much for its case. Other than that, he was now content on leaving and not looking back. 'Familiar, isn't it?' A voice came as he entered what seemed or he hoped as being the final tunnel he'd have to go through. 'You were supposed to be gone out of my mind, weren't you?' 'We may never leave, even if we may sit silent and wait for the next command to be told. Else, you may sit and rot. Don't you know already, the real reason why you've come here in this condition?' The voice said with quite a harsh, commanding tone. There was something about it which made Argus follow and listen to it, but what exactly, he wasn't sure yet. Familiarity wasn't enough after all to excuse hearing voices especially in the place where he stood. 'And what was I intended for exactly?' The rings weren't as comforting now that they were getting lower and soon, it was revealed that indeed, there was a deep fall that could crush him if he failed to grab a ring on each side. 'Have you failed to understand that the lock is alive? You were always supposed to be corrupted and carry the virus to the lock. And at the time, it would've died of the infection, releasing the endlessly caged one.' The words seemed to carry no lie behind them, though that might've been the side effects of hearing it in his mind. Argus knew that something wasn't right, and from the beginning, the threats, the fact that he knew well that he would die in the end didn't make any of it easier. 'What did you plan then?' 'We were already in motion before you came, trying to break through and become part of it. Become its cage and in time devour him wholly.' Another set of voices came and he stalled. 'But you came and everything changed. You've taken our place and now, you've inherited our desire.' 'Do not worry Argus, for, it may manifest in time and soon you will wish to have what we want and wanted for the very first time.' His shirt was ripped by both sides and he started gripping two of the rings on each side, see if the pain would persist even if he had the lowest of protection. They left him to advance, he tried to ignore them until they would go away like they did before. Regardless of what it wanted him to do and what was truly the last lock, he knew that it was better to see with his own eyes rather than wait. Either way, killed once it was freed or rotting there to free it, remained the same. There wasn't any chance he was going to do this and still be the same. It worked, at least in theory. As he approached the hole, the thought of it still started to fumble in his mind. Such a desire, he had never felt, to listen to it or to them? Which one would I serve and why must I be the force to do it? I can answer my own questions now, seeing how none of them is here to help me in my direst hour. Almost in a shout, Argus began. 'I never wanted to come down here. Obviously, you can't hear me, as you would've done something about what I'm supposed to do. Bloody rags and bloody caged king, none of this was worth it for me. I'm a damn monster now, without any chance of returning to others unless I want to be stuffed, hanged and burnt. Wouldn't be the first time that happened, has it? Oh, how could I forget? No one is ever heard to talk or be responsible when I am the one who needs it!' So, in this feeble attempt, he plunged but failed to grab any ring at all. But, it wasn't because of the factor that each ring was covered in its specific substance and slipperiness. The matter of the fact remained that he had no other way to get down there safely now. Could this be it? 'No, I will not die here, it's not that easy.' Argus had stopped caring as much about his life as he once did, trying his best to get there, even to the point of changing his body position so he could plunge even faster. This became a flight, more so that a simple fall and plenty of space just laid there for him to use. A light was at the bottom at least, sparks of it came into being. It was painful to look at first, now that his eyes weren't as strong anymore, making him as teary eyes as he would be, but nonetheless, the light was more than fairly welcomed now. The fall stopped abruptly by a gust of wind coming from below. Some transparent and almost invisible bubbles of a certain thing imitated the cold and slowed him down to the point of remembering. It used the same method as those devices. The first thought Argus had about the entire ordeal. But whatever it had to do with it, he couldn't say. Now he was in a land which was unknown to him or to any human eyes. Making out in the distance, the land was covered too much in light to be seen. Only a small fraction of the bottom could be seen. 'Green grass.' Argus said as he reached below and started pulling out as much as he could see. It even managed to smell like the other thing. The lack of darkness was disturbing now, yet he couldn't complain. No sky at all, but emptiness here and there without any real way to go. Behind him laid what seemed to have been a tear into space, in which laid the blackness, vividly as it was missed. Soon, after a walk, he's got to forget it was even there and miss it, forever. To say the least, it was soft and pure, almost wet in a way. Argus could grab a hold and feel small balls of light, at least in a way, glowing. This thing lays everywhere around me. The texture was too bizarre to point out, too fuzzy, almost like a furry thing of white and pale blue. No amount of pressure seemed to hurt it to throw it in despair. At least until a few more spots suddenly crashed the entire thing. It was almost as if a morbid Titan stepped on it, revealed just how thin and weak was the floor. No one must've stepped in a century at least, as there wasn't any explanation how far away suddenly the white ground fell into the ground. It was the abyss, covered and pushed with cogs and pipes, multiple, infinite or at least as far as he could see. These were the bones it bore. Suddenly, as he turned around and looked about just how peculiar the tear looked like, Argus realised that this wasn't where he was supposed to be. The tunnel did stop there and he was slowed down, but this wasn't finished. Only the bottom of the hills and the wooden substitute laid somewhere lost in the mist of white and those floating furry things which never sweat. Some of them were being pulled or just fell now into the magnum hole which laid now creeping because of him. Frames of metal, long enough, sharp and sturdy kept the rest of it standing still. Yet it was peculiar for him to look at the bones and body of the cage and realise just how much human it looked like. They even rusted and did work. At least, there wasn't any excuse anymore for him or for anyone else to complain now, once he was done, everything would be taken apart and. And. They did look particularly human. 'Doesn't it make you wonder?' It was almost appealing, the fact that he was thinking the same thing as the parasite had said it. It wasn't as strange as it sounded, that it might've been trapped by other humans who decided to rebel against it. Even more so, a human that would get to break its bonds. 'Do not go any further if you want to keep your life.' 'Do I have any choice then?' So far I've been pushed and dragged, this isn't my first fall you know? I'm more than certain that this may be just another trick it has, trying to make me turn around and find another slow way. 'How certain are you?' The way it spoke made Argus trust it, as much as he could judging the circumstances. He was alone and didn't want to feel so. 'You may be right, there's no amount of strength left in me to avoid or climb them.' 'Look even closer then.' As he looked, forcing himself to look through the dark, despite having such an infinite amount of light, this puts a migraine on his mind. One single excruciating pain which pushed and pulled as much as it could. There was no end as far as he could see. 'If there's a way out, it must be here, hidden. Close your eyes and remember, it might overlap the way ahead and you may find a way out.' This time he just complied without asking any question or trying to defy the command in any possible way. His breath was even, so were his heart beats. The sudden pressure intended by the light over his eyes suddenly went away. And now, he was back into the town of his childhood, upon opening his eyes. Quite twisted, to fit inside, and the crater still laid in there, comforting that he could see it at least. He bathed now in the twilight sitting. Just watching the moon and standing me the part in which he almost fell. There were others there which moved, walked and kept doing their errands despite being just what they were. In a way, they were comforting to look at, knowing with the utmost certainty that they weren't human or anything even close to that. Did they know that too? Would they care if they knew? It was curious to speculate, and even more fun for him to mess with the pitiful creatures, that if there was just enough time. None of them seemed to mind the crater, despite the fact that it wouldn't be the first time that happened. The other side of it was the fact that none seemed to mind what he looked like. This was nothing like his memory he experienced before on the way here. A lot more different in many other ways, to say the least. Stone felt like stone, a heavy path laid below, now he could freely walk without being disturbed. At least not in the traditional sense of the word. Seeing some familiar faces which have died in his past was quite strange, though he had been getting used to the idea. Still, he walked on the busy st. Sinclair steers without being disturbed or even looked by gazes which would've normally revealed fear or even alienation. None of it was there, in a way, making it the perfect place for him to be. Never rushed, nothing forced, all felt fine and from the likes of it, the entirety of the town was remade, brick by brick, stone by stone and even to the smallest details which he couldn't remember. Gaps were filled from the depths of his subconsciousness, which he never could've truly remember before. The masonry on some buildings, for example, seemed too pure and sculpted in a way that he couldn't have remembered as a child. It was painful to go away now, from all of this, hearing their voices while standing just around the corner. 'Yes? It won't do if we go now, we need to wait for him to make his own choices.' Eavesdropping was quite the lowest he had gotten to get, though there was a need for it now, just to be able to check on them and just how further away they were going with it. Words slipped out of their mouths, yet Argus was never there to hear those two people talk by the side lamp. 'Tayla's the one to blame in all of it, she's the one who pushed him to do it. If someone's to be punished, she should be gone first.' Looking by the side of the street, he held himself by the corner, against a tall grim blocky building. Just around two people stood by the entrance talking, exactly the two he had been listening for a while as he was waiting. Others were bound to appear at any time, even to the utmost peculiar hours and dispositions. This way he'd be approached, the lowest of the low, pretending to stand by. It worked in a way. Some glances were being thrown, as he was seen as an outsider, looked like one, soon he'd be treated like one. Some words were being muffled, not so far from him, they must've been caught up with what was happening. They were walking just in front now, having been done with the conversation. A grave-like glance came from the woman, one could even see the rage and fertility she muttered underneath her big brow and a big lipped husband who was just following like a stray dog. She wasn't going to scold him yet, the intention was still being shown right in front of his eyes. That's a woman who'll keep even the pettiest action for vindication. Now he knew what she looked like and he could avoid her. There wasn't any denying in the viciousness the women here displayed or even just how far they'd go. 'I wouldn't do that again if I were you.' Just as he turned from that petty creature, he encountered a figure which he had known a long time ago. Truthfully, he was a lot older, for they have met in his late endings of his adulthood, there weren't any denying in those features seen on that face. Long cheeks, the same unshaved beard and moustache, which were a lot smaller and less wide, big stuffy brows, a brownish look on his face and the red on his cheeks. The holes which had always been present reminded him always of beehives. 'Dimitry.' 'You know who I am?' This was obviously a ruse made by higher powers than his own. There it was, someone who had gotten used to and admired, yet he didn't even know he existed. Their meeting never happened, as he was still a child, most likely now. Not in this body at least, but in this exact period of time. 'I'm sorry, I must've confused you for someone else.' 'No, no, no, my name is Dimitry. Are you sure you weren't looking for me now?' 'Certain. Now, if you'll excuse me, I have somewhere I need to be. Have a good night.' 'Wait.' He turned just to take another look at those puffed cheeks and stay to listen. 'I just needed to tell you.' The man continued, taking a gulp down his throat as if he was holding something in there which needed to be swallowed. 'Careful of old mistress Willow, she's quite the woman now, though I can't say the say of the way she tends to pay what she owes to people. Do you catch what I'm trying to say?' 'Don't worry, I'll be fine, I'm more than able to take care of myself.' 'Fine, just wanted to make sure, that's all.' It was fair to say that some of the man's mannerisms were borrowed by Argus in the later years. It was rather in the way he walked and moved his hand swiftly by his side. He wasn't as bad as others thought him to be, though Argus was assured to be more than fine. 'Thanks.' It flew just by as he walked away though, which the chance of not even been heard while they were walking from one another. No time to chat or check everyone else here. The mission was clear, or at least as clear as one could make it. Find the exit, just to get to another frustrating place with other distracting commotion. 'This may be a long shot.' For a second, it was pleasant to be able to speak in open, to feel the air and be unmistakably free to do whatever he desired. No one was around in sight, as the road was just curved not so far from where he stood. And the fact that it was close to midnight, most likely as he presumed, meant that he would be alone for some time, but for a few exceptions. Closer to the door, he went up the steps and felt the masonry with his hand. It was clean, pure, even had a scent that was hypnotising, which almost dragged him away from doing this. Nonetheless, Argus took a head start, from where the stairs ended, there were just a few meters between the flat stone floor and the door. With that in mind, he almost charged and kicked the door just as hard as one could. It gave away immediately under his strength. The lock was busted and it almost opened as one would normally do, except the cracks and the marks and the damage left outside. There was also the fact that loud sounds seemed to be made, both from this action and from upstairs. Someone's bound to come. Argus quickly jumped to the side and slid into the corner. It was just a few steps away from where he was eavesdropping that he peeped and saw that it had aroused suspicion. A man with a blue buttoned shirt and a big belly underneath was coming. This was a man that he had seen as a child, and peculiarly, had followed him through most of the trouble he had been through. His name was something close to Olive, Oliver or something close to that. He'd notice the strike first if he didn't see the pair of eyes that were just sitting around. At once he jumped back up, without even bother to go up the stairs. Having made an almost hash feat, he was surprised at himself as he went on. No bridge would stop him, no door would hold him now, with just the brushing aside, it wasn't as unnoticeable but it had to do as it was. The door closed easily, the locks still worked. Now he only needed to hope that none of those who were upstairs made any noise. 'Who just might you be there?' Argus had remembered that those two had left, leaving quite the feat of rage hidden behind their eyes. But another one leaving with them? That seemed more, childish. In this realm of theirs, he had noticed it by the side, a group of formed toy soldiers just sitting there, midway into a fight. There were former ones that were destroyed or smashed, yet none of the other toys seemed to be kept in a better shape than them. It's their child upstairs. A dangerous idea came, to silence the brat, if he'd see him, there'd most likely be a scream. For now, nothing happened, no immediate danger as the peril didn't come into motion. Though there was a light upstairs now, that was way too obvious to be waited through. If the window was just as clear and open, he'd just go by it and talk to the officer about the sounds. Still, some time remained as he wasn't the best or the fittest for his job. Slowly, Argus went, feeling no creaking on the bottom floor. The stairs were slow, though he walked on them in a manner which soon became a crawl. His hands and legs both took on the task as he was approaching the mark. There was the corridor, with plenty of rooms, closed but only the one at the end was lit the obvious one. I need to knock that child out and close the light before he noticed. One thing Argus had forgotten, which was to close the door. 'Shite!' It almost bore through him that he had forgotten such an important thing to do. Now that there would be consequences which he might not be able to know, he was poised to do a mistake. 'Slay the child, why won't you? It will take rather less than a second.' The taunting of the voice would soon make him too reckless if he waited. In the innermost depths of his mind, he thought, he knew. He needed to go now and twisted the knob. 'Of course, it's locked.' Argus waited, holding his breath, trying to hope that the kid hasn't found out who it was. 'Who is it? Mom? Dad?' There were no words to be said that would be understood by the child. As an obvious intruder seeking for a way in, this wasn't the best approach he took. 'Who's there?' It was a boy, judging by the voice, young. At least, smart enough to close the door, this was to be a shot in the dark. And without even some space taken behind in order to get a free strike, he kicked the door again, knocking the lock. Surprisingly easy, as it was just pushed off, knocking the kid off by its own to an ever greater surprise. Though this was no time to sit on it and watch. The lamp was there and with just the flip of a switch, it was dark. 'Sorry kid, this had to be.' Right about the window, the officer just looked around and saw nothing of interest. Whatever Argus did to the door didn't seem to bother nor to interest the passing man. Something must've been happening elsewhere, as for a glance out of the window revealed something which had driven the man into an almost desperate attempt to reach the other side of the town. There wasn't any sound or anything peculiar that could've signalled something as big as the deed he had done, yet Argus found himself perplexed. I need to follow that man, was the most obvious attempt at a thought he had. Where there was trouble now, somehow he found himself in the middle of it, just coming through. It didn't help much that some acted beyond what he remembered, or even that he hadn't even found out when this was. This has always been an old town, no brick was replaced, the same people lived here for generation after generation, to the point where the old people aged with their homes. A common habit which brought communities together, at the point of some of them taking it too much to an extreme. What bothered him the most was the waiting. It wasn't such a long jump, from the window on the second floor to the stairs below, but now this wasn't the time to get dull. There was no one other inside or outside now to see him, as he did find out. No one saw him get out of the door from a house which didn't belong to him. Though, it was obvious that the child wouldn't be quick to forget what happened then and there. His face was quite distinct, not to mention that his parents got to see him quite well enough to describe him. 'I won't stay that long kid, hear me?' Just above, there was only but a chance that the knocked child heard that low attempt of taunting Petty, but this was the best chance to go with it, as for knowing that he wasn't going to be found afterwards. There was a further need to find out what was going on. On his way, he found himself passed by just another group of people who just appeared from nowhere and disappeared from around the corner. It was surprising to say the least, that so many of them were active at night, not to mention how they acted, spoke and passed him. There were some disturbing whispers he had got to get a hold of while they walked. Surely, Argus wasn't able to keep up with them, but at least he heard them say that right. 'Someone blew the bottom of St. Vindikus street off.' It was something quite surprising, at the point where it even is a spectacular turn of events. Another hole he thought, and if they found a way to explain this one, they would soon find the other. This could even extend to them being on alert for everything at all. It wasn't that far now, that he found them, a few officers holding the few people that bothered to come from as far as they could. As for the area of the town, this wasn't as inhibited as the others were, the slums of it. Dirty bricks and rotten doors, this was the point where some decided that growing old with in their houses wasn't enough. These have become their graves, a cemetery that was either rotting or decaying in front of their eyes. Something must've been done a long time ago if it weren't for a mysterious thing which managed to keep the stench and reek of the damned inside this area. Now, half doused by the smell and the sight, they were still curious. Just as well as Argus was, looking through and trying to figure out what exactly was it then? A slight intrusion which became apparent. Standing there and pretending to be just a normal townsfolk, he succeeded in looking just by the shoulder and see it. Quite a slope going through as to dig under the bricks on the paved floor, down to reveal the dirt, though more importantly a rounded, coin-like door, embed and carved. That's my ticket out. It was quite lucky that he found this and now, the only problem being that he couldn't find a way to open it, even if somehow he managed to get rid of all the people. From this point on, it was a free entry way to every side of the town. Every building was separated just enough for him to get through and get anywhere he wanted. Even to his childhood home, though it'd be meaningless now that he had achieved something greater. 'All right now, move away, there's nothing to see, hear me? I've had enough of you rascals try coming here and throw queer glances at what we're doing here.' The simpletons abide, though some of them still attempted to stay and look at the peculiar thing they were doing. Someone was being escorted there, a dusty man that seemed to be just as old if not older than the officer. As quickly as he was seen, with a jolt, everyone who stood in the way was pushed. The man was given as much freedom as one could receive. There wasn't any resisting from Argus as he was pushed with the others. No other way of acting natural was there, other than face the same thread and get the same treatment as they were getting. 'Officer, who's that fellow over there and why is he getting let through?' 'That's our expert and I can more than declare that. Well, he's more than experienced to handle in this type of situation. 'It was already the point where that dark stench revealed something in human hiding in it. Something out of this world, perhaps out of the innards of where they stood came into being just to watch and hide. Again, that smell appeared to be a dead giveaway of the damned. 'Just show us what we got there. We are the people who live here and demand you to show us what's that. 'I'm sorry sir, but I've got no reason to accept your demand. We've got no way to figure out whenever or not it's dangerous to get near it. 'You, keep your distance. 'Said the other cop who stood adjacent to the other. They were forming lines and nothing really seemed to pass them, be it a word or a smaller man who was bold. 'Could this be an invasion?' 'Don't be a fool man, it's nothing of the sort. Just wait for our expert to have a look and stay behind the line. Can you handle that?' The worst time to think about it, yet Argus just thought how he'd fall behind any suspicion, now that everything would be covered up. As they were busy keeping the lines in check, none of them managed to find the mysterious man who trespassed and knocked the child. It will be almost like I was here all the time. No one saw Argus arrive and there was also doubt that anyone would notice his sudden absence if all of the sudden he decided to sprint away into the distance. Though the idea of this expert coming through with his brown leather and rounded white safari hat raised some eye brows. Some doubt was apparently there, for everyone who looked at the peculiar attire he had. Nonetheless, he white hair, a moustache and a beard, accompanied by a medium build and a giant scar across his face. From one side to another, it was quite obvious why he needed a cane to walk. He spoke no word and didn't even bother to look at the crowd. For him now, there was only one objective which was apparent, looking at what seemed to wake up all the glances. The lights from some houses started lighting up. It was quite obvious that everyone whispering, talking or making any type of noise, arouse the suspicion of others. At least in the near and the ones around, a glance behind revealed that they were more behind. A shy kind of folk which stood by the fence or hid just around the corner to eavesdrop at the crowd. Some took even more of a precaution to be hidden from sight. What could be this important? There was not a single moment in his memory that he heard of a small crater with a rounded door just popping out of the ground. Henceforth, this had to be related with the next entrance. It can wait for now. 'That's it, start going away, start taking steps. 'Fate appeared to be taking decisions for him and the other now that they found themselves walking away as the expert was on it. The man appeared to be small in comparison with it. Even smaller under the row of officers, wearing the blue and the one strip of red. If it wasn't for that hat and the feathers, they would've had an even meaner demeanour. Undoubtedly, this was the reason they retired the old uniform. No one around felt like they were menacing or anything of the sort. Just quite bizarre in the way they acted and looked. 'Here, I think I've made a discovery. 'Said the crone, in an almost peculiar timing, everyone turned and started approaching, slightly pushing the officers further in as they started closing. 'That's enough. 'Came the shout, it wasn't meant to do much anyway, not that it would've mattered. For their curiosity was now aroused. Nothing bounced back, nothing came in, nothing could bulge it still. The old man tried to wrap his hands around it to no avail. 'It is a gate, and from the looks of it, this may be the vault in which someone his treasure. Perhaps the old war councillor J. Robert?' One of the men in the small formed circle intervened. 'One of the founders of this town who's said to have won a war by himself and taken everything they had to make this town?' 'That one. Good observation on that on. 'Wait, wait wait for a moment. Step aside. 'The officer pushed the others in order to thin out the line. After that, he returned to the man and got closer to him. 'How could you be sure of legends and fairy tales at a time like this? It's never even proven he exists." Wrong. It's undoubted that his existence could be denied by any of the historical canals. Perhaps his feats may have been exaggerated quite out of proportion but this doesn't change the fact that this might as well be the vault in which he hid everything he had. "And what makes you so sure now? It could be something dangerous, tell me at least now, doc. How come it just suddenly popped out of the ground like this." Actually. The man took out his safari hat revealing a flattened mullet of white colour. Only after that, he continued. 'You see, the sides reveal quite the opposite. It wasn't the wall that fell but the street itself sunk underground because, well. There might be a hallowed part under the ground, just look at the dirt now. It's too perfectly tilled, no worm, no bug, not even the roots have come this far. If it were the sudden normal mud, there might've been something to show that it just fell below. At least onto some of the bricks. Now just look at them, clean, some of which have come even to the point where they stand there almost as if they belong. There wasn't anything wrong happening around. The sight of Argus had left the crowd for a while, though beyond his care the events still went ahead as planned and intended yet to be. 'Locked I say, perhaps even unmovable. "How can you tell professor?" It's a simple thing. The gate appears to have been designed in a way to block outside access. The obvious scratch marks appear to be simple attempts by previous people who tried as well as others who desperately pushed to get it open. "Which resulted in?" The officer seemed to still miss the point. It was getting to the utmost obvious of points. Locked inside with his own treasure, waiting for something else to come. I doubt there's anything else but a rotting corpse inside with a couple of doubloons. "A murder then, could that be indeed the case?" Not at all, in the worst case scenario, it'd be nothing else but a mild attempt of suicide. Not to mention that it might've happened quite a few hundred years before we even knew about it. 'There was a thorough attempt which seemed to have been in the process of doing. Something was still off. 'Do you think we can top off the edges and blow off the gate?' I wouldn't rule it out of the realm of possibilities sir. Though can we really afford to speak the next step with so many of them surrounding us? It may be dangerous and perhaps even to the point of it getting out of hand, we cannot afford to spend more time thinking about the next step with them around. The officer nodded, with a trifling look on his face. There was a response, almost an understanding between them, from one officer to another, a glance which was given and received. 'All right, it's time for all of you to go, there's nothing else to see around around. 'Suddenly, more and more started getting pushed and forced back to resume their activities, with the exception that they couldn't do so anymore. Such remained the problem with a blocked road and ongoing operations. No one had the care or the need to care for laymen, this was the current, most important thing they had to be taking care of, without any exception or even attempt to handle the others. 'So, one more thing doc, paint me curious if you will. Why did it happen all of the sudden then? I understand the hollow thing but the timing of it still fails to make any sense to me. "Oh but that's the most interesting part Braxton. It's the fact that there might've been a scoundrel just going around, roaming under unnoticed by others. "A murder, or a thief then?" Don't be so rush to find someone who hasn't done anything as of yet. It could be no one and perhaps nothing more but a tomb rider. Perhaps one who fancied himself more than he can chew. "It'd be possible then that the tunnel collapsed on him right?" It's not out of the realm of possibility I'd say. The night was still dark. 'May I suggest that we head down to each of our roads and return at the first hour in the morning?' Strange, I was about to suggest the same thing, really. Perhaps the night has something to do with my judgement, I'd say. "Very well, we can proceed further investigating what happened here after your men block the area. I shall be here at four in the morning, bearing a tea cup and one mug of coffee. May I count on you to be there?" You may, doc. Thank you again for coming, especially this fast and at this hour. "Worry not my friend, this case is far from over though. I am quite afraid that we won't have work cut out for us either. There's something wretched underneath, or perhaps near us and it's not the stench I'm talking about." A broad silence swept through the passage, making the stench, the filth suddenly pass through the air, leaving nothing but a cool breeze which he could breathe in. Argus had gone a long way by now, making sure to look and check every door in the slums. Some were left open, though he dared not open any of them. If the inside were just like the scent, there'd be nothing more but damnation waiting inside. And there's enough of that everywhere around. 'You selling?' It was almost a rat coat he was wearing, skinned alive from those bastards, shown like a trophy by a hunter in the slums. This wasn't just the worst place around, but where they sent the mentally ill and deranged. It was just obvious that they might've been suspected of being the ones who've done the incident just a few steps out of their parts. Filthy bottom dwellers, a tunnel coming out from the sewers. If one were to take a look inside of one's house, there'd be no trial or even question who came and blew that up. 'No, I'm just passing.' "Good, we don't like seeing new faces around here, at least not the ones that won't stay. So, you up for a good time inside?" His hands were dirty and it was obvious that the house wasn't his. By the smallest crack of the door, with the tail of the eye, a couch was visible. In an unnatural way, there was a hand just standing there, twisted by the end of it. The man either was too stupid or dull struck since he hadn't noticed that fact that Argus managed to tell of the dead body. 'I'm fine.' Said a thorough voice. No shock laid inside anymore, though it was hard to distinguish what really happened then or if this was nothing more but an attempt to give life to rumours. It happened long ago, there's nothing to see here. Just keep going straight and don't look back. One would at least throw a glance only to make sure that the cutthroat wouldn't go ahead and do the thing he was known for. That was the least obvious of what he managed to observe so far. Speaking of the obvious, the sky was beginning to change and not in the right way. Doubt remained on what was about to come, not to mention the possible consequences of standing there too long. He may become so absorbed and forget much. 'A wishful thing isn't it?' It was at least a dream to think he could get so lost in that place and be accepted. Once glance still revealed his hands, bits of his legs, how it was spread across his chest, screaming. There was a need to shout and be heard, but it will be pointlessly wasted on those around him who couldn't understand why that was. And still, despite his problem, there was something wrong with the sky, though something he couldn't point out or really know why it was like that. It was the right, true, blue and black, a starry night like any other he had remembered so softly as for looking at it. Pain still crushed and distracted him, at least to the point where he needed to flee and hide. It was the danger which reminded him of that and of where he laid, the people in there still degenerated into creeps, stalkers and cutthroats. Case and point. There was a simple standing field of needles just thrown among other unspeakable and detestable thing. At the end of a path where he could've mistaken if he decided to take a wrong turn, he would've stumbled on what seemed to be just another pile of them. Bodies, buried inside, one seemed to be alive, still moving a hand. In the distance, there were others just appearing to be looking out for their day. The main, apparent square wasn't far, overlaid with what seemed to be leading to the sewers, a large barred hole in the ground where every liquid of rain, blood or another kind of repulsing distance lead. 'It couldn't have been that bad.' Said Argus with a certain voice. Having been there when he was a child, his memory of it might've been at this point exaggerated. This seemed to be a corner from a world long out of the care of the man, where people slit each other's throats just to avoid dying by the hands of the plague. Empathy forced him still to come and try to save whoever was there. Though it was already quite risky to proceed through a field filled with needled spears from below. An attempt soon came into being, as he just walked through it. Most of them were already standing either flaccid or pushed through the wrong end into the ground. There wasn't any mistake to be done, just walk around and force yourself not to look below too much. Either he'd trip or not, there wasn't any in-between. That hand still desperately moved, by the likes of it, trying his hands to survive. No head could be seen in the pile and from the looks of it, they had started to rot away. Once he was the condition of what was happening, Argus started moving at a faster pace, going through as much trouble as to avoid any precaution now. The piercing needles, at least one or two managed to find their way and go through the shoes and into his feet. No pain or anything was felt, it was too far into what had grown inside of him to affect that. Would there be the pain if I were to turn around and let him there? For a second, he was about to listen to his own advice. His back was turned to the pile and at the end, he was the shadow of another man who just finished walking. It soon disappeared, most likely, once he saw that he was looking, there wasn't anything else to do but go away. None one will have their way with me. Though the wriggling hand still disturbed him to the point where he needed to know why. The soil was soft, at least, he had noticed now how the various needles had managed to sunk within. One day, most likely, they dared hoped that the earth would swallow the entire pile of bodies whole. 'Damn bastards.' With that plea for himself, he turned back around and kept walking to help the man. As the obvious blunt hand seemed to have been big boned, so must appear to be the man. 'It's all right. I'm here to help.' He said, a few feet away from the pile. At first sight, there was still a fear to help the man, who was most likely by now infected. An infection that would lead to death, especially if it were for the array of many pointed arches which were raised from the earth. Now that he made a few steps, Argus started kicking the first body, pushing in further away. He'd repeat that motion as safely as he could, knowing that the only chance he'd get worse it'd be if somehow it managed to get through the small holes he had in his shoes. Now, that there were only two standing over, he pushed one and left another. When he was ready to seal the deal, he got caught by surprise. The hand stopped wriggling and since it had no weight over, it pushed itself on the ground. Attached to a long forearm, it started crawling on the ground, half submerged. It came into a flight that couldn't be interrupted, hence, knowing not how to proceed, Argus suddenly sidestepped and looked in grim surprise. The procedure was swift. It buried itself like a small little furry thing, pushing the dirt out with a motion made only by two three fingers, while two were used to hold still. Desperately, it attempted to get out of sight and disappear as fast as it could do so. 'Wait, what are you?' There was a strange remark, to say the least, the hand couldn't hear or do anything else. A reanimated thing of dark proportions who soon disappeared into the soft dirt. Blind and strong, there wasn't anything in the pile for it to have belonged to, at least, so and so. Someone left the hand in the pile, whatever the reason, none of the corpses there were missing any body parts, to begin with. This was all that happened, quite confusing to look at and figure it out. Now, somewhere around, deep through the ground roamed a thing which resembled the hand and part of an arm. As he walked, the immediate thought bounced as well. 'This will get back to haunt me.' And in truth, in his eyes, the soil had gotten a lot darker than it was. Luckily, soon there'd be clean pavement to be walked upon. It still didn't make a lot of sense of the reason why they'd break the stone and leave the soil. This was their dump though, but not for long. One day it was bound to fall and their work soon to be messed with. 'Damn bastards don't know when to quit.' The shadows came and from the looks of it, there were two of them, just standing at opposite sides. One was more than enough to deal with, though two of them at once in this condition, would be a bother. 'If I find anyone jumping at me, I might have one of my knives rushing down their throats.' This wasn't the normal voice he used, but the tone was lower, his fist got clenched, there was something of a slow reveal of each word that came before the shadows started to retreat. At least they weren't dumb enough to go against me. But I was most likely spied upon. Looking above, there were plenty of wires and unwashed clothes just waiting to get as dry. It was a pity to wait and even worse to feel the scent. Though it was obvious, the exaggeration of memory, the pushing of the murder square. Small drops of blood laid on clothes which were waiting to get dry. Whoever wore then last was now dead and despite the fact that there were fully dressed corpses, those above them seemed to fit. It was the purge of the region which seemed to be strange. 'You coming stranger?' Another man passed. He was wearing kind of tattered pants and the overalls of a brown jerky leather found on a dirty street animal. 'I am.' Plenty of others were just coming from here and there. Despite being so late and the pain in their almost red eyes being apparent, they went on ahead with what they were doing. Which still seemed to be a secret, especially since they were going as far from the investigation as possible. The first corner and he were just behind the man. Now there were plenty more of them just gathered around, forming a small fire. The road must've become more swampy since it shifted. Nowhere back could there be seen the road Argus had taken to arrive here. But even more disturbing was the sky and its malignant movements which seemed to be ever disturbing and creeping beyond the corners of his eyes. 'Wait for the others before we begin.' Some were seated in chairs, which they bought for themselves, while Argus and the rest either seemed to be standing or sitting on the cold ground. The small fire was quite a delight in its own accord, though he refused to look inside of it. Is this going to happen every time I look at the fire? Because I could never get used to it. This was the plea, the question, the thing that bothered Argus. Looking at the fire revealed the same pile of standing and knelt corpses which were burning for delight. It wasn't a keen thing to be looked upon, especially since every single time it reminded him of what those giants looked like. Their tormented features and disproportionality. If ever they found a way inside this place. Damn thing, makes me suffer even when I'm done with it. Think of another thing, think of another. Argus, there is nothing in the fire, there's nothing there. After repeating some small prayers, silently, he closed his eyes. Through the lids, the red and the orange was obviously still there, barely blockable by his hands. He opened them at last and could breathe feeling a release. No image or corpse was burning anymore. 'Are you all right brother?' 'I'm fine. Listen, why have we gathered here now?' Though the sudden evolution from stranger to brother seemed quite suspicious, too suspicious to pass by. What was he on about? 'Wait for the others before we start the ceremony. Were you not there though? If I recall correctly, you were in the crowd, standing just adjacent to some of us.' 'Aye, he stood near me, just gasping straw, coming out of nowhere really.' There seemed to be some who threw queer glances at him and other who didn't care that much for even a dime. A stranger, outcast who came. The importance of him being then and there? 'Why do you care if I was?' 'Because it's our job to know what's going down or high, the back and slums and everyone in town. Listen, stranger. "My name is Argus." Right, Argus, listen. The man changed his curiosity to a look of utmost bizarre. It was strange to look and think, for he had heard that name somewhere else. But the strange look never ceased despite the fact that the man gave away a muffle taste of disapproval. Undoubtedly, there was more than he wanted to show, only to be dismissed. 'You'll like what will be there, bet you will though. I can see it in your eyes, the same type of eyes that belong to a killer, a grunt. Oh yeah, I can see it and read it very well, I've seen killers of all kind, it's all in their eyes buddy.' 'Enough Wap, we need to get as many as we can around here, don't scare any new possible recruits. I can trust you to control yourself, right?' 'All right, all right, just having some fun with the new guy, that's all. Just taking a bit off the top, it seemed a bit dusty and untouched.' The man backed away, taking the little bits on his coat, he was young, only a moustache differentiated him from a little petty young man. 'Don't mind him now, he's been touched. In a way, we've all been touched here, especially now that we managed to find the vault.' This creation of his, this twist of what he remembered of what it looked like when he was young was strange. It seemed, more and more like it was created to be a guide, certainly for what was about to come. Whenever that was the right path to take and come below, these didn't seem like gang members, but rather, cultists of some sort. At least, in a way, without any knowledge of real rituals and with the fact that most of them either looked tired or bored, this was a sort of proto-cult. None of them had robes, at least no real ones. Candles and fires were used only to banish the light. Nothing was out of the ordinary so far, other than the hand. Plenty more seemed to be on their way, from each side and corner, only now it started coming forth. This was dangerous as he wasn't expecting to be caught in front of it. The man who stood near Argus was undoubtedly their leader. Not exactly the right time to be caught there with all of them creeping and planning on doing something illegal. Without a doubt, this was related to the entry, despite the fact that the officers determined the fact that it was a vault, what they thought it to be was way different. 'It's a gate, my brothers.' Half of the eulogy was gone. Half of it was either completely forgotten or just muffled by the noise. Argus wasn't in the mood to sit through it entirely, though that was decided a lot longer ago before it even started. 'A gate of dreams, a promise for us all, we've been promised everything we've ever desired and more.' The man started moving. From the back, they pulled a block of wood and gave to him an altar to sit in front of the fire. He remembered what he had previously seen with an almost immediate insight. This was a recreation of what Esther saw and it could only be seen now that he took full notice of it. They were standing in rows, stinking like the damned, despite the fact that the wind was strong, that wasn't enough to stop the reek or even diminish it a bit. In his mind, she was still standing there, not so far from her child. Undoubtedly, there'd be no sacrifice, despite the fact that it was obvious. So he thought, despite not listening for a word of what was preached there. Something was distracting in the sky. A slight tilt came as the land shook under him. The immediate effect came down on every side until suddenly they all came going down. It wasn't a great fall but a great tilt in the back. It felt strange but Argus managed to grab a hold of a corner. The building was unmovable, as others took notice. 'What now?' Argus was surprised to receive just another response as everything went the other way, being forcefully pushed to fall in front of him rather get behind. The sky is damned but what could this madness be? The ground was of the hold, this couldn't be just a simple tremor. Everything got affected at a greater level than he thought. Vases and rugs were falling off the window, cutting through the laundry lines with their shards. Men were forced to their knees to wait for something to level out. When the ground levelled, finally they could stand and relax. None of them noticed so far though, that the material was somehow tainted and started becoming white at a corner. It was so that Argus came to his feet and grabbed some of it. Looking through it, as most of them didn't seem to notice, made it become a piece of rock. This was something happening both on the outside and the inside. And everyone was affected by it in some way or another. Pulled from the bottom, they came into being. The man came back to his eulogy. 'The world is about to come to an end brothers.' The fire was long gone and now, they had built him a tower of boxes and planks. 'And we're about to set it free. They said we were damned and that we will do nothing after the war. They laughed and mocked and the worst of all is that they sent us to die. But we never lost faith and never surrender to their needs and in the end we were carried towards salvation.' The memory of bones was just as strong in Esther as it was in him. It was that moment when she started breaking the bones that the desire came into being. That small thing forced itself on her mind. Just like how once it came to her. Their features were remarkably similar to the skulls, as a matter of fact, so was the architecture of the slums. It was quite a paradise now for them, or at least for their reincarnations. They were all present here and still stood to wait through the eulogy. Soon he'd just go away and come another night since all of them were obviously tired, wasted or broken by the fall. All of them except for Argus who still stood queerly tall, waiting for any of them to make a move and say something about him. So far none of his expectations were fulfilled. Quite strange, he acted in a manner which was unevenly bizarre in comparison to them. These fools may not have anything to do with this. Showmen, tall robed, eye dancer, nothing more to it. Even their words didn't spell much of what they were planning to do at all. More or less. 'We shall make them pay.' Though from the looks of it, this was a bi-weekly thing which seemed to have approached more like a city council rather than a cult of some sort. If somehow he knew more, he was sure to be the last person to reveal anything at all. His eyes were darkly lit, his voice was becoming ill by the second. Others were frustrated in their act as none of them wished to be there. 'And with that, we conclude this session.' 'Well, that was disappointing.' Someone else appeared like he was agreeing with Argus, especially those further in the back. 'There's more energy usually, especially with that thing coming off from the ground. And he didn't even mention it.' Word came from mouth to mouth. Soon he found himself stopped from his attempt to flee. At least one man informed the leader. 'Ehm, my dear congregates of the slum. Let me begin with apologising for my forgetful memory. As you may have heard, there's something that I forgot to mention and despite having this be the shortest meeting we've been to, I have decided to have one motion. Rather, a proposal, something for us to finally do and be a part of. You see, as you may have heard, or some of you may have pointed out or been there.' A pause cleared his thought. There was a slight embarrassment to the fact that he forgot to mention that gate. 'There's another one at the other end which was just revealed a few days prior to this one. And from the looks of it, they might be twins. Now, now.' The crowd roared in whispers and dark sayings, plenty of which started talking rumours and about the unknown. Luckily, this was hidden. 'In the canal, deeper than the one which was revealed and from the looks of it, they may be connected with the fact that they were both in the sewers. We've got a reason. May I get some silence please?' Their voices suddenly became muffled, even though they were ready to be caught in a torrent. It would've been easy to focus upon if it weren't for the starry night and the raised moulder of stone which laid not as far from him as he saw. Could it be that it's the? There was an interruption of thought, as the man immediately pointed it out. 'I need all your focus here, even yours. As I was saying, there may be evidence that they come down all around the sewers, but the matter of the fact is that none of us knows where they lead to. It could be further on the ground or anywhere else. From what we know, it may even lead to another world where lays our salvation. If that were true, we'd have no chance but to roam the sewers in search for that one. That secret one of them that isn't locked. And the most important thing of all and the advantage we have over those laymen and officers of the law is that the slums are basically the drainage of the town. Every sewage leads to us. 'And every hole, portcullis, small pipe and anything that's long, has a hole and it carries something in it. That's the saying. 'With that, we can finish it and be gone. 'Plenty of them were too tired to argue, at least not at this hour into the night. The moon was at least leaving the place filled with fright. 'May I speak to you for a second, Argus, was it?' Seeing how the new man was getting especially a lot more attention, more of them just left without asking. One, in particular, Argus recognised, it was the man who entered the home, that of which had the body. It wasn't as shocking now, with the pile of bodies right behind his house, nonetheless, he was repelled and went away. Something was driving them off, now that they spent so much time around him. Something that for them was inexplicable to say. 'Good night. "Yeah, good night. 'Most of them left on the same road, living together or at least as close to one another as one could be. There was something which they shared, something really strong, though Argus had none of it. 'What is it?' 'You're new here, how much do you plan on staying?' 'As much as I can, perhaps, or I may just leave at once. It depends. "On what?' 'On whenever or not I find what I came here to find. 'The man shrugged immediately once he saw the expression on his face. 'I don't feel like sharing, though this I may. Don't worry about it, it's not something which may harm anyone or disturb any of your lives here. "I understand Argus, I'm. I'm pleased to meet you. 'Even his handshake ended up being disturbingly awkward. 'You seem like there's much more to you than you'd like to show, but it's too late already. There's plenty of room where I'm going. "I'm sure there is, but I've already rented a room in the nearby hotel. Do not worry, I know how to blend in with the people, there won't be any trouble from this side of the deal. "So it's true, you're to join us then?' 'I will do what I must for as long as I stay in this town, you can count on that. 'The man was pleased to see Argus so eager to help with it. Though despite that, there wasn't any chance he'd follow him to where he went. On the side, he noticed that that man went to the morgue, hidden or just laid around in the slumps. The stench was fairly explained by this fact alone. Merely the damned started rotting in the streets and in the morgue. That thing combined with the other corpses which laid in their houses since no one could afford to have them incinerated or buried, and the sewage. Well, it left more than a mark on anyone who passed through or near those damned grits and holes. It was a pity just to look at, decayed stone, the foundation of the nearby buildings was broken and now he was left alone to roam the street at night. Like a vagrant of some sort stopped. A sharp scream just came into full motion and it was obviously the sound of a woman's voice. There wasn't anything else that could help it be more distinguishable than that. High notes, it came from somewhere near. But no, it wasn't in the slumps, it went again. Argus tried to find a way out of there as fast as he could, just to see. With a twist and a turn, he had been used to the tricks of the eye and the various traps which were trying to be reminiscing of the labyrinth of legend. Just keep on the wall and don't let go of it, follow this. His hand was tightly placed on the wall, following, pushing through the sweat. At least that was still present in his body if anything even worked properly anymore. The scream came another time and now he was trying to avoid any little pebble or any left syringe. Some bands were forgotten and filled with a yellowish blood if it were even blood. Some would take this as a nightmare as the pointers were filled with dirt and a black soil which seemed to have been brought from another time. 'Where are you?' It was just close enough to be a shout, but not enough to disturb anyone at all. The streets were empty and if it weren't for him, no one else would come up so late at night. Which one of the houses could it be? That was the harsh question to be asked now. The street slabs were clean, taking as much as for the moon light in its reflection, distraction, though not enough to take away from the houses. Such a dark opening from where he came from must've appeared as being from another world. For one he wasn't sure on what to do, looking around, there were rows of topped buildings in front of him and by the sides. Nothing distinguishable and no visible sign that any of them came to be a victim of a forced entry. His breathing slowed down as he felt the power of a shadow topple him. It came down and just as he lost focus and regained it saw the shadow of a giant hand just come down his shoulder. Soon there appeared the hand, though he made no sudden movement, he was sure it was something that would hurt him. 'Are you the hand?' 'No.' Argus turned to find the man standing there, wearing his common attire and one row of topped hair, which was sharp enough to resemble an axe. It was only now that he noticed it since he was too obviously focusing on that damned bloody hand which laid on that couch. 'You're the man who asked me when I came to the.' 'That one. Have you heard the screams too?' Argus had quite the squeamish look on him, he heard it as well and came just in time when I was ready to make the exit. 'We need to find her, mister?' 'Right, I'll try going by that side, you go to the other.' A mutual nod of agreement came after they went their separate ways. He couldn't have gotten so far now if he heard the scream since he lived on the other side of the slum. That man was acting in a particularly suspicious manner, though it wouldn't have made any sense for him to let me live like that. Only one knife to the back then and there and. A stronger, more noticeable scream came soon, barely muffled. It was closer than ever now. This isn't the time to get distracted by the sky Argus. Should I announce the man though? He was certainly far, though if he didn't trust me enough to even give me his name, I shouldn't trust him with his help. 'It should be this.' There were no signs or a forced entry, but the door opened plainly. Someone left it open unless the lock was picked. This was strange, warm, the fire was still left burning, the lowest it had ever been. Unfinished food and at least two room laid at the bottom. Since he had nothing or needed nothing but his tainted skin, he came closer and opened the doors. Both of which were adjacent. 'Only boxes, the storage rooms.' Next, to the stairs, there was another small door which seemed to have been locked. Argus failed to notice it as he went ahead. It was quite blue on the overall blighted dark, but the obvious yellow light coming from upstairs left no other impression of where the culprit was. The shadows were ill and none were left. Stopped on the stairs, Argus checked around again. Better be sure unless he'd take me from behind and snap me in half before I even get to her. Alas, the shout came again, the all of the sudden Argus came with a dark dance and a leap which cut through and made it half way through the house. The floor was stiff and going forth, it wasn't twisted but for the doors, as closed as they were, he didn't hear him arrive yet. Somehow, that could've been more than obvious to another, but the stains of blood were missed again. Just under the far side of the carpet, near the stairs remained a stain of blood which seemed to have been old and left there. Something was rotting and the door wasn't obvious as it had been with that boy he had encountered. The lamp was in this very corridor, standing there, but none of the other doors was obvious. A muffled scream made it quite obvious over the fact that he was about to strangle her. 'Where are you?' Recklessly, Argus started opening doors without a care for the sound they made. First was over and no one laid inside, then came the second one, empty, fourth, fifth which was in the middle, this one he must've heard it open. But the adjacent one was on his right side, with the air coming out from all side. Immediately, it got cold, incredibly cold. The chill, the shiver and the sharp pain in his shoulder, banished the light and left the deep blue of the sea just roam the halls. The house resembled more of a cavern now, made of sharp, falling stone. It was quite obvious of what was about to happen when he opened the door. 'This is it.' With a shallow voice, Argus yelled. 'Let her go.'With that going on unheard, he kicked the door, this time it came out of proportions.Its sides just got ripped apart and got pushed.The man was just standing there over her, attempting to strangle her, followed by an even more grim attempt.His mask was bizarre as he let go of the sly neck and turned around to face Argus.A large yellow devilish featureless mask which seemed to have been made mostly out of dirty fur.As obvious as it was that he couldn't see properly through it, Argus took the charge.The woman passed out when he finally released, but it was too late for that.Argus took no time for questioning and charged him, punching him in the neck, until he heard a dark choking sound himself.That push and the direction brought him only closer, scraping the bed, to the window where he dealt the final blow.With one final strike coming from him, the man fell through the window and finally collapsed at the stone hard ground.Something of a pain must've come then, as there he laid still, unable to go anywhere else anymore, with a small pool of blood coming out of his head.They'll come after me now, thought Argus.He'd leave a trail on his way, at least until he found a way out, a real way out.Not quite his best position, the man quite stumbled on his way to the window with all that weight, not to mention that he didn't put much of a fight.Luckily, he took off a cigar off the near shelf.It was left there by her, most likely a heavy smoker.'Hard to think why anyone would do anything like this around here.Especially since I saw nothing of the sort happen.'Somehow, it took less out of his memory and came with new humans.He bent around to take another look at her before he went to smoke.She wasn't anyone he had recognised, or really knew as a matter of fact.A bland woman who had brown eyes, and jet-like hair, pale now, but alive.The man who came at her wasn't any better, just slightly more rotund in a way he would dare not question.And there was still the problem with that man who was outside.Now, that Argus came to the crime scene, right out of the room, down the stairs and in front of the man, he failed to see that other from the slums.Did he follow me just to rob the houses or anything of the sort?Quite a fair question, but even better, who was this man here?Perhaps it'd be right doing to pull off the mask and reveal who he was.But why the bother?'Here bud, I think you need this more than me.'Ready as he was to lend him the last smoke, the man half raised as if he was reanimated from the dead and help Argus for a moment with both of his hands.One over the shoulder and the other one around.He had already dropped the cigar on the floor and got ready to strike at the man.But something surprising happened, all of the sudden, the grip over him grew soft and the man lets go.His fall felt like nothing, but for the worse, his belly was full.Whatever happened in the moments he touched him couldn't be noted, but the bloated belly was quite abnormal.Even more so was the fact that it was moving, or at least something in it was.'It's a trap.'Said Argus with a raspy voice once he realised just what was done.The skin becomes a growth, his infection spread across that body.The factor which liquefied it worked both ways, as the body became part with the floor, spreading across the blood it had left behind.Bubbles formed under his skin, something now started creeping just under him.It switched places and sides with each glance, hiding or retracting, this was soon to hit the land in places that weren't to be held.How could this be a memory if it can get infected?Argus felt that skin, that body, saw it, he could smell it now and it was certainly real.Worse than that, it was a human no longer but a small bulb of skin standing there and waiting.It didn't grow nor spread but just stood there for no other certain reason but for a mark.Gates coming from underground, bulbs of skin, they will be mad once they find this out.There had to be a way to escape this place.One as quick as it was still the time to be humble.Otherwise, they'd do him a lot more harm than being caught and thrown in a jail to rot.Argus decided to abandon it and get as far away as possible.There wasn't any evidence that this was any of his doing, not to mention that this seemed out of the realm of human possibility. But one thing he remembered, having others touched would mean spreading it here, anywhere, everywhere, repeating the cycle. It meant that just above, that thing was slowly becoming something like this too. A corruption of skin attached to the cage, without any possibility of forming a coherent thought, or at least that was the supposed idea of what was happening after they were touched. There could've been no idea of the pandemonium that was soon to come. Not even Argus could've predicted any of it happening. Gone as far as he went, he arrives at a peculiar spot. Far from where he stood, there were some things that weren't in his memory. Chains, giant chains which held the city, one onto each side, without a doubt, there were two others slightly further. I need to see. Stricken though, he came to pass down the dark alley and lay there, affected by a sudden desire to have a nap. The pain in the stomach and his head came too fast for him to ignore. Henceforth, he laid like a vagrant and slept. Lips remained ill and thirsty, the food wasn't a problem anymore, or at least ever since he touched that fat thing. That juicy, giant formation which crept now with him. No sympathy whatsoever, this became more than a game or finding it and growing stronger. In his sleep, what used to be human changed in him, especially down to his creeping veins and blood. Thicker, shallower, his nails fell off and others started growing in their places. Wherever he'd sleep, there'd be a mark of viscous slime that would just melt there but stay across the wall like spider webs. But others saw him as they were. Quite peculiar, for the queer fellow who slept there, just around the corner. He seemed of a high class, too much to be standing there. 'Do you believe something might've happened to his home?' 'Oh, I do hope that's not the case Anne. There's just not plenty of men around here to choose from. I sure hope they're not all spoiled.' Just forget him, he's nothing more than a shnuckle from what's worth. Two house views were standing with their neighbour in the middle of the day. The night went without any sign of a dream, but for gloom and absence of all. No wonder Argus was still tired and confused, still unable to come up from his damp corner. Waking up was already hard for others, but this was at a whole new entire level, something had crept inside him for far too long. Changes were coming but this would soon become irreversible. Upon awakening, he saw that marks and what seemed to be a corruption of the skin retreated in himself. Yet, he couldn't see what he looked like any longer. 'I'm healed.' Argus said with almost as a loud shout and he could give. 'A queer fellow that one, if you ask me. Came around last night, made a lot of noise and just stood there raving like a loon. Folks, these days from the big city, you never know what they might say or do.' The morning sky was bright, but still, some of it was grim and twisted. Released from the bonds of that which had crept over his body, Argus now moved, feeling like a new man. 'Morning ladies.' 'Good morning.' Came as a choir. They were standing just onto one side of the street, just looking at him as if he was the main attraction. Quite strange, no dirty spot and his attire seemed to be almost ironed to the point where he just appeared to be kicked out of the house by his wife. The eyes were just all over the man. Not to mention that Argus thought quite different from them, old clothes, different times. It had its lost charm, something of a class behind how they were just standing tall and acting. The chains. That must be my key out. It was a shot in the dark, though in a way it would've been the perfect trap. A pair of chains which held this platform above, lost in a land, invisible as they were. One would take an eternity just to search for them. But this was no eternity to lay about. He walked and acted normal as if they wouldn't notice. Acting what they were supposed to say and do what they were remembered doing. Everything something fake, plastic, words places where they shouldn't be. The nightmare could come alive and spread around with its skin tendrils, just creeping and corrupting everything in sight. This was something he felt in his stomach, like a sharp pain with every thought. Soon. This was his time to take over. Nothing would stop him from his mission now. The chains were soon to be broken and as it seemed, none were even daring to come forth. Perhaps, this was their biggest mistake, whatever this was, which recreated everything from memory, had its biggest flaw apparent. None of them was consciously trying to stop him. For the worse, he came to that which he was seeking and it was quite obvious what was happening. The distance so far was an even greater illusion, though it was even more obvious that this didn't belong here. Giant, metal, and going as far above as to the sky, this was obviously a device to lower it, now the answer was, how? No one seemed to see or even care about its appearance. So, this is my chance, but how? "You could always let us it and we could help you." "We could push the chains, pull them or do whatever you ask us to." They said, now at the dire moment. Let me be, I can handle this on my own. Though Argus wanted to resist, he had a hard time coming forth and denying help. This could be a trick and nothing but another attempt for them to take over. "Why would I trust you over them?" "You know why because we're real and they are not." "Just look at them and how they walk and shiver and pretend to be something they're not. We've never done that." "We've never tried to deceive you." "End this, leave my mind and let me be, we're almost there and you still think you've got a chance against it. You're more delusional than I have become." "Enough, then try and pull them by yourself if you're so arrogant. And if you're so fond of them and what they are, let us change what roams around." "See if we're as weak as you claim us to be. Feel the heat if you want so desperately to defy our wishes." There was a flash of red and brown. The sky became a wall, everything became a prison of dark stone and tall pillars which held everything in place. From below there were only opening from which head came. Only fitting for something which was held by chains. The heat was damning, at least, holding in it was too painful for a man who hadn't have a drink. Yet it was only now that he felt thirst, in the furnace. "I get your point." Said Argus, crawling away from the closest fiery event which pushed as much hot air as it could produce. "Not yet, you've not learned your lesson. Despair, arrogant man, despair!" Reigned the voice over him. Argus would soon find himself crawling through a place he didn't desire to be in, holding himself and waiting for the slightest shiver of cold. "I can't pull in this condition. 'This isn't an illusion.' The heated stone didn't let leave any impression, other than the fact that it would only get hotter and more damned. 'You'd better hurry on the other side and find the other pair.' "Something stuck between the ground and chains, blocking them from going below." "Why are you helping me now?" "You're still going to lead all of us down, but this lesson, you'll have to learn alone." "Oh and be careful on your way. They roam all over the place, the butchers." "They'll cut you up and bring you there if you refuse. After all, you don't need more than your legs to get there, do you?" The sound of that thing which mocked the halls with their laughs was damning. Nothing else could describe the place, other than hell. Fat, gluttonous and wielding a butchers knife, they were inhuman constructs which became apparent from the distance. It soon went away, but undoubtedly they were forcing themselves everywhere. Argus barely managed to stand up and say no word. "Hurry up." The remains of what was the town of his childhood were somehow present in bits, but only because they had failed to turn everything. Fire reigned though and soon, whoever made it through the transition would be butchered. The screams of the maidens, the rage of the men didn't subside. Their echoes came through the halls and closer to Argus as they roamed. It was clear that they were suffering down here in the failure to change the place. "This heat, I won't be able to make it through, lower it. Please, just lower it." This wasn't event he beginning of it. River of lava from the distance, a twisted hall it was, soon as he arrived. It leads to a giant room, tall, of a metal which wasn't known. There were long rows or openings just laid there everywhere around, through which spectators would watch. Soon the gate closes behind him with an immediate blunting throttle. 'Oh, but it's not over yet. You still haven't learned your lesson.' 'I have, I have.' His breath was slowed down, the heat was getting to him now at a whole new level. There were pain and a shock at the same time. It was getting worse by the minute. To see the rows light and the cheers and voices of them was the furthest from delightful. 'Why are you. Doing this? I'm no warrior.' There were only blisters on his lips, which now made it harder for him to speak. Something down his throat was blocking some of the air. Though, despite his problems, Argus knew that this was supposed to be an arena. Rather, to him, this had become the heart of the furnace where he was being boiled alive with no water to swim in. 'If you want water so much, fight for it. Entertain us now!' The ground was shaking in dismissal. 'Here it comes.' 'Oh dear combatant, will you not entertain all of our guests? Or perhaps you'll join the rest?' Bones laid around, the remnants of the previous fights. Even from the distance, the rows seemed more than full with plenty of recognisable and people he did not know. No weapons just bare hands. I need to grab at least something from down here. With that in mind, he came as fast as possible under the shadow and grabbed a piece of fabric off the ground to wipe off his sweat, this was important. A piece of the arm was more than welcomed, upon which he rubbed the sweaty fabric and pushed it as much as he could. There was a need for it to spread, at least if it truly worked that way, for this would be the strongest and fastest way for him to make it spread. As for these so called combatants, they wore no armour nor weapons, henceforth, if he would've been worse, there'd be nothing for him to use. 'Hurry now, we don't want to make it wait.' There were some steps that lead towards the place, though the misconception seemed to fade away. It wasn't coming from the door through which Argus came but from another place. Unsurprisingly, there was a slight expectation that he'd jump from above. There wasn't any visible ceiling, as the high rows expanded to the sky. It was only but an illusion. Just as everything else was. 'Who will be my enemy then? Is it one of you?' Argus pointed at the crowd, yet spoke of anything else. They roared and shouted at him, almost in the sense that he seemed to appear like a warrior in the Colosseum. 'If you seek your punishment so early, look below.' Argus had failed to notice how much was the floor segmented and cut with long thin lines which separated an entry point. It opened in the middle, almost spherical if it weren't for the squared planes. At once, from below, a platform started being raised as the crowd waited in silence for a sign from below. First, even Argus started taking distance, anything really to get an advantage over whatever it was coming from below. For now, it seemed, as the figures came to light, there were only a few people, slightly thinner and barely fitting the image of warriors. 'Are you mocking me now? Should we wait for a dozen fights that get harder until I'll be released?' 'They're not for you.' The voice said and at once from above it dropped. A giant meaty form, with a frog like a face, humanoid fell from above, making a dark, grim thunder. That armour didn't break the fall, at least not from the looks of it, but the meat it crushed in that horrific sight managed to put Argus to his place. He was standing still, in shock, thinking and seeing that moment again. That being made out of a gluttonous mass, seemed to be partially human, yet it was now picking up from below and eating. It will come after me once it's done. The crowd appeared to feel a different way about the entire ordeal. Some were shouting, others were booing, and at least there were others who were throwing rotten meat at the beast. Now that he regained what he had, he moved sideways to get a better look at this thing conjured up from the depths of pseudo memory and twisted mind. Chubby arms, but held no weapon, it twisted a forked tongue to eat and drink from below. It was only covered by a tiny bit of fur around the body, at least on the parts that weren't crushed under the armour by the fall. For the time being, at least it appeared to be done eating, but just as well, it managed to crush its legs. It felt no pain at it ignored the meat and started chasing the small man, crawling and pushing with those hands as much as it did. The form seemed to appear more like the obese rather the beast when approaching him. "This could be your fate if you choose to listen and free him." His little pet send on errands and forced to listen and obey. Is this the future you desire?" Aaagh. Argus shouted as he rolled out of the way. That thing acted unexpectedly, not as a human, nor as a beast, coming into range and letting itself just fall and crush anything under it. There used to lay a bed of bones which immediately came to a striking point of total smashing. The metal protected it from anything and there didn't seem to be any free point, other than the mouth and head. 'I've got you now.' As for the momentum which was regained, Argus turned and jumped, striking at the head which turned at fast as it could. It ate his weapon and swallowed. This was it for him, at least the hand came but couldn't go further. A blind spot, into the armour which prevented the entire turn to the side. It wasn't much but managed to help him and let him escape. "This is it then, your monster has been defeated. End this game now." Oh but we're not even started yet. It will take a lot more than a small bone drenched in your sweat to kill it. At once Argus turned away from his arrogance and looked at the beast, standing with its massive arms, what seemed to be slobbery fat were filled with bloated muscles. It held its weight and now some more. Some signs of the infection were present, yet they stopped from going any further. I need more of it for it to fall. There could be no other way for me to defeat it! Some of the features were of animalistic reign, at least from the likes of it. Something of the formed body and upper body strength despite its gluttonous form seemed to be comparable to a common jungle gorilla. The way it acted at it looked at its prey, the sad look in its eyes when it came and crushed the meat. Just as worse as it was for him, so it was for this creature. It charged and released its grip from the ground again, falling over in what would end up being another attempt. This time it wasn't as easy to strike Argus as it was before. Such nimbleness came with a price, seeing it now as an animal which suffered. 'Stop forcing it to do this. Can't you see that it's being hurt?' Only a slight shimmer of the voice was audible to him. Undoubtedly, those standing in the rows either couldn't hear or didn't care for this primordial broken thing. There was satisfaction with the crowd each time it fell over itself and the meat inside, the bones were crushed between the metal and the ground. Using itself as a weapon was nothing but a failure. But this was your plan, wasn't it? To humiliate me and make me fight this beast. 'How does it figures we did that? Did you not wish for a fair fight? Look at it come up again.' Its massive arms were now shaking, a shoulder pad fell off, revealing some of the blood dripping. Nonetheless, despite those wounds, it managed to stand tall under that mountain of an armour. With a long scar along the face, it lived for now, though in a worse condition. It starts affecting, as obviously as it now seems, it's not entirely immune. An open wound would be just perfect for a touch. All that he needed now it end its suffering. He went at once and picked a bone, smashing it against the ground, until pieces of it ended up being sharp. As for the beast, it gave chase slowly, as the ability to turn at its own pace revealed itself as its biggest flaw. 'I can just move around it now, is this the best you've got to offer? A cripple beast which has nothing else to offer?' Now he was almost done, what remained to do now. A small slash, as the poison at the tip of the newly made blade. Quite enough of blood ran down the bone as Argus cut his hand, but all of it was necessary to end this madness he was forced in. The crowd stood silent now, and the beast finally managed to turn. This would be the end of it, at the apparent fight could be seen in both of their eyes. At once they both came at one another but the beast no longer just came in regards of falling. Those hands painfully held the ground and pushed themselves back in order to arc the entire body. It would simulate a sling that would push the artillery like a bullet and crush him. A dangerous though as Argus charged, it could've died on its own, this was about pride. His hand was wrapped around the spear and just in time, he came as close as to throw it before it managed to launch itself. In a moment, it was all over, as the blood embedded spear flew, it managed to avoid the face and deviate. Somehow the shoulder was punctured deep, as to the bone. Finally, the beast roared and fell to the side, as that attempt failed. That fall shattered the bone and forced every ounce of blood to enter and defile its skin and fur. Wriggling down in an attempt to end the pain, it started eating its own shoulder and trying to spit it out. To no avail. So many people in the crowd were being driven to roars and applauses over the deed. 'Is this what you wanted me to do? Could you not suffer me to leave this place and head down below?' There wasn't any other escape and no other place for an excuse of any kind. Only now it stopped moving, once the jaw started liquefying and becoming part of the shoulder, permanently. It managed to push the toxin which roamed in Argus' blood to a point of no return. The arm was unusable, as for the beast, it could still breathe, barely, but unable to move. Soon, the other muscle would end its muscle control, as the creature would be driven to madness. 'Will you let it suffer?' 'I won't end it, I didn't ask for this. Now release me!' 'Not, yet.' Said the voice as they pushed a bigger one from above. That dark corner of the ceiling which appeared to be the illusion of a man. Such creature that came again seemed to be another contender in the same race. At least the size and weight was twice that of the last one. It had had its end by now once this beast came and fell on its body and crushed it immediately. That dumb look on its face was no longer appearing to be human. With each increase in size and weight, some of that receded into what appeared to be pure corruption. 'I cannot stand and fight these forever.' 'You will fight for as long as we desire. Listen to the crowd, how they admire and how they cheer for your victory. Do you need weapons and armour, real ones? Fight again and be gone.' 'Do you promise to let me free?' The silence was a damnable answer, at least for both of them. Out of the dome which came from below, there came a variety of spears, swords, small hammers and one golden hint of a shield. As the custom, this creature was busy, eating out of the remains of the previous combatant, undoubtedly to gain its strength. Blindsided, it failed to notice just how fast Argus make do with he had. A small sword and a dagger, a shield, a spear, of which he was already accustomed with. This was more than ready, prepared for a fight. The beast was just the same, weak lower body, stronger arms which would carry the rest as further away as it did before. I need to kill it fast before it finished eating. As much as a fair fight would've mattered, this wasn't going to go as well as the last time. The mountain was getting higher and higher with each one that fell from above. Doubt came still that it'd be the last one he'd face. This was it, to its blind stand and that thing was still eating from its jerky arm. It had been pulling out the skin for a while, a vile one, greedy and eating like a pig. Just in time. Argus was in the best position he could've been when he fell to a knee and threw the spear as hard as he could. From the side, it suddenly came like a lightning bolt and pierced the face. The sound of the skull cracking under the pressure almost came with a faint from the crowd. A thud came as the sharp end of the spear ended up bouncing against the helmet. At once it fell and sent the crowd who was still watching as if this was nothing more than a ceremony, into a shivering set of roars and applauses. This was the show they wanted and begged for. 'Am I done now?' He asked while that gigantic thing fell on its back leaving no room for a bounce or even a sign of being alive. Another one ended and this time he took some distance away. If one more of them were to fall, he'd be no victim yet. 'You do not fail to entertain. One after another falls to the great Argus now, do not deny your heritage and might. But it's not over yet, not until we say it's over.' Another fight. Another fight. The crowd cheered and asked for yet another in unison as the desire to see him fight had grown. Such a body which did not tire, certainly there had to be something wrong. Or even worse, something was wrong with his mind. Why can't I be left alone? Let me go at once. His thoughts were now ignored as he approached the dome. Some mechanism seemed to be working from below, twisting, pushing, pulling. And as the cogs and large pumps were going, there seemed to be something of a reward. At once, as it opened, there seemed to be a cabin filled entirely with water. There wasn't any resistance and he went down and started drinking from it, only to spit it out. 'Salt water, is this a joke?' In a way, he was warned. 'Look above you.' 'There's nothing but a great shadow above.' Answered Argus, wandering at the might of the ceiling. Something was peculiarly wrong now. It shrouded everything, lowered it, moving, shiveringly. An unknown thing which seemed to creep forever, like a gate. 'Look around you now.' Everything seemed something smaller, lowered as the darkness approached. It was closer than ever to the crowd when it stopped. 'You will be devoured if you don't escape.' And don't delude yourself as if you're not into our power. 'The gate.' Shouted Argus, though it was quite late for that. Two guardians stood by it as they were drawn. One had the bashed head and one had had his shoulder and head merged together. Yet, despite being fleshed out and both slain, they were standing there, just guarding it. 'It cannot be, damn you.' 'Have you then.' Came the voice of a man from above. This was the coming of a rain. From above came a rain of small crabs, falling and somehow surviving the great distances as they did. It was a sight to see the shell bounce and still move. And the rain felt cold, as for the hearing which was diminished. 'Enjoy it while it lasts.' It was a feast, at least, as they were boiled then, shortly after, when another wave of heat came from everywhere else. Argus found himself holding those off the ground who suddenly were turned and friend. The water turning black was a bad sign to begin, but this could be his chance. Both of them were distracted, one was eating the small creatures, alive. The other one didn't have functioning eyes anymore. Just his hearing was left now, and Argus approached. There wasn't any doubt that the sound of small crabs hitting the ground was disturbing and confusing to it. A strange thing, after all, unusual and perhaps to his best advantage. It made that creature shake and dismissal, just as the other stood and ate without having being distracted. What could they have said to them if I were to approach? A few steps revealed a shivering roar from the bigger one, pumping blood and visibly moving that overlapped pair of muscles. There had been pain involved and at least the digging of part of his brain. Twenty feet away laid the spear with a broken point, the wood was there but the sharp metal point wasn't. Which left it, undoubtedly still inside, corroding and rotting as much as it could. It wasn't long that he went away, holding the shield above his head once he started hearing just how strong the rain started being. The shells were a lot less resistant than before. If there was still an audience, they were now confused about what was happening in this area of their choosing. Where combatants were slain just to be standing there and falling creatures from the sky. Soon, they'd fill every single spot out there. Nowhere to move. I need to escape this trap before they boil me. 'Release me, now and I promise to listen to you and what you want me to do.' There had to be a stop and without any way around, this was the only thing Argus could do. Pledge his life to them and this madness would end. The crabs weren't falling from the sky anymore. As a matter of fact, whatever small creature laid on the ground wasn't alive anymore. At least not in the eyes of Argus, which meant quite a lot for the time being. Even the giant gatekeepers reverted to their previous state of being. Both were laying on the floor, waiting for a move, in case he changed his mind. There wasn't any doubt anymore that they could drive Argus mad in mere moments if they wanted to. 'Damn you, just let me go already.' 'One last combatant and you will have earned your freedom. That is all we ask of you, nothing more and nothing less. Just take his life and you will be free to go and find a way out.' 'Slay him, slay him now,' came the voice deeper into his mind. It was someone who was being risen from the ground, the platform was somehow still moving and in the condition to push. This would be the last of his suffering inside this oven. Back to sweating, Argus thought. It was already quite odd to have salt just falling from his clothes and over the board. This would only get hotter from now on. His vision could only feel so damned. Before it could open too and he could earn his freedom, the abdominal happened. Something shook inside and pushed the platform onto one side. The entire arena got forced to fall as close to the wall as possible. This was the worst of yet, a strong push and turn which turned the wall where the spectators had been into the ground. Argus was close and felt no pain and no push, but soon found himself running and jumping. The thunder-like bolts came at once, when the bodies came and rolls. Metal striking against its own kind revealed something of a force he didn't even know existed. And overall, this was the true end of this attempt to subjugate Argus. 'Is this your doing too?' No one answered his question nor his plea, as they were silent throughout his entire damn minutes as he waited. Caught with his back against the wall. Something was happening, abnormal, taken, it was turning over again, but in the wrong direction. For a moment, Argus thought he was smart, having made the decision to remain with his back against the wall and feel no force throw or push him against the ground. Seeing the bodies suddenly slide made him realise just how wrong he was. It forced him into a desperate flight for survival, to reach the end before it was too late. But this was wrong, there was nothing there now, towards where he was forced to go. Just a damn damp place from where they'd been. It called for the creatures and now asked for Argus to call. He answered then. 'I'm coming for you then! And I will not rest until you're out of my mind.' The silence was disturbing though he knew that it was a sign. Just as the bodies fell, he reached the dark end and came inside with a leap and a grimace on his face. This would be the dampest and gloomiest place he had been inside. A land in itself, twisted and turned, mushrooms which were large and slightly decayed. They cushioned his fall once he came through the gate. Whatever happened in the arena, he once saw the pair of teeth those fungi had. They ate and extended it to the rain of blood which was happening. Plants lighted the place and from the likes of it, it was full of them. How deeper are we then inside? Could we have even moved at all? It was just strange to think that all of it would've been for nothing. But this was it and here he was, standing against what seemed to be a land which had taken everything he had. His food and water were away. Argus came to the point of merely just leaping from his landing spot to yet another. Their long bases were twisted, almost to the point where they had their veins all around their necks. Something was being pumped inside, as nowhere else had Argus seen the fluctuation of sizes he had encountered now. It seemed like this was more of a small factory than a place of great confinement. A shiveringly familiar sound yet found its way inside, once he had looked over and managed to take a glimpse. It was the two corpses which were no longer standing and were crushed by the fall. Suddenly, they were taken out of sight by someone or rather. Something. Other things mustn't be spoken anymore, that would be known as the rule of thumb from now on. The pain would be too great and the place seemed cosy. Long luminous bulbs which were lighting with a yellow strikingly strong power. It came as much as resembling stars. Dangling from side to side, in an almost mesmerising way. He let go immediately and fell into a safe distance. No wonder at that, the soil was soft and cosy, again, looking around made him feel uncomfortable. The worst being, looking above to see that there wasn't any sky, but a general gloom, lighted only by the stars which were forever bound to the ground. Insects roamed supreme and made tingling noises everywhere around. As much as they were too scared of the tall man, none of them seemed to make any more or raise any suspicion towards him. Pairs of small bright eyes were almost innumerable. Something was creeping around. Have they been the ones who crept and had taken the bloody remains? It was just the perfect environment for the small things Argus carried inside of him to grow. Inside those bodies which were taken something his was still trying to spread. 'Hey, hey. Can you understand me?' Out of his mouth came a pair of soft words, spoken as if he looked at another man to whom he gave his trust. None of them tried getting any unwanted attention. Some came closer as they heard him and saw just how he stood, almost still, just waiting for anything to come near him and interact. It was something made in good faith, that those wiggling insects flew a few inches into the light. They were flying in pairs, forming small group balls and changing places regularly. Thick bodies, the grunts of a colony, many wings attached, black and yellow, dripping with something. More importantly, they were connected by a long wire which was visible at all time. Despite their weird motion and flying in circles, and regardless of how thin was that wire, none of them managed to break it. Despite the pressure, they managed to show a sign of intelligence. 'I won't hurt you now.' Said Argus to the pair. He looked again at the dark and saw the small bulbous eyes and how they were still standing there just waiting for something. And that was already quite peculiar, to begin with. The distance between one another was too much for them to be standing in pairs. Not to mention that they were standing still as if they were standing on giant leaves. 'Shew, shew, be gone already.' A change of mind came immediately as he came to his senses. An unknown part of the worlds which was turned around. I can't trust anything. And as it turned out, they scattered immediately and filed away in different directions, just as confused as he was. None of them had any control anymore as some ended being smashed against the ground and got immediately crushed. This hasn't changed yet, I need to find a way out and get rid of what had taken over my freedom. Such was Argus' plan and it would've worked better if he knew where he was. Even better, if he knew where he was going. Alas, no one can have everything asked for and deny the petty. Especially those born out of the mushrooms. There laid a small tribe of this shallow creature made out of skin and fungus. It had something of both human and plant in it, borrowing as much as dirt to cover up the holes left as the rejected bits. Some of them were hiding under their roofs, protected by the dark. Their small rods of dark crystals scared the bulb so none of them would face the fear of being seen by someone new. Something about their small bodies and how much they borrowed from human seemed to bring fright to the corner of the eye. Many had as much as four or eight faces spread around the body, slightly working in the attempts. Faces were either killed in the attempt to suffocate those that went mad, and others were just stuffed with as much mud until they wouldn't speak. The ears were hard pushed and flat, but they could hear just as much, and listen and smell. Something they received gave new promise of a lot. Bigger, tall, stronger ones for their tribe. As the man was going to the place without a notice, they were already pushing to make the bigger ones, who've been spared by their tall gods. Considered divine gifts, they carried them to a smallpox filled entrance from the ground. From it came, in the inner depths, a tormented tongue which had everything wrong with humanity. A deprive long organ with multiple sharp, formless head which seemed to be gelatinous at first sight but immediately took the shape of something that would fit. It came with ease inside as poison met poison. It seemed to work even better with that one headless thing which had been shoved inside its own shoulder for a while. The process would take days or even weeks, but this would happen now. 'I can feel this.' Said Argus from a fair distance. Indeed, the soil had something else which everything other hadn't. As much as it went on the whole, this small world he entered seemed to have something more than everything he experienced in his memory. Despite his senses being shoved inside, he knew that this was wrong. The world got turned upside down, yet the plants would grow and stand still. If it came to it again, they'd only be tied to the ground. But where did those things come from then? Could they be more? Looking around, this would manage to make things a lot more difficult. Fighting those behemoths in a confined place with no weapon and just his arms, as much as they had intended, was suicide. And it was already too late for that, too far, too shallow. I need to find the road. One way remained, under the light of the dangling bulb which he followed. Unknown, still, they crept upon that alien-like armoured organism, removing what pieces of armour they could take. Something about their thick bodies made them repelled as they threw glances at what was inside. Though, now, it was perfect, as they were just the size. One by one came just above, as the long tainted tendril had been doing its job, they did as well. They buried inside the body, as much as they disliked ending their lives in order to do as such, they were too small to do anything else. Almost microscopic, in their sizes, to the point of no human eye being able to see any of them if they came near. They were riders of giant winged being which flew in pairs, defying all odds and going out there. It wasn't long until they prepared more and mounted, as much as a part of their colony was now bent on handling the two twin colossi. One was left walking still, without his coat, without protection. But, there was still something which made them reluctant to go for an attack, something familiar about him. At the same time, there was somewhat of a fear of what it bore inside. Fragrance for them was like a demon, flying and spreading and trying to lend packs to the most trusting and the ones who had no other choice but to believe. One deadly mistake was already done by their people and they paid it dearly after all. Crushed and buried, stricken by fate. They were dead and had been on the ground for the crash. Those that survived had lost their scent and floated in the sky. For, that was their fate, and death couldn't be denied. The currently they constantly fought was getting harsh and shallow, at the point where there was no denying that stopping the resistance only for a second would mean falling through the emptiness. A crevice which laid in the sky. It called and spoke their long forgotten tongue and spoke only by moving those long invisible fungi spreading antennas. Somehow they managed to get the message, for this whole that crept, hidden for so long was found again. In their small minds, small messages couldn't be understood, as they weren't as evolved to the point of understanding human speech like other species. Or even having one of their own. Clicks and biological small punctured holes pulled the air inside and transmitted the commands in their minds. Fear of light had to be delayed again, at least for those who had received it still. Others have failed and fled in the agony of receiving a punishment because they decided yet to flee from sight. Instincts were something deeply coded in their human side, as much as those things that entered in the semi-hybrid brain of theirs. Some commands worked to the utmost perfection, as much as others ended up as complete failures of understanding or the inability to move on. There had been something now of a conviction in these tall, almost animated things which could move as opposed to standing still. Little balls of fluff which were expelled from one another in attempts of whispers as to understand. What could normally be understood by humans could only come as. 'Could they be our new gods?' 'They are strong and mighty, just like that which came here.' 'Honour will be brought to us.' And rather other short compositions which could end up being unutterable at after being heard. It was shallow to look over the rain of blood, but the man stood by the side, covering himself with a small leaf, crushing the smaller ones which came to the greet the new creature. 'Look at how it's crushing them, how easily he took control.' Said Ptih, the leader of one of the brigades. As much as he resembled others, he was slightly taller, the faces more recognisable as they had more distinct and well-formed features. Even his hybrid part was more apparent, giving the combination of green and pink skin a yellow and red, perhaps even an ultramarine shade. Something was off with the small creature, already forcing itself to listen to its call. 'It could lead us to greatness.' Translation of the speech. It came fast, as he mounted and continued on this path others deemed damnation. 'He killed others.' Some protested. 'There was the only slaughter of the weak ones who couldn't fight or push themselves past the other weaklings.' Strong and bold, he had others mount and follow him, forcing the insect ball as further apart as to show him just how bold they were. One slight inch further and their entire dance would end up like the last one. A dangerous manoeuvre to tempt fate like that, quite so. As much as others have tried it in the past, they only ended up being launched further away and being crushed. Such fate was dark and painful especially on their way back to their source, being pulled back into the mushroom bulb was a painful process. One that kept half sentence at least for days until it was done devouring the engines. Those were the luckiest, thousands didn't share that fate. Especially since it kept the reserve at the bottom when just one of those still beings ran out of blood, guts or whatever it could pull inside to eat. Then, at the most desperate of times, it pulled out of its reserve. How many did they use now, keeping them alive to suffer? 'Is that your god and how he's punishing you?' 'No, we were told that we need to follow, that we would be saved. But this isn't a life for failure that we can live, brothers. Is it not worth it to risk it in order to earn that chosen one's respect?' There was somewhat of an understanding from that small, more evolved concoction. Especially the way it went deeper into that flying insect's brain, pushing and spreading, converting it into its most precious slave and master. Such journey would take a while and just as the remains came from above, this was clear. Another day would go and those who were at the bottom suffered. There had to be at least days where nothing had to come from above. It was only lucked that it smashed through the mushroom, those big things wearing their armour. Perhaps, that was even the reason for them now being worshipped by a small cult which was trying to revive them. Two decaying gods, standing and waiting to be alive again, that which has been dead for so long. They made no difference between what was living and that which was no longer with them. The only skin was slightly different in their eyes from the various other forms. Insects were distinguishable but close, rather, they were seen as transports from one point to another. Dangerously, they flew in pairs, tied to one another ever since birth. But alas, one pull and one push and everything would be gone, even the slightest touch of fear. That was their biggest flaw. Though methods came, control in the store never before had they went ahead to plant themselves inside their brains and grow. Various nerves, connected through the various mazes and the holes which made it do everything they wanted. Moving, spewing, even flapping those pair of wings faster or slower. Even the darkest command, which was abandoning the only thing that kept it alive and fed, that small organ that was evolved to connect to another of its kind. They bore information from one point to another, and as others connect, that information changed. For a time they weren't dependent on the giant mushroom to speak, for they had the perfect replacement for it. They themselves spoke to one another, or rather, the symbiosis between them and the insect brains which converted the speech into something grimmer. Have there been a time when everything hadn't seemed as shallow?" Go away, damn insects. They had been following Argus for a while, the only other pair he had seen following him. The rain had stopped, henceforth nothing was keeping him there and other than a slight need of exploration, there was still his main goal. I should clean this up somehow. He said, though as loud as he was, none of them understood what he could be saying. This was quite the distance now, as they approached, right within the range. As daring as they had seemed to themselves and others of the same appearance, this wasn't the case for Argus. Being followed by a pair of long flying insects wasn't the best of omens. Turned against them, he pulled a piece of the mushroom and threw it in their direction. The base of it was soft and tender, which made it more than easy to be ripped. Manoeuvres were used in order to avoid it, pushing through, flying further into the air, just in time. He's testing us. Went the message, through the various tubes inside those long, scarred bodies. There'd been only faith so far and it would continue until their very end. For, now they saw how easily he took away, ripping the body and disgracing their old lord. With an opening now and Argus gone into the shadows, it was obvious, that crystalline soft tissue they were seeing. It squirmed even though they had no eyes, anyone could see that they had sensed, recognising others of their own kind. They used to be their people and now they're being caught and trapped inside. Where could it be? Argus wonder as he walked through, there used to be a pair of weapons and a shield, all of which he had lost. Perhaps even a flame or something for him to ignite. At least those damn voices he heard were gone, if not only momentarily. How did they even get inside my head? Was almost as important, they weren't helping and promised to take over him and his desire. He found something quite bizarre. It was a tower in this maddening blood hungry jungle. Quite a small part of it and the tower appeared more like an outpost of some kind, split into two connected sides and adjacent to a wall. If you could call that thing a wall, hints of brick visible, yet, nothing else particularly signalled anything else of the sort. Huge areas of it got covered entirely by growths of plants which kept growing and growing until that point. Something stopped it from expanding and having any trouble, from being found and pulling a lot of attraction towards it. For a moment, after looking at it, perhaps, there had been a chance that it might've been there before he arrived and chose to see go into the dance. One of memory and disgust. At once, he opened the door, steadily, as something was odd with it. Once he was done, as hard as it did take him a few attempts and at least minutes. If not more. A giant room appeared, lighting automatically from a public device made of glass and small metal wires. The room was compact, driven into the wall and from the looks of it, no one had ever come inside for a long time. Not even dust came it, at the point where even the air was absent. Empty, to the point of one thinking that everything that had ever been inside got eviscerated. A peculiar approach but not one could deny the power of the being involved in this and judging from what he had seen, that which was empty, soon got to be. A gateway of my dreams, something for me to see. It came out of nowhere, this thought of his, which filled Argus with faith. Enough of which he closed his eyes and waited, trying to find out what used to be inside. Something might've happened in the seconds he had them close, for the cold breeze of a home was there. A kitchen, stove, a bear, clothes and even someone sleeping in the bed, covered in sheets. A lamp and carpets, something of a rustic house which didn't belong here and even a large trapdoor hidden under the bed which leads the basement, undoubtedly. 'Could this be?' And as Argus asked and grabbed the collar of the carpet, it became as sand and vanished between his fingers. 'These are too old now, make them real I say!' A grimace and feat, came through his throat, among his desire to go on. There was no one to listen to his command, as for what was happening, this seemed never to go beyond what it truly was. A memory from the past, someone who was truly here and now he wasn't. There wasn't any way to step on them or touch anything without the immediate disintegration. At least, the view as slightly comforting if anything. A fleeting feeling, that was true, but nonetheless, something which boosted his morale. It was the cosy fire, a certain warmth which he felt deep inside, stirred by something which he thought to be his own. A fear came into his, being trapped there as a punishment as a diving judgement would be supreme. Despite his paranoid self-distraction, he turned to see that the door was still open. His mind felt the release as his breath destroyed much of the carpet in an instant. It was at this hinder that he wanted to see more, or rather, what used to be under that trap door. Without being able to be stopped, Argus walked and at the point of reaching the man who was sleeping, or whoever used to live there, he just pushed through, seeing him shatter on the ground. A slight feeling of power surged through him. To be able to crush them as if they were nothing, a master of elements going wherever he deemed it necessary to go. 'If this is what it feels like being strong and mighty, I might even get used to it.' With a glance around and after being done looking and inspecting the place, there was a slight confusion. The spot was the same and despite everything being removed, this one thing had to be there. Chances were that it was still hollow on the other side, despite the lack of a ring to open it. Swarms were gathering on the other side. Through the door, Argus saw just a few colonies of them which gathered and waited for him and his juices. If they were anything like the fleas or mosquitos, despite being something of a more evolved, longer, sharper things, this was going to be a bother without any fire. There was a need for certainty and escape which manifested in Argus during the time spent there. 'I just need to find it.' His fingers swam through the floor, as he tried his best to find that one slight dent and separation which was intended. It had to be somewhere, they couldn't have sealed it lie that. Argus closed his eyes again, this time, feeling everything he remembered at a whole different, physical level. There was the latch, still to the same point. His body now cut through the bed immediately but managed to hold onto that one ringed object in which laid his desire. With a pull, it came out with an immediate noise. He opened to see it there, half-open but falling, as he was positioned to enter. The problem is that the falling door was soon to be closed forever now and nothing came into his line of sight to grab a hold of it, other than the edges of this door. With both hands, a foot below, he grabbed and held, as heavy as it was. The problem could've been avoided. It needed as much strength as it had, but after a push, he threw it away. This wasn't the main intention, for it to be crushed by its own weight and get thrown on the floor. Now, a square hole was left forever and by the looks of it, below was a place of roots, a tunnel or a semi-entrance to something of a place where they store their inner, most important bits of their bodies. Somehow, he was expected to go there. Without a way out, this was only but a path which was left open from years. Dirt ran by the sides and the roots somehow haven't grown outside or even deviated their spots. A dark liquid was dripping though, and bulbs of light were just formed and suddenly became active as he went on the stairs. Certainly, these were sturdy and bizarre. The tunnel wasn't deep, or at least it didn't take long until he was stopped by a dead end. This would be one nasty thing. From the appearance, it was a human heart, one that had grown to be as tall as Argus. Tied with many roots which dug inside and connected the forest with it. The disgust and repulsiveness drove him to do a shallow act and feel how soft it was, breaking and ripping it apart. In a slash made by his fist as he went down on it, something even grimmer was revealed. This was nothing but a fleshy distraction, a defensive mechanism which was made to protect the real heart. As the blood ran down his feet and that thing of meat fell alone, the real heart of this small jungle came to be. It was quite small, deeply rooted with canals and plenty of extrusions which made just spots for bulbs to grow. A production of something was in the way, through certain, that would remain a mystery. There was no other saying, this had to be destroyed. Outside, somehow, those unmovable plants started going and trying to wiggle on each side. Pushing their blood seeking antennae, they expelled them small bubbles of blood. That blood concoction of meat affected plenty, if not all of them to a level. They were desperate to stop him from doing it, sending a battalion to fight the intruder. Battalions were sent, mounted of flying frigates. They were regions of which those flies had grown rabid and more violent, having only but a rider. Some have been banished from the flying colonies, hence they were forced to live alone and fend for themselves. And in return, they evolved to be more ferocious, even spikes, ready for a fight. Long tusks and formations in the carapace were something to be aware, to the point where they seemed to be of another species altogether. Outside, Argus was unaware of the war which was going on, which already began. The man was too busy smashing the roots and the formation that he didn't notice how they were battling. Charging from one flank came the battalion in full motion, carrying spears made out of leaves. They could cut through anything and something more than that, double edged blades were carried, attached on their shoulders. A moment was filled with quiet, all alone until the two first troops met, the infantry came first in their twisted ways. Other than entangling one another, there wasn't any other way for them to go about fighting. It went down quickly after that, both sides tried doing as much damage during the fast motions. Even one mistake and the entire rank would just fall and die among their mighty steeds. It took only the flash of a bulb to decide the victor of the fight. There wasn't anything they could've done to protect themselves from the blinding flashes. Not much time spent in the light resulted in somewhat of a vulnerability which was soon to be exploited. Everything needed to know was there, as a blade suddenly came and cut through both the rider and its flying steed. They went down and broken the entire dance, dragging the entire pair of flyers below like an anchor. What remained of their riders had bruises and cuts plenty of wounds that laying around. Despite that, they were ready for another fight and something more than that. They were ready to live and die for what they believed in, including this. Seeing the others starting to march would be damned, left alone in the middle of the aerial battlefield. A dark chapter in their history, at least, that's what they'd say. Nevertheless, the dead landed in the soil, an honourable thing to avoid the pointless suffering. But that wasn't soon to last. Both parties started advancing on one another, having hypnotising dances and glances which were partially blinded. It's true, they haven't spent as much time there, but the rebellion had another thing missing from the ranks. A rider was just snapped out but an armoured flyer which came into the darkest of the flights alone. With an elongated tusk, it impaled one of them and hadn't stopped its charge until it managed to reach one of the tops of the mushrooms and push it inside. The pain came immediately as the small soldier was liquefied, becoming part of the base. And for the first time, there was a small audible scream that almost sounded human. In its last moments, it got pulled inside, never to be heard or seen again. The moment of confusion was only perfect for them to advance, just as they were returning, soon they'd find out that these riders were flying blind. Others were snatched from both parties immediately. So much faster and stronger, not to mention that the armour almost made these flyers partially indestructible. They were flying terrors now, taking from both, sometimes just knocking one another just to be pushed away. 'Come on already.' Argus had seemed to have found the main source of the growth here. It was somewhat of a nucleus, a formed white pair of giant moving contamination connected by a pair of roots. It couldn't be crushed, despite how many attempts there were, by mere hands. Neither could it be kicked or crushed by the looks of it. Even as a fight ran on, this was soon to be retracted. The blood and the skin around the meat tissue seemed to be growing at a fast rate in front of his eyes. Not any longer and this would regenerate. 'I need something else, think, Argus, think.' Whatever animated these plants have to die. This was important for his escape. There were no matched and no wood for a fire, the only thing he could do was this now. Close to it, he started sinking his teeth deep inside and felt the massive lumps just pop in his mouth. Dripping from it was a liquid so repulsing to taste that he'd rather taste his own blood or vomit. It sent the entire growth in the shallowest pandemonium it had ever felt. The light was flashing, every party were now attacking anyone in sight, even one another. Lesser one had been known to die immediately without remorse, taken and hidden from sight as they giant successors were getting ready to die as well. The base of the formations started melting at a fast pace. The meat wasn't growing but Argus couldn't do it anymore. Barely, after a few attempt, he pulled his teeth away and started splitting what had lain in his stomach. Meanwhile, the outside was a battlefield to be unrecognisable, toppled down corruptions, flyers that were disconnected yet were able to fly on their own. Armourd flyers which laid impaled and the worst, roots were grown around the small structure and started punching it. In the darkest confines of the green, musty hole, something of a partial lump had formed around the titan. It got up and slowly started walking, worshipped as one of them. Walking in two arms alone was hard when it was alive, but this could barely be happening now. It was controlled by that thing which laid inside there, the partially exposed spot inside the hold. It wasn't long until Argus could smash it and pull bits of it with its bare hands. This was to go and crush his skull and rip the far ends of his neck and a resolve to this conflict. Seeing how the titan was awakened, flyers came and charged only to pointlessly fall. It was too much of a chance to be able to go against. But those swinging fist just made it go through the motion as if it were nothing to it. Ranks were broken upon its sight. Who would even stand against their own lord who had risen again and started charging? Indeed, it had come at a moment utmost opportune, ignoring the open door through which it couldn't fit through. As he arrived, the beast started cracking stone with its massive fists. This was a true assault in its own meaning and power, in terms of strength and destruction. No one could deny the might, seeing how it went from strike to strike without even taking a break. Argus heard it well and as expected, to be brought to life, he went ahead and resume to crush that thing, with his fingers. Now, even close to it, he started biting and attempting to eat it through and through. Nothing was low for him, not even a slightly poisonous root which dangled and tried to reach him. This apparent core was the source of it and finally, it started letting go. They both ended at the same time, both the core got ripped from the roots and the beast had broken through. Even the sight of it was enough to send Argus in an alarmed stated. Looking through, from an opening below, he pulled the door and closed. It smashed against the stone and the darkness laid inside. Hope was still there since he saw that it might not be able to see anything at all. Driven by instincts alone, it might just come and leave, at least until the air would run out. Leave, leave, please, make him leave already. I don't ask for much

now. Though Argus, unknowingly, he'd get exactly what he wanted. At once the pandemonium was in motion. Nothing kept this small world from being turned upside down. Even he fell to the motion that came, holding only by the stairs. What came first was only but a spark, a sound of a knock, and the turning as the last thing. Argus saw darkness but found himself falling and standing on the closed stone door. His arms were holding the dirt, that would soon just fall as well on the sides. It didn't take long to look and see through the openings where the light came, but for a moment he saw the entirety of the turned tower under him and how the roots that held everything in place started letting go. 'I need to remember.' His voice said with a strong demeanour. This would act in his best interest at once. Lacking balance, he looked and saw how the long dark tendrils which had hidden got to stretch and ripped apart. Heavier objects and bodies fell faster onto the ground. And now, it came back to it, the town of his youth, smashed buildings, crushed under the various falling debris. The fall would be a lot to take for him and this is where they'd depart from the looks of it. Under him laid the broken tower and under the tower laid the body of the reanimated giant. At least half of its body got ruined. This was the end of it, just in time. There had been an opening where he jumped and held onto the base of one of the elongated mushroom and held dearly for his life. The main core, that thing of white which was expanding was still half under his arms. For good keeping, to say the least, as it still refused to go away. Argus finally fell on a grave of soft mushrooms, hiding under their various shells. Using them as shields until everything was done falling. The day came at last, as the sun and clouds left the place for a rain. The worst timing that could've been, he looked now at nothing but a grave of plants, of roaming insects and crushed homes. And above of him laid a dark hole which had no beginning or no end. A lifeless thing that laid there, in the middle of the sky. Nothing would grow there anymore, nor will ever expand. Their conquest was over now, and as he finally decided it was safe to get away from the scene, Argus came to his senses and looked around. Blood laid spreading everywhere, at least some of the people that were used as to be fed to that creature were citizens of this towns. It was hard with all the head, but this was obviously a ruse. Now, the extra weight was more than welcomed, one couldn't deny that. Whatever might've been the plan to bring him up there, this was somewhat of a lucky solution of his. And there they were, the giants in motion, slightly underrated and standing there. It was only a normal walk to get there, in his reach and from the looks of it, nothing would bring him any trouble anymore. The damned thing was thrown over board and left there in a pool of dirty water. It wouldn't grow without a soil, and with a bit of luck, it might just drown in it. Bruised and beaten, he walked. There was nothing too suspicious about him now, despite having looks about him, and soon the entirety of the town would come to investigate this site. He could envision it already. Falling mushrooms from the sky, blood eating plants and cannibalistic creatures that tried attacking us. It'd be only normal for them to try banking on a story of this calibre. From the looks of it, there were those who already came to ignore Argus and go for it. 'There.' Pointing out to himself, there was the outpost, the tall, wooden building through which one of the tall chains laid. Slightly further than it, in a connected outpost laid the other chain. These both had to be lowered in order for him to get anywhere if need be. The intricacy of it baffled him. Argus managed to notice the various ingenious devices which were hidden or placed ambiguously across the outpost. The connection was also made utmost clear upon further inspection. Both foundations were connected by a shaft. At least a few of the pipes were connected to both of them from the looks of it. Somehow the lack of other people around for so long made it look even more disturbing than it had to be. Old wooden planks, long pushing pumps and even some round glass pressure checkers. This was certainly going to be a weird manoeuvre to lower them. What was worse laid the lack of the voice of whom the taunts would certainly be pleasant. Hearing another voice other than his would've been pleasant. Something had crawled in his mind, making him want and desire to have his grim thoughts entertained. Only one lamp was lit, though the windows and the daylight made it much more clear than it should've been. There wasn't any other way to do this. Argus thought, looking through the glassy eyes and the beats of a statuette. It might've stood like a guardian once but now there was nothing it could do rather than standing still as a watcher. There might've been another on the other side, from the looks of it, apparently, there laid a dark grim force which seemed to pull at him. Ascending through the first outpost, he reached the first level, seeing a flat floor and a barrel on a side, two cabinets, a red carpet and overall, an orange light. A chair, at least, he missed it, rather comforting to be standing there and see just how far he just came. 'If only there was another one to spend the time with me. If only.' Even looking and checking his skin didn't do much to improve his mood. They looked normal, but what was normal anymore for him? The mundane image was tainted and only had hidden underneath decay, rotten bricks and wooden slabs. Even under the rug, there could be seen dust and a black odour of small cockroaches who made their homes under it. This had to be it, just a few more advancing slopes and he'd have arrived at the second one. Peculiar and strange, everything was placed behind, most likely as a joke of some kind. Chairs were tied to the ceiling along with a pair of carpets and some lamps. Plain and simple, it might've been an attraction in the past, lost in a memory. What was next to be another grimace turned out to be at the top of an outpost. A peculiar cabin which was turned and seemed to have a commanding spot of some kind. Upon opening the gate, there were clouds visible in the domed thing. Connected to this spot was the mechanism which undoubtedly was made in control of the chain. This was no joke anymore, nor anything that would've resembled any type of machinery he had encountered in the past. 'Here it goes.' He said with a tone almost uncertain. There were buttons, levers at least in eight different varieties, colours and spread across the board. Somewhat of a chained pump laid above which had to be pulled at an opportune time. He looked around and reminded himself where he was and who they were. Rather, who they used to be, the people he used to know and the strange passengers who came into the town. There wasn't any other way, it had to go now. Plenty of mistakes could be afforded, he thought, after all, just what could so many buttons really do? At first, there came an array of small strikes and the various coloured buttons which resulted in strong noises and the sound of a metal chain being flung. Once the lever and the chain came, he looked in front of him and realised the insane amount of speed he had come to be master of. It pushed itself below and crashed through the ground, breaking stone and cracking anything which laid in its way. Argus could barely hold himself but it just came inside. With a sudden blow, the machinery was destroyed along half of the outpost, leaving nothing but a hole below. 'That was close.' He noticed just how a few more inches would've crushed him as well as the rest of the tower. There was a harsher risk now than he had ever thought of it. The other one appeared to have followed the same example despite the fact that the two machines weren't connected. A blast came with a sudden gust of the wind which spread every piece of glass that laid around. Now, the grimace began. Too many times had the platform been defiled and left open for the problem be ignored. It was a simple notice that the people started becoming more twisted in their appearance. And that wasn't the only thing. Many of them who had been there laying in their homes became more prone to coming outside. Hunters, gatherers, the night came early at last. This is what had to be done with the two remaining chains. The balance was already gone now that they were crushed, and the entrance into that dark abyss was apparent. 'I need.' Before he could finish, he finally noticed it, the chains in the distance had been already been taken care off by someone else. Their fall was mighty and came off just minutes after he was done. It broke the illusion and left nothing but a bland metal platform upon which he fell. Argus couldn't control himself but let off a shout as his knees came into contact with the harsh surface. It broke his knees, but the deed was done. An empty platform with a figure standing at the distance, in almost the same situation as he was in. The speed it went down as it broke at every visible edge was untrackable. A stronger force kept him standing on it without being able to fall or get crushed on the sides. Though, regardless of that, the speed was still too unaccountable now. There had to be an end to it and at this rate, Argus knew he wouldn't be able to survive. Nor could the figure who tried walking toward him from the distance. Somehow, the man was much stronger, as Argus couldn't even move his limbs. It didn't matter anymore since it reached its destination. Both of them were released as it broke in half and pulled them into a substantially thicker and shallower than water. Released from his bonds, Argus could swim, though not above, debris falling prevented him from doing such. At least it was somehow breathable despite the pain he felt upon the impact. His eyes were open and he could notice that there were lights in the depths, deeper and further below. This didn't bode well for him, as the irregular movements gave a signal that something carried that light below. And the further he descended in, the less of a good idea it seemed for him to depart and follow it. 'Help.' Argus felt his lungs pulled out by the pressure as he shouted. It sent him into a convulsion. His plea wasn't entirely unheard, as something long and raspy grabbed him by the leg and suddenly he felt that force again. Speed increased, there laid only the fastened sights of sea weed and plants that were too long and evolved to belong anywhere in the ocean. There wasn't any pain anymore but fear of being so vulnerable and lost in this dark sea filled him with hysteria. No other human just a base of wonder, a cave revealed which loomed with somewhat of a breathable air. He was pushed by the side of it, unable to see or to understand how he got there. A fire place there? At last, that he could recognise out of all. The figure was most likely hiding in the water or behind some of the long encrusted spires of stone. There were some sounds made but unrecognisable at most. Barely now, could he wash and push away the seaweed which had crept around his body. From such looks, they acted like leeches, growing and wrapping around, with small puncture holes he noticed around his body. Argus was disgusted and repulsed by the discovery. Knowing by the sight alone that the place was filled with many of them, those, blood drinking plants and sponges. It was too much to take any more. Ripping them away wasn't pleasurable and gave no satisfaction. It only made him bitter to know. Even more than that, he looked at just how they wriggled once they came back to water and hide in the depths. They waited now, knew his taste and wouldn't take another bite unless they knew they wouldn't be able to let go. 'Who's there? Show yourself!' The echo almost made it credible, but a great shadow suddenly came to rise from the corner. It was hooded, robed and entirely covered in rags that hid the hands, legs and the face. The unnatural size of it made it apparent that it was something other than a human. Not that surprising, though there was some humanoid featured Argus noticed. 'Do you have a name?' Argus asked, trying to find any sign of intelligence from the thing. 'They call me Rahaka.' Fluent, eloquent, he spelt everything to the point and took no break in dropping the accent. It can speak. But, far more important. "Are you the one?" There was just enough room for interpretation, which he left for him to understand. "The one who dragged you here?" Argus nodded in surprise, at how quickly this thing understood him. 'You don't get a lot of visitors often, do you?' Rahaka made not move but jerked those two eight fingered hands in motions Argus couldn't understand. 'You want to get further below?' 'I want to get much further than that, I was called here to reach the very heart of it.' At the sound of Argus' declaration, he nodded. 'Were you waiting for me to get here?' 'No.' It was simple, not that he was on his own feet and walked sideways slowly, he noticed that there were other things hidden in the corner from which Rahaka emerged. The right moment at the right time. Though there was nothing he could offer it for this act of kindness. I wanted something though, it was clear, now that he was closer. Those big eyes, dark and pale, somehow made the illusion of many more of them being hidden under that hood. Before he could make any sudden movement, Argus was stopped. 'We are many here, much more than you could possibly know.' 'Is that a threat?' There was a moment where it made a sign that it wanted to make a move. Undoubtedly, if it swam so fast, it could reach him before he could finish exhaling the air out of his lungs. No, it stood and waited for something. The thought Argus had could only go as far and thinking of the skeletons and the remains it could've hidden in its corner. 'You said there are others here. Were you the one with me on the falling platform?' 'I was not.' 'Then could one of your people have grabbed the other one?' He might've been just like me, by the figure. 'Rahaka knelt and stood by the fire, getting as warm as possible. It spoke in a silent tone filled with an agreement. 'You should dry yourself, it's not good being wet for too long.' The rags made it obvious, though what he didn't notice until it was pointed out to him was the fact that even the blue sand in the cave was dry. Standing so close, unarmed next to it was a sign of trust. For now, at least, Argus had some of it to the creature that saved him and seemed to bear some interest for his well being. 'So. How long have you lived here for?' There was something of a peculiar set of sound which might've sounded like a sequence of numbers. At least two pairs came at first, then another sequence quickly came at least to accompany both of them. So far, none of it gave him any clue of how old this Rahaka was. 'Could you tell me in years then?' 'I do not know what is a year so I couldn't tell you.' This time his voice appeared to be more plastic than anything else. 'Forget it, I'll just assume that you're old. At least perhaps I'll find a way to relate to you.' 'You're old then?' 'I've. Let's just say I came past my prime, that's all.' Said Argus with a grimace on his face. It had been a while since he had found time to let go of a genuine smile and from the looks of it, this wasn't the best occasion. Nevertheless, he felt content for now, standing in this cove. 'Are we going to meet others of your kind at least?' 'Once you get dry, we might travel to one of their encampments if you desire.' 'Why are you helping me?' Came the quick reprise, Argus was ready to launch a gouging attack, a set of leaps made out of words. This came as a surprise to him. 'We're not helping you as much as we're helping ourselves. You're new, unseen, bring change. There's unsettlement between the clans.' 'And you believe that bringing a human, this strange race you found just swimming around could bring any change to your problems?' Rahaka nodded before going on. 'They need to see something new and hope. We don't see someone else living than our own. And already some of the clans think themselves superior to others. There is the mighty Shaaku of the iron grid, a greatly respected clan which is responsible for the great defence from above. Their iron nets block the debris that falls from above to infect our waters.' A possibly worse timing couldn't have been already, as the platform might've shattered anything that resembled a protection grid. 'Then there's the Rhaana, who claim to be the first descendants of the first being to have ever been created, going as far below to be the closest connected to our ancestors. You see, little creature, we haven't always lived in a small confined box.' 'You know of it?' There was more than a surprise just how aware he was of it. 'It isn't hard to notice and feel the walls, even when the time came for us to rise to the surface, how could we not see the metal prison they made for us. They say our ancestors were a dying breed, having to make the place for a stronger race to emerge. That is when our ancestors made a pact with an ancient entity in order to prevent their demise. Once they were kept alive and promise that the future generations would survive, they were pulled and dragged in this place that you see now. Our prison, yet their salvation. 'There was another one, this had to be, it couldn't have locked itself in the prison, only to ask me to release it now. Somewhat of a revelation, damn it. 'Rhaana, was it?' 'Yes, they claim to be a direct line from the first who made the pact. We will omit the smaller clans who aren't as prominent as have lesser members unless you have the time to hear hundreds of them by the ear. 'I'm fine, just tell me the other big ones. 'Then there are the Mooaki, the wretches, the scourge, the ones that are shunned. They feed on the long ones and the blood they're carrying. We're taught to be great swimmers even from being youngling, but it happens from time to time to be caught and bitten by the hiiki. 'You mean the seaweed that covered me entirely. 'Whatever name it may be given, it stores the blood for long enough. At least until the Mooaki come and plunge against their rubbery bodies where they can't defend themselves and suck on our blood. You could probably understand why it is that they are hated and disturbed in the society. 'For a moment, Argus saw a tail get out, filled with fins, as excited as it had gotten to speak with someone. It was dangling against the sand, hiding partially as he went on. 'They should've been ridden off and sent as outcasts for what they've done. 'What's so wrong about it then? You couldn't have gotten your blood back anyway. 'That is not the problem. It's what's doing to them once ingested, how it changed them, twists and pushes their rabid features. Tasting blood never affected the first of our people as it is written in our annals. Even more, it used to be used to treat wounds, sipping from a healthier close of kin, but the pact changed it all. The bond that was set on us affected everyone on a different level. It forked their tongues and teeth and had grown their nails, sharper on the tails. They're more aggressive and stronger, more bulk to their outer form than us. The rest of the clans are only lucky that they're just a few of them. 'Rahaka's arms became a sudden form more active in displaying his emotion. He could go around the fire, forming great shadow play of the forms they had and just how sharp and mighty they appeared to be. 'Blood doesn't forget but sags the body and keeps inside. We can feel our own blood when approaching the reef, that's how we are used to being guided. 'And you cannot do that if it gets stolen by them, is that correct?' 'That is correct. They are a threat to all of us and our living and had been for a long time. It is unknown whenever or not they are the reason for the disappearing of members of our clans. They are lost in the depths, never to be seen and found ever again. We can't feel the blood in the amorphous liquid, as it is too thick for blood to run and not stay untucked. 'And that's where the plants, these things that scrape the blood come into play. 'You learn fast, good. But carry this with you. 'Argus. 'Argus, carry this with you, wherever you may go, if you venture far below and alone, do not let them track your blood. Don't let them taste it and don't give it to anything else. They will find you and devour. That's what they say about those sick things, they've chosen to go this further below and be corrupted. 'Are there others then?' Again, Rahaka nodded his head. 'There are also of the main houses Laakari, the protectors of the children. Who are in charge of educating the young and protecting them from any outside influences until they are ready to join any other of the clans. 'Wouldn't being raised by one of the clans be a bad thing?' 'The clans have sent members to it to assure that they know everything that there is to be known about everything. With that, they are sure that there's nothing that is being learned without the consent of knowledge of the others."Even them?"Intersected Argus, with a curious tone.He was calm now and dry, ready to listen and learn more about this curiously interesting race.Rahaka knew who he was talking and nodded.'Only the smartest, cleverest and most cunning in their packs would join the clan. That way, it is assured that they aren't dragged into the mud.'"And the future generations raising from there?"Some join the clans, other go back and take the places of their former teachers once they attained enough information of the new world."Of what clan are you then?"This was the question he wanted to ask for some time now.There was no expectation that it'd be answered with a chaotic silence that would reek for so long.'I'm an outcast, banished from ever joining anyone of them ever again.'"What have you done?"Two hands fell on his knees if at least the bones seemed to mimic the ones in human anatomy, or rather, the other way around.For a second though, Argus felt something too, in that silence in which he waited.It was a pain in his arms, which went as deep and steeply through the mass of muscle that it managed to get to the bone.Rahaka wasn't apparently focused on him, hence, Argus felt for a moment just how deep this hollow spot went for.Without a doubt, there was something inside.An end was felt no soon after, it was a vague thing that didn't really compromise the sturdiness of his bone. Then again, it still managed to frighten him nonetheless.Somewhat a set of words got carved inside his body without him even noticing it happen.'I have committed a terrible crime against my people.My punishment became never to join again and to live alone for the rest of my days.'"What have you done that's so irredeemable then?"I have made the same mistake as our forefathers and made a pact with the being which lies below.The elders never forget anything though.They deemed me guilty of the same sins that brought us to this cage and decided that I am to live the rest of my days banished from their sight."How could this be fair?They're doing nothing more but to run away from their past.You shouldn't be the one left to suffer."I am aware of that and also of the fact that I was forced into servitude and to find a way to free him.But on the way down into the drowned canals and forked spires that moved, I got lost along the way and almost wrapped in the reef of blood.It is a fate that I had wished for no one to have or carry other than myself.And on the way, I have failed to do as such.'"What will you do then?"What could I possibly do but try again?Now that you are here and we share the same goal, as it seems, we may have a chance together."Are those the only class that you've spoken of?Are there others that might oppose us?"There are more than enough, but most of them should just ignore us if we don't wage beyond my boundaries.We should be safe as long as we go below and not further into the front.In a way, though, you were lucky that you've managed to come this way and not be found by the clans.'Lucky indeed, Argus thought.This creature would be indeed helpful, especially with that speed it seemed to convey in such a short time.He pushed further in, now standing, and getting ready to release the slightest moisture that he had in his body.'Will it be dangerous?"I've barely managed to be dragged out alive in order to be judged.I'm not entirely aware what lays deep below and I cannot assure your safety either.If we go there now, they might decide to come below and interfere with what we're doing."I have to go there regardless if someone comes to stop me or not, do you understand that?It's not up to me to take that decision."I understand."Then, are you ready to go against them again?"Wait."There seemed to be another thing that needed his immediate attention.'There's something that they put me through once they caught me.We'll both have to answer in front of the council if they catch us.Believe me when I say that this isn't something to wish for.'"If.And what if we won't be caught?What do I have to fear?"I do not know what punishment they could bestow upon an outsider such as yourself, perhaps banishment or worse.They wouldn't choose to starve you, despite that being the plan for the worst in the bunch. Rather, they'd bring you through the spine of confinement and find a way to bring you outside. "What was that?" I said, they'd rather find a way to push you outside rather than imprison you just to die from starvation. "How?" Rahaka, I thought this confinement only ran one way, that started at a point and leads to another. "No, this prison is long and sturdy. It could take days even to swim through it all." You mean to say you can? There was a shock, a surprise now. Argus felt content on listening even closer. Everything inside is connected at its core with this liquid which holds the cage still. Every room and every single passage are being held by it. As a matter of fact, it holds as well as well as giant gaps we can use to roam around. Rather, ones which I used to go through. "Why not run and hide then? Judging by your speed, you could've escaped if you wanted to a long time ago. There's no faster creature I've ever seen." I would die alone. "You live alone." But they are close. And it is close now. Rahaka pointed towards the floor, but the meaning of it was far deeper than it appeared to be. The point is that this structure runs much further than a small box. That thing was just a part of the confinement, whatever came before that was part of the machine. "My entire journey, you meant to say." It could've been nothing more but you roaming along the entirety of devices which held him locked. And by the sounds of which, you might've had yourself familiarised with it. To say the least, this means that Argus was trapped for far too long in what he had thought. What the thought to be an altered version of reality, one which roamed deep and crept along its corners. Even now the shadows made a sign of skin, in the darkest corners. They were somewhat of a reminder of what was soon to come. "This revelation of yours, does it come at a price?" Not at all, we like talking to new people, especially I. It's been too long since I found a worthy one to talk to during this confinement of mine. I'm assured that this so far has been quite the journey for both of us. Even so, I think I know how he feels being trapped, don't you? His clothes started falling off. There was an amphibian colour or a hint of it, a fin, tail. But soon it was revealed to be of brown, dark, almost entirely covered by layers of thick long carapaces. Two big eyes and two lower ones and behind on if, two forked long cylindrical organs protruded from under the pit of the arms and into the back. There was a hint of colour change which made him aware of the presence of a true set of colours. Perhaps so many years alone managed to Hagger the appearance, for bone and skin appeared to be the main conduit. Some of the ribs were visible, at least twenty in going rows below and if this was one to be starved. Then, the blood drinking ones were some to fear. The almost alien appearance didn't seem to bother him at the end. So this what you look like. It spoke through a hidden protrusion which opened on a few sides, which were almost wrapped. There were four holes from which extended tubes that produced the sounds he recognised as words. I must apologise if you may feel repelled. I've not encountered any of your species in far too long. They moved at different angles and times to produce the sounds and accent that were needed for certain words. Now, his entire attention was set towards it. This brown thing is the result of my punishment, my crumbling body. They covered me with shame only to further my pain and remind me. If I recall correctly, this colour and this certain set appeared to belong to the. Common cockroach, slightly further off. I became deprived of my pure blue and divine amphibious forms for what I've done. Won't it be washed away? It may never be that way ever again. This mark on my body was set to last forever as a reminder of who I am and what I've done. Enough about me and my past. You've come here for a reason. I have. Argus pushed his hand forth to receive the other. The speed through the water forced him in a motion he couldn't recognise. It was almost like he was going through the land, cutting a line through the water. He had failed to recognise when he was at the top of the underwater shallow cover and when they began to go. Way too fast for the human eye. The vortex appeared to be at a bottom at least, in a break they took. Somehow now, the brow appeared to come slightly off into the water, revealing its true colours. Water spears were the thickest down there. Clearly, the vortex had some power, if it truly leads where it means to lead. There was one problem, that was twice as worse than the speed. The speed Rahaka had managed to cut so far through everything, leaving as much as no blood scaper on either of them. And as they stood in the water, more of his true form was revealed. For a moment there, Argus saw those pearl-like eyes, pure, and shiny, almost like the diamonds of the sea. What appeared to be rough now seemed to be where it belongs. This was indeed his home, his world as per say. And now, he was to abandon him, the same as he did when he was forced to undergo this journey. 'There will be no return for us.' Slightly muffled, this time there wasn't any extreme pressure that forced his lungs to burst out. He nodded but soon appeared to look nervous and visibly shake. As a matter of fact, it was so terrible that his body started forming bubbles and pushing them out at a rate which was unnatural. Something's happening. Rahaka grabbed me and started the great descent. This last piece of the sea through which they threatened was thick and shallow, as much as marshes were. The similarities of this event made it seem like he had encountered it before. A hole which leads him towards a familiar place where he was to be embraced and held. Despite that, the way towards it appeared to be harsh and push back. The sudden approach stopped both of them as an array of hands restrained them from going any further. With a sudden glance, he was blinded again by the speed they managed to go at. Without a word, they were both pulled and forced into this fast tunnel they made in the water by their speed alone. It went through hoops and lowers, higher where the pressure was strong until finally, they felt the land. It was another cover, as the one where he found the outcast. Bigger, the rows of stone made the place for them, the ones who acted like councilmen. It was obvious where they were, and how they stood so close to one another, looking behind at the rows. Once the vision started adjusting past the blurry figures, there were obviously hundreds of them watching, standing to see the trial. They wore robes and stood on their feet like the humans. And another thing they appeared to have received as well. Beaks of some sort were on their faces. Some organs on the outside appeared to be different too. Rahaka was given a robe for him to cover himself. There were whispers and talking in the crowd. More importantly, they butchered him and his face before banishing him, something which he had missed to say. The council appeared to be made out of fifteen members of different clans. If it was true, what he was told, the most rabid and sharp beaked, the one who almost came to the point of changing the scales and the fish eyes to a red devil. Fins on the sides appeared to make it look like a sharp, but those forked teeth made it appear so much ferocious. Especially since it was the only one breathing through its mouth. A lot of talking in-between the council as well. Scholars, oarsmen, hunters, creator, they've engraved their symbols through the stone. Clean ceilings, marked as well and not to mention that the rows on which their people stood had something of an ancient civilisation to them. 'Why must we wait?' 'You will be silent until we figure out what's to be done with you and your friend there.' Said the head of the council. It was obvious that for Rahaka, this second account would bear a terrible punishment at least. Even, to the point where they'd most likely tear out a limb or two in the process. He could look around as well as Argus could hear how those small blood sucking sea devils were laughing as they stood and watched. A form of sentience was the presence, but the mockery was repulsing and annoying. Something quite unwanted. The guards were too far and appeared to bear no weapons, others than the bulk of their bodies. They had some sort of crustacean wearing around their forms and appeared to be as menacing as they needed to be. No exchange so far, other than arranging when came the turn for Argus to ask. 'Are you going to do something or not?' 'You will have to wait for a proper way for us to find for this ordeal. We've never had to judge someone this peculiar way before.' The voice was sturdy but strong. There was a long back and forth, but this was the least disturbing thing so far. It was that intense need to stare into the eyes of another that the blood drinker in the council wanted. He was looking through them, at them, both Argus and Rahaka. They were solid red globes, gone so far as to be filled with blood, which reacted as much as the most sudden movement to roam the globe and be splashed around. The harshest of punishments would come from it, most likely. Despite the grin and the dull look, he appeared to be harmless. 'Is there any other way for us to escape?' Argus asked him in whispers. They were close to one another despite the height difference, which made it as easier as it appeared to be. 'I don't know I'd try such thing now. We've had our chance and we have failed.' 'But we've not even got so far at all.' 'Silence now, until we decide, as I have said, I'll have you stay like that. You're being judged now for a crime, your rights to speak have been resigned.' There was no worse of a declaration he could've heard. All his rights, even the one to freely speak, given to him by mightier men, was being taken away. This was nothing official, he knew that he wasn't one of them. Argus was an outsider, as much as Rahaka would've been if he stepped outside and was charged with the same crimes as him. Henceforth he stepped further than him, stopping only a few feet away once he noticed that the guards were getting quite nervous. There wasn't any way he'd make a move, knowing their speed and seeing how this time they carried weapons. A need became apparent. Argus tried to get their attention despite hearing what he heard before. What he wanted had now been granted as the whispering momentarily stopped. They stared at the man with their pearls, reflecting his image in their eyes. Someone had to say something sooner or later and from the looks of it, this became more of an audience than a trial. 'What gives you the right to judge me when I'm not one of yours? I've no idea how you act down here, after centuries of being caged, but what do you think it gives you the right to judge me, a human being?' Both the members of the crowd and of the council were provoked to respond to his accusations. With one exception maybe, the rabid one who hadn't said anything but looked at him as he was juicy. That one could end up being more of a bother than the rest of them. Argus thought, knowing that something was going to happen between the two of them. Regardless of who won this audience, it may come to trading blow between the two of them, as a sort of sore loser of some kind. 'Silence, all of you. I will have you know that you've. You've allied yourself with a traitor and invaded our homes, ruined our mood and dare interrupt time and time again. If it weren't for you, we'd still have the dome over our heads, protecting us and hiding us under its shadow.' 'What have you to prove that I'm the one who caused that to happen? I've done nothing of the sort.' 'Then how have you arrived here if not for the broken dome? And are you imposing that it's a mere coincidence that it happened to fall at the same time as you've arrived? Do you take us all for fools? Because we will have none of it for as long as I am the ruler of this council.' The beast appeared to be more like a leviathan, close in size to it as it was, more fins than one could count, and a wiggling pair of tails which couldn't be controlled. The attire it wore, made it apparent that he was the rules, as not only did he stand in the middle of them, in the semicircle which was their standing stone. But, golden, red, blue, and a dark violet made it seem like his materials were pure silk and golden dust, taken from the various hoards of the sunken ships. 'I meant no disrespect, merely.' 'I've brought him here.' Rahaka suddenly stepped in, both in his circle, closer to Argus as it appeared. It left everyone shocked, to hear such a thing. 'But he isn't responsible for this, I'm the one who brought him here.' The impertinence of you all. Send them to the prison cells, we will hear them shortly after. Both Argus and Rahaka complied to the orders of the council, making no sign of resisting. From the looks of this, this cover wasn't the council alone but led to their city, one that was partially drowned in the liquid. Pieces of it were made out of sea weed, coral reef, giant underwater stones and piece of the giant cage. Not to mention that everything which fell through the cracks in the walls got repurposed for this alone. The way it appeared to be, the spires got sharper and more like shells, going as much as appearing to be jagged and ripped at bits. There wasn't any dent visible but the rows of it made it appear like it was more like a torture mechanism created for giants to step in and feel the punishment for their wrong doing. Under them laid a large variety of sand which got softer which each iteration, up to the point where it didn't feel like sand at all. More and more of them roam around, as this who weren't present and outside their homes looked upon the outside and the man. It was obvious that most of them haven't seen a human at all. They didn't even know how it was that he acted like. As some bold ones approached, especially the curious creature, Argus' face turned. 'Roar.' Came as a recognisable sound, a most ferocious that send the ones walking into a stumble, as they almost fell upon their backs. They were crawling away despite not having realised that it was more of a joke than anything else. There wasn't anything to fear from Argus but from his companion. It was obvious who he was. 'Do you think we stand a chance Rahaka?' 'I do not know.' 'At least we are allowed to speak again.' 'We will have more time for that if they decide to let us rot there.' In truth, there had been a line formed behind, one made of guards, various enforcers and others, to which a few more were added to the front. 'Why so many of them?' 'I believe they think us a threat, more than anything else which had happened in a while. It's because of our choices and what we've both said that made them see us as outcasts.' And because of the presence here, both of them were placed in the same cage. Tight, locked with only one sturdy lock of intricate design, guarded by a few that spread around. Eyes were all around though, which was something they couldn't help since they were unable to be everywhere at all time and control their population. A curious eye or two gazed upon the strange creature with two legs of average height who had no trouble walking at all. As a matter of fact, the gossip that Argus heard got as close to being praised than anything else, Walker, trouble maker and such. But there such things as the way he kept his balance and appeared as being natural. Just as much as they were in the water. 'At least they didn't separate us now. We plan our next move from here until they get us to the next court call. So what's plan chief?' 'There might be none unless there comes a miracle on the way. They've got us and from the likes of them, they won't have a rest until they'll have us both sent to the mines or worse.' 'Working us to death? Is that what they do when sending those who cannot live as outcasts?' 'No, Argus. That is not the point, ours was a special fate, a certain specific punishment which we had to endure.' 'Who is this ours then?' Rahaka paused, making sure he was at a safe distance to whisper and to speak without being heard by the two adjacent guards. There was at least something of a fair ten feet away from them, with nothing behind but a tight wall which sort of connected with the rest of the cove. Other cages just laid around just twisted turned, as well as the bars were, fragmented in grains. It didn't leave much of a spot to be guarded due to how they were placed. Nonetheless, there seemed to have been something important to him. 'There was another outcast with me.' 'And what exactly happened to him?' 'He was caught at the same time with me, in the same circumstance as I have, received the same fate and having to live in the same place as I. The only reason why you haven't found us yet is that he chose to flee. Not only this area but escape this bigger prison, going to the surface. I am still unaware whenever or not he succeeded in his attempt, though I am aware of the fact that I may never see him again. "You meant to say. How much time did you two spend together there?" As much as years, if I'm correct, we bonded but he left, he chose to make away and leave without a trace. There was a pain in his throat, and these rags couldn't cover him entirely. Something haunted him from the past, without an obvious need or care. He used to carve things in the cave, writing against the walls, without realising the feebleness it bore. You see, the rock grows back despite how hard you push and stretch it. Regardless of how much he wrote in one day against the wall, it would disappear the next day without a trace. The deeper he started carving, the further it got pushed back until one day he decided it was no longer something he needed to be doing. He understood the fact that the two of us wouldn't have been able to go down there and now. Now, came a depression. They stood still for a visitor. It managed to bring an image of fright despite being unarmoured and alone. The size difference was clear, as it was close to being a barrel or two stacked barrels taller than the both of them. 'May I speak to the prisoners?' It was the tongue you'd find slithering inside the mouth of a snake. And now, it was bore towards him. Something of a dark demeanour managed to creep under him, just as the air started thickening into a mist. A pale pair of eyes made it apparent who it was and what it did. Obviously, something happened in the court if one of its members managed to stick and come. 'Look at how it's salivating, I don't think it came here alone to talk. "Be careful and respectful Argus, this is something we can't risk to anger.' Both of them raised up and from the looks of it, at least Rahaka was almost, if not slightly taller than the blood driven creature. Its claws grabbed the two metal bars. Immediately, the guards reinforced their position, bringing more of them to make sure that nothing was about to happen. 'I've seen you come into the court at a moment more opportune and I know what you are. Fresh meat!' There was something about his breath which muffled everything it reached in contact. The forked tongue appeared to have scales on its side, as such as sharpening against the metal as it waited for any of them to say anything. 'What do you want from us?' Argus asked as he approached, this time he didn't act like a scared animal but returned the gaze. He wouldn't do anything here and now, this was obvious. And even more obvious was the fact that he'd not let himself be intimidated at all. 'Argus, I've not told you of the other rumours back in the cave. The darker ones.' Rahaka whispered in his ears. The blood-driven one was too distracted to pay any sort of attention to that. 'They say they've gone as low as to earn their own when approaching death and attack others at night. Don't get too close.' Warned Rahaka, knowing that something was off with his behaviour. This creature made its way here and waited. 'A big closer, now, do not make me wait.' It was almost like its saliva was boiling with as much much to be boiling in the mouth. One of its organs appeared to be producing a dangerous amount of heat. 'Where did you come from? Are there others like you just roaming around here?' It asked the opportune question as its eye started venturing around the neck area and where Argus' muscles were. A little battered but that's how they liked the meat to be, beaten to a pulp. Not enough but soon to be, we shall feast on him, as soon as they pass the judgement. The being couldn't help but think of how juicy the meat appeared to be. 'It's none of your business whenever there are others like me or not.' 'Oh, but it is, as you see, I'm the key in passing the judgement for your many committed crimes. There will be a need for an executioner after the judgement had passed. And I may as well just take that upon me. Now let us start again with this. Are there other as juicy and strong as you are?' There was nothing but cruel silence from Argus. It infuriated the being to the point where it pushed its nails out. As they started falling, it became trying to crush the bars with its mere hand alone. Soon, that stopped once the guards nearby saw it act up and became tense. 'Not now, but do not worry, we will have time to play during the interrogation. We shall find out everything about your people and what they taste like. Mark my words.' With a final slam, it finally left, making its place through the guards and the crowd which still waited. This brief meeting was quite enough to leave a mark or two on the prison cell. 'Why do you think it's acting that way?' 'They are seeking for a new source of meat, apparently, their own must be getting stale. I'm sorry that you've been dragged through all of this.' 'It's fine, at least, it completely ignored you in this way. There's at least a chance that one of us might get spared in one way or another.' Rahaka nodded his head and resumed sitting in his corner waiting. Chains filled with keys laid on the backs of the guards, just ready for the taking. Seemingly they got distracted, perhaps as much as he had thought them to be. Closer to them, Argus just walked around the walls, seemingly, being swallowed by the other cages, this appeared to be more of a crypt. Especially since the dark came sooner than expected. 'Don't try Argus. They're much faster than you are nimble, believe me.' 'I wasn't going to attempt anything.' Said, Argus, as he resumed sitting. It was within his arms reach, that he could've stolen and escaped. Despite how ridiculous this plan appeared to be, caught off guard, Rahaka could've pushed and knocked them out. These years he had spent as an outcast most certainly added some bulk and raw strength. It was obvious that even the blood drinkers that passed looked at him with respect. Even as much baffled Argus to the point of asking. 'Why do they look at you this way?' 'Because of who I am and what I've become.' 'And exactly, who are you?' 'Do you remember the leader of the council, the one that stood in the middle of everyone, waiting to pass the judgement?' 'There was an immediate shift of the head.' 'That one is my father, the leader of our clan of scholars who were assigned to pass the judgement on other tribes and clans. Regardless of other species, races or other deviations, we were trained from young to distinguish and to lead a controlled meeting. All in hopes of passing a fair judgement and punishment.' 'And you betrayed him.' 'I left because I chose to follow the promise of the choice. That doesn't count but I was forced to do it, to go into a place of no return. In the process, I have failed and got brought in front of them to receive my fair judgement. Look at this.' Again Rahaka revealed its twisted face tendrils, the small tubes that seemed to be coming in and out and a rate that wasn't as apparent. It was silent to the point of others not being able to hear, but it was clear that some looked at the deformation of his face. Storing just flowed around the city, and this was, in fact, the first one to ever be punished for the crime committed against their entire race. 'Do you think this is part of my judgement?' 'It's only that my father had declared that this punishment it owed to me alone for the shame I've brought to my family. Being an outcast was the only official.' With that, he covered it back with the piece of rag which he was given. It was just as clear now that in the trial, the being did everything to avoid looking at the son while it was there. To the point where. 'Will they make us sit here and rot rather than give us a fair calling?' 'There's nothing fair when the verdict is decided before we've even been judged, Argus.' A giant creature soon came, twisted at the knobs, almost as wide as a barrel, covered in scales and strong as it came. It was enough to grab one end and the other as the guards made some place for it to come. The strength produced just twisted against its sponge-like body, becoming as thin as it could until it broke the gate. 'You are being called to the court now. We are to escort you and make sure that you are safe after the audience is complete.' Spoke the other creature that stood near its brute. No resistance whatsoever, both Argus and Rahaka followed the creatures which promised to act like their escorts. Rahaka raised himself immediately, standing just as tall and above the gates of the confinement. This was most uncertain especially since they were lead to the opposite direction of the council. Something wasn't entirely right. And when was there ever a need for an escort when prisoners came to mind? 'Why are you doing this? Who sent you?' Asked Argus. None of the guards and other mundane ones who were left behind appeared to protest despite the path they took. It was peculiar even for them to see another creature other than their own appear just to pull out the gate. None of them even dared fight back. 'You don't need to bother yourself with such trivial matters. As you may have guessed, this isn't the path to the council. The trial has been suspended indefinitely on the orders of our Emperor.' 'The Emperor?' 'There was something off, that he knew off, but the attire he wore appeared to be nothing but a degradation, something less than what would've been given to such a royal messenger as him. 'What would the Emperor have to do with us? We're nothing but an outcast and a creature which came here, nothing more and nothing else.' 'Rahaka, your exploits have been known ever since you stepped a fin inside the water. Did you think it wouldn't come to our Emperor's ears one day or another? Believe my sincerity when I tell you that you're a fool. Every action which you've taken was noted.' 'Meaning?' Came Argus, still wondering how he'd fit in all of this. They could've left him there alone to stand trial. 'We know why you're both here, the Emperor know, and he has decided that it is best for our people if the one would no longer be imprisoned. For the empire has decided it's no longer an option to stand and wait for our extinction in a prison that's to be buried and lost forever.' 'There was a distance between them, enough for a small set of whispers. Luckily, they were allowed as the escort nodded at the action with utmost understanding. 'How can there be an Emperor if your world is governed by clans?' 'He is the leader of another clan, it's a matter of fact that his clan or rather had become the strongest among others. That's when he decided to declare himself the Emperor of our species, decided that since he has all the power over everyone else, he should rule them.' 'Is it something new then?' 'Rahaka nodded, though in a disagreeing matter. 'No one knows how long ago he declared it, but somehow it managed to last as far as we have reached now. And no one instead has ever managed to dethrone him.' 'They accepted him then!' 'No.' 'Surprisingly, their host heard that and answered with a muffled voice. 'Not everyone came as quick to accept him, despite his power and benevolence. Others have come as quick as to reject and deny his message, though most of them came to terms with it. Regardless of what they call our leader, they cannot stand and deny his forced and his empire.' 'Now they stood at the entrance after walking for so long. It was a concave, twisted, trimmed end of a giant cave which seemed to bore the entryway to his empire. Something in the way it was shaped made it appear as if it was the portal to another world. Perhaps it was the water at every edge which poured from above and this wasn't the dirty version of it. Pure, light water, which Argus couldn't help but get closer to it. 'May I?' 'Suit yourself, we're drinking only on a couple of days notice, but for you, this may be a one-time exception.' He nodded to his creature and left him to drink. It was pure, almost as close to being spring water as he could find. The taste was distracting, yet he noticed nonetheless. It was indeed, the second part of their city, a giant set of crustacean stones arranged to form their kingdom. The buildings were taller and sturdier, seemingly made to resist an assault. A military base at least, under the corral and even going as far as having giant dark shallow bulbs filled with the water and the sea weed creatures. 'Why do you keep them here?' Argus was close to being too curious for his own good, wanting to do more than to explore, but feel what was going on. 'You're about to meet him, don't despair.' 'There was somewhat of a colour change in what he saw, growing red and blue, closer to a bright home as he approached. His senses were confused, intoxicated, muffled, pushed aside and knelt under the pressure. This appeared to him like there were trees standing there without dirt under him, flowers blooming, hills which stood around. Somehow, the small bits of decay he had appeared to be seeing from the distance had just disappeared now that he got closer. Even the creatures appeared more humanoid than anything else, something which he could feel and touch. To understand like they were his own people. 'Don't be tricked Argus, this isn't right. They may have stricken a deal with him. Indeed, something was pulling their senses, stealing them, in this paradise. All their desires could've been met in splashed of a second or two. Every need, anything they could've asked for, as they were greeted by kneeling slaves of races which they haven't even encountered before. Small creatures which seemed to walk on eight legs but with an overhanging torso which bore two heads each. One listened to the commands while the other who controlled the body obeyed. It was a union of lower and higher beings, those who served and others who pushed their commands upon them. Somehow, this appeared quite repulsive to Argus, the way they treated these small creatures as their slaves. 'What's going on Rahaka?' 'Bear with me, we're in the same position, you and I. Trust me Argus and follow my lead. What will be said here will determine our path together.' 'And what exactly have we come here to do?' As the door open, both parties were pulled inside by a force they couldn't touch but feel wrapped around their bodies. This force that pulled them in managed to push the door closed upon their release. Something other crept along with him, at the edge of his eye, a dark spot in the dark corner. 'This place will drive me mad if we keep staying here.' Said Argus with a confused look on his face. Between them, he was the most affected by the entire ordeal. For the first time, the illusion had taken effect, the marble floor appeared to be moving under him, the halls were infinite. And at the top of the staircase, it leads to a forked path, two other pairs which lead to another and another. It appeared as if they were bearing to him, their lord in his empty halls. He was standing there, a creature which managed to conjure a dark illusion around the body, making it appear much bigger than it actually was. 'Where are the other servants and warriors if he's indeed the Emperor?' It was a whisper which was almost lost. Rahaka heard it nonetheless and responded. 'There are none anymore, are there?' With that said, its echo ran among the tormented hall. This Emperor flickered his vision and the illusion disappeared. 'Thank you.' Argus was almost on the point of being overrun by an insane headache he felt. Mere speculation as he had presumed everything to be real. But this was a tormented place, seemingly a war zone after a second glance. What he used to have was nothing more but a memory of better days. He hadn't been wrong in a long time and it felt petty. To look upon his desolate throne and his last two servants. 'Why did you call for us then?' This place looks like it had seen better days. 'Careful Argus, don't anger him, he may be alone and his army may be gone but he still has something left in him.' Finally, the Emperor raised himself from the throne and approached. It appeared like his body was slightly taller than Rahaka, with a scar or two and the amphibian blue colour. A green laid around the collar and his beak was slightly forked, unevenly so. After making his way he stopped in front of him and came into an embrace. This appeared to be quite shocking for Argus to see, as he was struck again confused. 'It's good to see you again brother.' At which Rahaka nodded. 'And I see that you've brought a companion this time, with quite the tongue if I may say.' 'I'm sorry to interrupt your reunion, but could it be that you may help us or not?' 'We're not entirely time free from what we've got to do.' 'Very well, you shall follow me.' Jormund, Gath, stay here and delay whoever got caught of our ruse here. Both of them nodded and obeyed. The illusion that he was the Emperor had lasted quite enough already, as he thought. This was the moment he was waiting for, the escape. There was a secret mechanism right at the crooked wood. They had real wood, which amazed Argus, even if it didn't last for long. Shallower as it may have seen, he wanted to stay and look out. But it was too late as it appeared that this was going to end fast enough. A secret passage opened from the middle of the stairs. 'Go through, it should lead to a remote well that leads to another vortex.' 'Why haven't you used it when you had the chance?' 'I couldn't have done it even if I wanted to, someone had to keep the illusion in check. We were waiting for you to come and go there, have you failed to realise that?' Rahaka nodded as well. It was a lie, as well as it lasted. 'I would've appeared suspicious if I told you that I've been waiting for hundreds of years for you to come.' The Emperor intervened for the last time. 'This settles it then. You will both go down there and finish what had started. At least you go with the reassuring thought that you can't get any rougher than this brother.' There came the shout of an attack. Bloody reapers were coming and could be seen and heard from far away. Something about them managed to creep about despite being far. 'Go, before they reach the inner sanctum. We cannot risk for you to be caged again.' 'Thank you, brother.' With that Rahaka exchanged a final glance and pushed Argus through. Suddenly, as it closed behind them, the illusion began again, as everything around started to melt as if this was a world made out of candles. Bloody candles, the oozes that remained of them somehow managed to keep a certain sentience and head towards him. This was to be my end, he thought. Just as they would reach to break the illusion. Those things that weren't even on their own anymore had managed to cut both of his servants down as if they were nothing to them. A purple blood came from that sponge despite appearing to be nothing more than a melting mass. And it was obvious that he'd get to share their fate despite his best efforts. Henceforth he stood tall and grabbed a spade, muttering his final words. 'I will cut you down before my flame runs out.' The well just laid there unguarded. No statue or anything that would swoop over it. Standing at the edge of the well, Argus thought just through how much danger he'd been so far, only to end. 'Once we go through Argus, there isn't going to be a way out. No matter what you may have heard before, this is the point of no return.' Rahaka made it more than clear, exactly what were the stakes in everything. 'My failures to get there have deemed too unworthy to go there alone, henceforth, this is the reason you've arrived.' 'Were there others like you that tried?' Rahaka nodded at this. Both of them were aware of others who have tried it and failed. 'Rahaka, what are we going to do once we're there? I have thought of it for so long and I haven't.' Again, there came something at the edge of his eye. The passage was dark, rotten on the edges. A grimace was lying about it, which managed to send Argus into despair. Somehow it appeared that a patch of skin battered crept at the corners of the room. As slow moving as a snail, it was enough, nonetheless to bring him some fright of the unknown. Focus Argus, this is it, no way out and there are no more excuses anymore. Focus, you need to focus as best as you can. His thoughts got stopped as the enclosure began being battered from the other side. Violently pounded, it was obvious what was going to happen. 'My brother is dead.' 'Rahaka, there's still time for us to go, don't do anything rash, you cannot resist against whoever is on the other side.' 'Leave Argus, this is your mission now, bear it alone to the end. I'll do my best as my brother had done.' Without even waiting for a response or protest, he lifted Argus with his hand and pushed him down the well, falling into the water. Suddenly, the force of the vortex into that tight place pulled him with a lot of force to the bottom. Darkness fell as he could clearly hear the shouts of rage and blood coming from above. This was to be a deadly fight that would have no winners. Once passed through the vortex, it came as quick as for a glance, he was pushed into a tight crawling space. Everything was lit with a grey light and suddenly the water was drained from all around his body. There was an array of metal, roots and other overgrown materials that came out of the ceiling. One could throw a glance and judge that this was the bottom of the entire world. A certain eeriness crept about the place nonetheless. Everything which laid above floated just above this place. The sound was muffled at least from the looks of it. It came as an avalanche of debris of stones. It appeared to Argus that the hole was sealed, for the time being, at least one way or another. Upon looking through the well, he could see where the vortex ended. There were other pieces that had been ripped apart from the looks of it. This place was too intricate. Outspread beyond reason and from the looks of it, there could possibly be hundreds of halls just laying around. It became apparent just how easily he could progress. Argus felt like no one could stop him anymore from this path of destruction. There were ladders just laying there with holes inside. This appeared to be more like the prototype for a shortcut for him to use. And it was certainly more than needed now. 'I need to find the right one.' Said, Argus, once he found himself standing just under a hole. Its edges were bitten and eaten, slightly rotten and made out of the root. Clearly, some small rodent has eaten them before it was even open. On its ground laid a latter than lead to apparently another world he could take into effect. Suddenly, raised from a cowering position, Argus started climbing the ladder once he jumped on the ground. It was going to be a long climb, yet he wanted to undergo it nonetheless. Something couldn't really bode with him where he stood. What made him paranoid was the fact that he couldn't see the entirety of his surroundings. There could always be one or two things hidden past his glances. As shallow as that sounded, he pushed on, going as far as to see the rounded gate. It was above, made out of roots and dirt. Easily, he pushed it away and opened himself to a cave underground. Apparently, this could be some creature's home, dug through dirt and roots. A mole would've been most efficient. The thought alone that a giant animal could be returning at one the point was enough to send him back down the ladder. There wasn't any way he could trust, at least so he said, until looking down he discovered that damned thing. A blood clansman was making his way up the ladder, using two limbs to push himself up on the ladder as well as the other to climb. The gurgling blood came fell through his nose and beak and once open, it was revealed just how many teeth it had. An array of throat cutters, as sharp as the blade, as long as such. No saying about what was about to happen, Argus came to terms and pushed about, closing the way behind. 'I need to block it fast.' He said, taking the nearest rock and chucking it over the lid. This wouldn't hold for last since the way was blocked by dirt. There was mud as well, water draining from above. With that in mind, he covered himself in the mud, as much as he wanted to be hidden, this was more about making some of his scents, at least if he could. Waiting now made him even more nervous than he previously was. He would be chased either way, whatever path he chose to go through, henceforth, there wasn't any other chance but for him to just run. Straight ahead for now, as it appeared to be the only way he could walk. A musk came from everywhere, beyond what he could smell and feel. Even now, the scent of something morbid crept around. Something wanted to make him turn back and accept his fate. It wasn't something which he wanted but something that felt right. He could feel it among the roots and how they went around, how they shaped the entirety of the road. One simple scrape with his nails revealed something of dripping water. The roots appeared to have been guiding the creature when its throat became dry. Nonetheless, it was clean enough and this was no illusion, especially since he felt and sucked on it until the root became dry. No other chance would come along, at least that's what Argus thought of it. He could see again through the darkest veils of the gloom. This gift of his became handy once again despite its side effects. That thing that happened with his eyes appeared to be permanent now without any condition whatsoever. Surely, no one could deny him any more of being blinded, be it night or day. He roamed the desolation without even looking behind, judging from the look of it, this was a lair of some kind. Liquids dripping from the top became with a sudden change solid. Without any doubt of some kind, there came another sudden cause of fear. That thing being organic acted a lot like a spiders net from the looks of it. Argus stopped for a moment and started jerking his leg, pushing it back and forth on the bottom of the floor. He could see that organic thing being jerked up to the point of becoming solid then liquid, up to the point of becoming something of an organ. It was a frightful thing to do now though there wasn't any other way. Soon the blood driven thing would come and slash him away. If Rahaka wasn't any trouble for him with the speed and strength, he would be nothing against it either. Another victim would be crushed under the might of the roaming beast. Argus now came to choose but this came even faster. A forceful recognition made him suddenly fall and crawl into a ball. It appeared that the mole creature had arrived and looked as if it was going to the point where all the noise was. A fur laid around the body but it was not a mole. It was a being that appeared to have twisted ends pushed, knots and plenty of open endings through which that substance came out. Eight legs at least laid on each side, a crooked tail and a forked head that was blunt at the skull. That's most of it since he couldn't see colours in the dark. Some of the body was muffled but appeared to be somewhat organic and resistant. Under the fur appeared to be an ingrown set of bones that once reached maturity pierced through. A second head, that of a beast which was not alive any longer. It had bites all over and an eye pierced, from the looks of it, the dominant head ate it alive. It was cruel, but even more so to let it live and rot away. Strange, Argus thought. The infection should've killed it, but instead, it managed only to dull its senses. Henceforth, it managed to let Argus alone. As he stood, he was crawled under a small hole that was dug inside a corner. Without a doubt, every tunnel was made by this creature. Its decay was obvious and made him aware. But this wasn't any time to wait, there were two foes now at hand. Once that would defile him and another that would strike at him blood. He'd get ripped apart and eaten either way. Unless there was another path to take. Without a doubt, there had to be a chance that the other creature was just as blind as him. Guided by blood, suddenly came a shout. A strike followed, and the beast became aroused. It became apparently clear that it had a hold of the smell of fresh blood. With that in mind, it wouldn't stop hunting until that thing was caught, apprehend and eaten away. The distraction was well received, though it meant just as well that the blood-drinker got inside. With the mechanism in mind, standing too much in a rigged place would get the beast to find him. It was more than prone to finding him now. A second chance wouldn't happen if he got caught by that dumb beast. 'If you hear me now, I'm closest as I've ever been to your cage. Help me if you can, hear my plea.' Said Argus in a lonely corner, in the dark. The desolation didn't do anything to calm his nerves. Neither did his mind help as it started conjuring images that were slightly supposed to be there. Walls appeared to be stretching, bending and be pushed into forms that brought his mind to what he almost forgot about. A reminder despite it not being needed. It made him rise and start his walk. He could hear it, being chased, despite being as far as it appeared to be. It wasn't him that which was chased now, but the blood drinker. Now, if that thing had his scent, there'd be no other way to escape. It had it, with a sudden leap to the other side of the lair, the place was revealed to be at the level of a kingdom. There wasn't any way he'd roam every kingdom he found, but the sight of him was caught. And this could rather take at least twice the time it took for him to go through the latter one he found. No, I've found the key to finding him, I needn't get lost now. Though Argus as he looked at the starving creature. A bittersweet chase came forth as the two beasts were attempting to clash. Sooner or later they would have to deal with one another as well, at least when the case was over. 'Let them do as they please.' He spoke. Argus laid just as the edge, it was the end of the cliff and the entry into the underground kingdom of this blind seething creature. There were pieces of buildings tied by that amorphous liquid. With everything connected he'd be heard, not to mention that in no way could he survive that fall, regardless of what he felt like. Without any proper training or equipment, there wasn't any way for Argus to go down there. Feigning nonetheless came into play. At once, Argus came down to faking a fall, making sure to grab the edges and hold still. The blood-driven swimmer was on land, without knowledge of trickery or anything else of that kind. It was this that he was at a disadvantage against him and his prior knowledge of how they tended to act. Arrogance pushed them the way to far as he saw it at once just trip over his hand and fall. That furiously mad mole-thing followed it through the entryway. They would play with one another, at least he hoped. Without looking back, he climbed at once and dared not look back until he set aside his fear and distraction. Now that he was standing safely, he saw just what the fall had done. It wasn't done with him, as it had caught a glance of what he thought of doing. Argus was exposed, once their chase was done in that twisted torture of nets and stone, he'd come after him. That at least if he survived. Doubt came over him, as he thought of it, how could he? Not even blood could've made him stand so far away from water. He'd be tired in no time without even realising it and just lay there as chow for the bloody mole. It felt bizarre, to be attracted by the place, knowing that a lot of it was organic in nature, connected in a way that was beyond most of the thing he knew. There was the danger at every corner and step, just as the solid liquefied just to become hard again. Sounds had reflections here, and he could see just as the tower from far way. Something was happening here, as it was taken down. It was a surprising sight to see action, once and again, especially since this wasn't something connected to him or anyone else. This was the land itself resolving to do. 'And I have freed just another beast upon you fair maiden.' There was at least a shiver left after his words. Something had dare made him look inside and wish to stay. 'Once I'm done, I will return to pay your debt, but until then, you won't find a way back.' In a way what he said was right, looking around, the entirety of wall was full of the same holes, despite the fact that down there only one way was punctured through. Despite this illusion and convenience, there was to be the only way out, which was this. Argus walked slowly and as far away from the middle of the road as possible. It was a hard straining thing to do, pushing himself past everything he knew and wanted. And this place brought curiosity, the way it made it feel like a giant experiment on how the creatures would be guided in the dark. There was a need for this to be documented and registered, written on notes. Feeling his once working pockets, there wasn't anything he could write with or on. But this was about to go down. It was dug out from the likes of it and the ladder was more than easily taken with care. At least, somehow it had the decency to leave it working without trying to destroy his only way down. This was about done too. Argus made sure than none laid at the grey bottom. He landed fine and looked around. Partially exposed to the light, he covered his eyes and waited for them to adjust. The grey light wasn't as strong as the one coming from the sun but it was just enough to stun him still. Knelt at the bottom, filled with mud, waiting just to go through. The small floating things were, coming from the grey approach, made him see them. Little ball, curling things which groped small pitches, almost to the likes of ants. It was disturbing in a way that he shook them off. I can't spend more time here, one of their openings must be the cage, but which one. 'Which one?' Argus almost shouted. With the assailants lost, he turned around and pulled the ladder. It was pushed so that there'd be a good fall in case one would open that lid and try going down in the dark. There wasn't enough space to pull it entirely but to break a leg especially since the hole through which he climbed was fairly away from the only light grey source. Now, this was truly done. Battered and cold, he resumed crawling and looking at the almost organic looking holder of all these crawling prisons. Going that way would be pointless since he had seen the kingdom and just how far its expansion would go. In his mind, there was a closer approach to the wall rather than to the kingdom itself. He knew where to go and what to look for, even though it was only but a slight thought. It may not be there, but the satisfaction was there nonetheless. Knowing how to defeat it at its own game was an advantage, especially since by now, the other threat source was lost. Whatever they've done before leaving just one go through seemed to have worked unless he was just a scout. Though even that was doubtful since the determination was more than what was needed and asked for. It was now that Argus saw the consequence of standing way too much there. He understood why it was dangerous to stay. All of the sudden he felt like his body suddenly became sunken under this alarmingly vast sea under him, as he was being absorbed. Afraid of what was going to happen, he grabbed to the nearest hole and started crawling as fast as he could go. A glance revealed that the ladder was already in the process of being swallowed. The little beings were taunting now in their illegible speech, at which he couldn't do anything but run for his time. At ankle deep, he could finally feel ground solidify around his legs. That was only but a slight advantage as he started running at his full strength. It bothered the sea as a colour was changed, making bubbles in his wake, and leaving a trail of yellow and brown. Something in his skin affected it and as it started rejecting Argus, it was just then that he finally approached the hole. It wasn't like the others. Way too clean, made of polished stone, pure as an enclave. The stairs were forked and went around as if lifted towards a tower, though the form leads towards an inward position rather than being alone. Argus grabbed an end, knowing that this was to be just another distraction and trickery, by the likes of which, would push his life forever. 'I am lost.' He yelled, but the echo died. With the help of his muscles, he pulled himself easily and saw just how sluggish that thing was. It raised his legs still tied and waited for him to lay his legs and wait for it to fall. Seconds passed until finally, that substance let go. For a moment there, it almost appeared to be alive and tried to pull him inside and break him into pieces. Thus, he went and came forth, walking through the stairs, in this semi archaic ruined castle. Calling it a ruin was somewhat of a compliment, especially since it appeared to be made by creatures that were armoured. One guard walked around and greeted him. 'Greetings Curator.' 'Hello.' There was a bow that which was followed and looking outside, he saw just how far this joke of medieval metal came to it. Even its citizen was armoured to the point of manufacturing them ever for the damn animals. As per usual, they went at the end, looked below for a disruption and resumed their guard. This was one of the two that stood and the other end, near the door. Outside, as it appeared, even the sky was made out of metal, emanating light through the various gaps which revealed that there was an enormous heat source above of them. His appearance was disturbing past the helmet. Argus approached to try looking through the closed armet. First, there was a dark void but past it was an image of utmost horror. A fragment of what used to be human, horribly disfigured to a point where it was melted and bonded to the metal in order to create a soldier of some kind. The result was somewhat of a loss in muscle from the likes of it, as the facial ones seemed to have been entirely crushed. Not to mention that the bones didn't resist the process. 'What is this place? Who are you two?' His fellow guard returns to standing and stares solemnly at Argus in curious bafflement. No answer came whatsoever as they both started and waiting for something else. Without a glance and without asking, Argus went forth and opened the door. Again, none of them made no action to stop or to question him. He was left to do whatever he pleased and desired. Many rows of forked portholes laid around, letting the artificial light come and go. On the other side of this enclosure, it was revealed that the entirety of this place was close in a tightly shut box, though calling it as such was fairly incorrect. There was something else to it, as the edges were slightly dented and caught at an impasse. A place like this, where the water was being brought to holes that were suspended as tall as one could look into towers of metal and steel. Forgeries laid everywhere around and further away, you could see them make new reinforcements to their gear. This was just another place that would die in a few decades. From the looks of it, further away, their water was sealed, and this composition of metal seemed to take a toll on their bodies. Have I not seen just how hard it was for them to walk from one corner to another? This was a sick game and nothing game. A sick game of torture upon being that didn't deserve such treatment and shouldn't have continued. From the looks of it, this light of there would soon become their fiery extinction. A grave which was to leave no mark and be forgotten. He returned through where he came, but not before playing a sick joke himself. Seeing how they were encumbered and slow, he turned, as he pretended to leave. It was a sudden mercy, but he pulled the helmet among what remained of the skin, leaving but somewhat of a working skull. He screamed, leaving the place for the first humane thing he heard in a long time. But then followed the fall in agony as the pain became too much to take by himself. The other noticed and his first desire became to retaliate. Again, after seeing what had happened to his companion, he dropped what he had in his hand just as Argus grabbed his helmet too. It was more than a struggle, at least, as he had seen one, followed by a set of dark unrecognisable mumbles, which was soon forgotten. Neither Argus nor the guard wanted to give in their fight for survival. This scene of desperation and pity made it hard for anyone else to watch. Argus came to the point where he finally kicked his knee off, making sure that the armour peeled off as it fell. It caused him to be dire but let go and that's when finally the helmet wore off too, making another one fall to the ground in agony. He backed away immediately after seeing how they were both starting to have their armour parts fall off on their own bodies. What was revealed to him now remained a frail shrivelled body that couldn't survive outside the armour. Long before this execution came, their doom had been foretold. 'Abominations, all of you, I can't believe there are creatures like you just roaming around and living. How come you are allowed to do whatever you want but not I? Huh?' No sense could come out of their dark speech. Clearly, the pain had driven them mad. It was almost like a prayer to some sunken god of some sort, though it was clear that there wasn't anything left for these things that used to be human. Eyes went pale and they became blind, they hadn't any nails and by the looks of the bloody skin left on the armour, that ones which were ripped from their bodies, this was the end for them. Enough of them was already seen to judge that it wasn't a place where he wanted to go or stay. At least, as he desires to be as far away as possible, lumping as much with a leap to feel the hardness and crawl. Too many of them to choose from, thought Argus after throwing yet another look. They seemed like rabbit holes but appeared to be portals to other worlds. No determination whatsoever pushed or dragged him to something else other than this. But this was too much and unclear, it wasn't a path to follow but a maze and a gamble combined. What got him in another hole, pushed him now on another road, climbing on a damn tree to get where he wanted and needed to be. Standing there wasn't viable, neither was crawling through that damnable place. The answer couldn't be going down either, as he threw a glance and notice that for a moment then, his fingers almost became all tied together in a form of a paddle. It made Argus shiver as he climbed. Again, this appeared to be a tree which was felled and thrown into a hole. Upon climbing to its base, he noticed the day light and what appeared to be the normal world. As much as he wanted to believe it was true, this was green everywhere around, other than the dust filled fields on the side. Nothing that was remotely distinguishable remained, at least in the sense that he'd recognise it so he could figure out where he was. Bland field, walking carriages from far away, there wasn't much of any city in the distance either. This appeared more like a distant lost place from someone's memory rather than anything of remote usefulness. 'Hey, over here.' Came to Argus with a shout, waving at the carriage. It was fairly distant and the rider was going in the opposite direction. Still, it was way too further away for him to notice. The sun was bright, at least that he remembered, and for a moment he tried to enjoy it. Even, Argus walked as close to the road as he could stay, without caring whenever or not he would be seen or slack. As a matter of fact. This act of his came to be interrupted. What he heard then was someone shouting. 'Look out.' Turned around, Argus managed to see the cars walking at a fast rate, though they were recognisable. Agents, many of them, perhaps the same ones who drove through him that time. What they drove now appeared to be wearing an additional layer of plating and their wheels seemed to be pulsating and pushing the ground. His feet froze yet again. 'Let me go, I can't get through this time.' Argus thought, as this didn't appear to be his memory either and the machines appear to be real. No other way for him to push of bend came either. As it was, this appeared to be his retribution and the death which was promised. He closed his eyes and felt the wind just as they came. At last, he felt release, but death didn't come yet. It wasn't the time as he opened them to see the cars go through him. Bent down, now that he could look, he shivered in the lingering cold. 'Damn you.' Said, Argus, as his fists hit the ground. There was something remotely close to tears which he felt like, crawling inside his fists once they fell. He could see the house standing there, a ruin on his right side. Yet another lost hiding place which was burnt to the ground. Without a doubt, he. 'You are responsible for it!' Yelled Argus, while still looking at the ground. There seemed to be something about it, further and further down. No voice responded, but this memory came at too much of a right place. It reminded him of the place where he was marked and what he had to do once he pulled himself up. It should've gone like that where he lifted himself and carried one, though he refused to move. Something in his mind pushed him beyond sanity and reason, forcing him to stay. He'd look and see the machines go over and over through him, in rows that didn't end. Why is this happening? This abomination is nothing like my home. 'Do you hear me, this is not my world?' His shouting fell dead to the remarks of the agents in their vehicles. Without a doubt, he could've been stranded there and pitied the various amounts of taunt and banter. Finally, he was forced to raise himself. Exactly what he wanted, to feel that force that pushed him beyond reason and self-control to what he was doing right now. It had to be the same one as before. Despite the fact that the voice was silent now for some reason, it had to be it. But alas, there was another of likes he knew would follow. In the darkest points of the horizon, past the illusion of time and the machines, there laid a dark line. Riders of skin further into the distance, spreading through the ground, crushing in their wake. Soon, they'd devour this entire place and wreak havoc upon the others. It appeared as if they were following Argus despite the fact that he'd done a great job in covering his tracks. No one and nothing could've gone through, especially that thing which had appeared in front of him. I need to fall again. Argus had thought of it after wiping the sweat off his face. Something about this occurrence made him want to push forward now despite everything which had happened. The hole was there, still hidden in the leaves, jumping through he fell upon the harsh ground and felt how his skin would soon begin to crawl away from him. Being forced to kneel now felt uncomfortable, knowing just how limited he was. What was even worse than that was the fact that the distances between the other holes were getting wider and wider. Soon he'd take minutes to get to another point, even to the point of them becoming hours. If that'd be, either he would push through the walls or whatever wall separated them, or he would be pulled below and suffocate. And this place made him feel too uncomfortable to be a final resting place. Being forced to see your body taken apart was beyond cruel. This silence has to end. Something about it made him fill the ends in his mind. 'Will you let me go? As you promised me, you need to let me go and be done with it. This was the plan altogether and now you refused to speak about your part of the deal. Can you at least confirm anything at all?' The lack of anything anymore, hunger and thirst became repugnantly late. Nothing of him made him think of himself as a human anymore despite his appearance. He remembered but stopped once he saw just another entry. Alas, his thoughts in this place below appeared to him as wasted tools while the enemy brooded. Soon, he'd have to choose and this choice appeared more like a selfish one. Where could I live inside of if I chose to give up? This would soon be answered without a second thought of notion. For far too long had he thought of it and now, there came the deal breaker. It was the entry to a station underground. First, it was steep and dark and there laid the smell of piss. Immediately after, as he went inside and climbed, as blind as a bat, pushing on a bar, then climbing what seemed to be a moving platform of some sort, he stopped. A door laid, at least on that was hard to push. It was eerie to go through, especially with that scent, though he appeared to have been walking forever, then in a loop. But his progress came with no delay, as the final door opened. Revealed to him was a steep passage that was tightly fit and made just enough space for a person to squeeze through. Argus was displeased by the effort this place had tied, but he'd done it nonetheless. Out of a crack in the hole, a man-made as it was presumed came a man. A bunch of peculiar looks immediately were thrown throughout the passage. Everyone was waiting for the machine to come from the dark tunnel but what they weren't expecting was for that man to come outside. It was a strange thing for him as well, seeing a reaction from someone else. Seeing how they waited he stood against the wall and waited as well. It appeared that some time would come to pass until another came. Rather than anything else, the first woman he had seen in a while approached him. She wore a brown leather vest and had a pair of blue eyes accompanied by a face in the form of a pear. Something made him focus on those features, pushing away the simple body or the bland red hair she had. 'What are you?' It appeared to have come out of her mouth, unsure herself if she had asked anything else at all. Out of the rest, who had slightly pushed themselves further from the strange man, she seemed to have some sort of attraction to the bizarre. 'You'll have to speak faster for me to hear you.' A visible air gulp came to be, as he had noticed. She was doing her best to come up with something, despite being perplexed by what happened. 'Who are you?' 'They used to call me Argus. Does that name please you?' With somewhat of a fierce demeanour he approached. There was something that changed in the way he looked and acted against others, something that he himself couldn't explain. It wasn't in his speech but in his instincts and what they told about certain people who laid around him. Fright was common and he could smell it all around her. He had to be around too many other who feared him that it made it just as hard to forget. At least, this wasn't as common for him to feel or to look at them. Normal, as much as he could push it towards normality. 'You shouldn't be afraid of me, I wouldn't hurt you with so many witnesses laying around.' Argus had a grin which was saved for a while now. At least from what he could tell, she became wildly amused. Perhaps this place would turn out to be something else, at least if he was entertained by it, his goal could be delayed. This place felt like home. The decay and architecture and the presence of machines, the artificial light perhaps. Or even the fear that which they displayed when they threw glances at the man from the wall. 'I'm not afraid of you.' She said with a raspy voice. 'What's your name then?' There was something of a reluctance to tell and clearly, she had done her best to talk to him now. But something of a cold presence made him feel that she wanted to do nothing with him now. 'It's about to come you know?' As she said it, her voice almost cracked. Everything else which came out of her mouth appeared to have come at a higher pitch. It was clear that she was nervous, though this level was quite ridiculous. He hadn't the haggard appearance nor did he anything to make her feel otherwise. So be it then. As he had thought it was time to wait, it finally lit the end of the tunnel. It came as a machine that had a cabin at the end, a grand example of a twisted machine, which seemed to have more like a helmet at one end than anything else. Bulked at the body and as it finally stopped, it appeared that it was close to being full. The doors barely opened and just as he had entered, he soon found himself lost in the crowd. Everyone was busy with apparently not one human being thrown much of a glance or care towards anyone who wasn't on their eye sight. And since no one had seen him come, he was just safely grabbing on a pole above. It was the decay around the base which was a dead giveaway of what was happening. Something organic was hiding under the metal shell. The vibration could be felt for him alone, just as much as it was afraid to be touched by him. Through the journey which seemed to last, at least as they shifted she came near. 'We've not done talking.' Came a voice from under his shoulder. She had come from a blind spot, at least as he couldn't turn around from the awkward position he was set upon. 'I thought you didn't want to talk with me. What's the sudden change?' 'I didn't mean to disrespect you sir, but you seemed to be new. Well, we also don't get a lot of visitors coming out of, you know what.' 'I'm fairly aware of that. I'm just passing by then leaving just as I came, understood?' 'No trouble, no fight started, nothing of the sort.' 'Then you may have a problem with that since you've jumped on the wrong engine.' Said a bulky voice. For a moment he looked but found it immediately. 'Why is that?' 'We're heading towards a riot, neither the next few stations nor the streets are safe for any of us to walk.' 'Then how come it's full?' 'Because none of them seems to care about it.' 'And what's yours then?' Argus seemed to have been measuring him for a while. He was tall enough, fairly dark skinned and cut across his lip. From the obvious standpoint, it was the small cut of a knife, but the blunt at a point appeared to have been made by a hammer. 'Is it really that rough out there?' 'People rarely escape that easily, few bruises, a broken leg or anything of the sort.' 'Why did it happen then? You know, the riot?' It appeared that some actually tried turning to see if Argus was making a damned joke. Nothing of the sort could be guessed from his face. Nonetheless, he couldn't be from anywhere, as they world was connected. 'In case you forgot about it.' 'He came from a hole in the wall.' As she said it, at least as a paired reaction, she was the one who seemed like she was mad. Standing and raving in the engine, looking nervous as she remained from the encounter. The silence didn't help her case either. 'So?' Came Argus again. Apparently, his hair was laid down and wet, it was something out of the weather. 'Because of the assassination of the governor. I don't from what wall you've crawled from, but this was hard to miss on its own. It was head news at the time.' 'Tell me about it, the whole thing was a mess, a bloody rag which almost culminated in a river. Once he fell, the entire electric system seemed to have vanished away. Judging by his clothes, he was an engineer. Standing on one of the benches which were attached and eating what would appear to be his dinner from the lunch box. 'But I saw some lights.' 'Indeed you saw and you can still see them above. Other sources of energy, small generators they say. They used to draw their power from the main one but now that it's gone, it's just a matter of time until the rest of them die.' 'How far ago had this happened then?' 'It's hard to say really.' This appeared to be a ticking bomb, a pandemonium to be certainly trapped in-between so many other people. 'Is this engine going to return once it's done?' 'It may or may not, it's hard to say, depending on the conductor and what orders he's about to receive.' 'But if the Governor is dead, who it is that's about to give him orders?' These people blindly following nothing but the riots and their lives appeared to him clueless. Perhaps even more than the other way around. None of them appeared to understand exactly what they were getting into. 'Why is everyone acting so calm then?' 'We're about to enter a devastated area of some sort.' 'That's enough, no need to raise your voice in here, just stand and calm yourself. Don't attract any attention now.' 'Or else what?' Asked Argus, without having looked outside. Despite his rashness, there was something out there which appeared to be watching. Could these be just the bold ones from the bunch? 'What's your name.' 'Barnabee.' Said the man with his curly hair, and cut through the lip. His battered side appeared to be showing itself more than anything else, up to the point of having to explain to the clueless man. 'They're out there, watching us, recording what they say.' 'If this was any other man, he'd be called insane. But as it was, there couldn't have been more faith in him than anything of the sort coming from Argus. As he pushed himself to adjust to the darkness outside, first there came a slight pain and headache. Trying to look through darkness was already hard, but doing it while standing in a place which was lit made it twice as harder than it should've been. At least some monitors were present, blurred by the fast motion of the tram, but they were there nonetheless. Then there was another observation, a creeping thing that appeared to crawl and lurk from vision, somewhat of an amphibian creature that appeared to be coming from a place without water. It was then that he saw one monitor lit past the place they were going. Beyond all tubes and long pipes which hid it, an image of them going by came to be. Past that one, every single other one appeared to have been busted for a long time. 'I'll be fine.' The speed of the team made it utmost certain that they couldn't have been either recorded or taped. 'Be careful what you say now. What was your name again?' 'I'm Argus, I haven't given it to you Barnabee.' 'I'm Genie.' Said the young woman who appeared to have been waiting her chance to speak of something. As far as it went, Genie was impressed by the speed Argus seemed to have caught on. 'It's going to be dangerous after all, so don't mind me if I stand close to you.' Some comfort came as she latched on Argus. At least she seemed to be calmer than before. Perhaps it was the way they looked at him now which made him more than he was. 'Here it comes, hold it tight.' Said the engineer. Abruptly, it stopped, to the point where the wheels seemed to have become little legs which all just grabbed the metal bars around them and held the entirety of the body to a stop. Some left, and others came. As surprisingly as it had become, there weren't many people who came inside now. At least there was breathable space and enough to move around. 'It shouldn't stay for long now.' Said another voice from around. It was hard to note but it became apparent to Argus that the man who said it become lost. If it were one at all, not to say anything other. Every second and every minute, something appeared to make him uncomfortable. At least as it continued standing. Soon, that feeling went away, as the light dimmed and lost some of what it had, the engine started again and this concoction went on its motion.'See?It wasn't as hard as it appeared to be.First time out of your sector I presume?'Something of Barnabee didn't appear to be buying the entire idea of crawling outside of the wall.Good, at least he'd be someone I could trust.The way to the cabin where the pilot laid appeared to be clear.'Say Barnabee, how long is this going to take now?'Funny that you mention, it may be the longest one so far.Why are you asking me that?'There was a clear view of his eyes and something of a forced condition laid him unaware.First thought of taking the tram for himself appeared to be quite peculiar in nature at first.But the more he stared in his eyes, the more Barnabee understood the need to do such a thing.A silent understanding at most.'It's dangerous to go alone and roam, people have died from less than that.'Said an older man sitting down on a chair.'You're all talking about the danger but not the action. Let's see just how far the latter one will take me.'With that, and a group of curious followers, including the ones who spoke to him, he marched towards it.'It's going to be dangerous if you even manage to open the locked door.'Somehow the light came even lower to the point of being grim dark.'This isn't good, listen Barnabee.And you Genie, if this light goes down, we won't have anything else to do but dangerously wander in the unknown.Do you think you could survive roaming legions of blind humans that crawl under the ground?'They were just as afraid as he had become, perhaps that was the reason so many of them decided to follow him.Most, if not all of them needed to get some answers from the conductor.The far end appeared to be coming aside one way or another.No one was even slightly disturbed by the fact that Argus had risen a small crowd.To this pointed, he felt how lonely he was in that crowd, despite having them follow him as a person of great importance.After all, in reality, none of them had anything to do with him or what he desired whatsoever.'Open the door at once.'He yelled after starting a few knocks on the door.His knuckles appeared to be hurting from it.This door was certainly reinforced by a few layers.Someone expected this to happen unless it appeared to be happening often.'Usually, when things like these happened, you'd use to hear some message of some sort from the conductor.'With that in mind, he looked around and saw the holes in that small device.It appeared that they were relying on another system of pipes to be able to talk.Others have used them to lead the pressure from one point to another.As a matter of fact, nothing appeared to be passed that point where there could be truly said that they were a victim of an industrial revolution of their own.'Open it up already, unless you want us to break the door open.'No message and no response to the threat.Argus attempted to push through the door nonetheless.'Take this, it should make it easier to bash it open.'Half a wrench, it appeared to be in the toolbox of the engineer.He had made his way through the crowd only for that, yet refused to do anything else.'Careful now Argus, don't hurt him no matter what.He's just a man like the rest of us.'I know Barnabee, I won't stoop so low.'With that attitude, he went ahead and started smashing at the point where the lock was, trying to trigger a reaction of a sort.It was already dark and so many people just standing around, focusing on him made Argus slightly nervous.For once, he was in the middle of attention, all alone, before a bash.A spark came from the hit and it appeared like it made a clicking sound before being opened.It was a let down to open the cockpit and see that there wasn't any pilot inside.That wasn't an excuse for it to be in shambles, as it appeared to have a few pair of long extrusion wrapped around the lever and the button.Damn devices, I'll get no break from it.Argus appeared to be getting closer and push those things away.They were awfully pale and organic and appeared to pull back once they got a feel of Argus' touch.'This place is a mess.'Tell me about it.'Behind him, in the cabin, it appeared like the girl, the man and the engineer came first near him.It was already full and as a matter of fact, these three appeared to be the only ones who trusted Argus. At least enough to bash through and catch the train. The motion appeared way too fast inside the cabin as well. Now, with a full sight of what was happening, there seemed to be going as much as anywhere. 'Does any of you know how to drive this thing?' Asked Argus. Something about this made him uncomfortable at best. The man was already preparing his tools. As a matter of fact, so did Barnabee, taking out a pair of extruded tools that appeared to have been carried with him for a while. A setup, most likely, something about them made it feel like they knew each other. Perhaps a group of some sort. Regardless of who they were, there had to be another way out now. 'What are you planning to do then?' 'Close the door.' Barnabee already shifted and knocked it close. From the reaction, the girl had no idea what was going in as she became slightly afraid of what was about to happen. As much as he thought, she was in just as much trouble as he was. 'You planned this all along, didn't you?' 'Perhaps we were just waiting for a good opportunity to break through. Don't worry about it, they won't hear us through. As well as you cooperate, there will be no trouble from our side. It's a dangerous world you see and our lights will be cut out one day.' 'So you decide to steal this train and ride it to a better place right?' 'Right on.' Answer Barnabee, as he appeared to be aware of something the other one wasn't. 'You see, I've come upon the plans of this entire structure and you won't. Actually.' This is when he turned to the girl. 'You may believe this. Whatever it may be, this place seems to be huge, enormous really, as a matter of fact, from the plans I've come upon, this place is colossal.' 'The plans I assume you don't have anymore?' 'I had to get rid of them as fast as possible. You wouldn't understand but dangerous people wanted me gone once I got my hands on them. Whenever you believe me or not, know that this entire place is connected two ways. "By a liquid between gaps and by this, I presume?" 'How did you know?' 'The map had something around which kept every side, every compartment tied together. And inside of that, there were drawings of small ships which were used to travel between.' 'That's how I came here as a matter of fact, what drove me to crawl through the wall and reach this point.' 'So you believe him too?' Asked the engineer. 'I'm Robert by the way.' Argus nodded at this with utmost certainty. They were both already busy working on the panel, removing parts of it and stretching wires. 'Go on ahead then and do whatever you please. I'm fairly certain that neither Genie is protesting against your plan as long as no one else has to suffer.' 'And no one will Agus as long as they stay. Now, what would happen if I were to pull this?' It was a small vein-like orifice which had a small box inserted in it. That seemed a little much, especially since it was hidden away under the panel. Aside from that, the man appeared to know what he was doing. A good squeeze around made it stop immediately, leaving the entirety of the passenger confused as there wasn't any station in sight. 'Was this supposed to happen?' 'I don't know, I only saw so much of this plan. What I've noticed about it specifically were the wings. Other than that I couldn't tell you if I wanted to about how to make it spread them and push them outside.' 'It can fly?' Suddenly, it threw a different light upon this concoction. Such an ability all of the sudden made this much easier to roam through, especially if it were true that this was connected to everything. Hallow dark spaces that could be roamed in by this machine, the sound of which brought much delight to his ears. 'Do you think it's true? Could you fly us away then?' 'There need to be something that would trigger this reaction. How else would it spread those wings? There should be just enough space outside for it to do so. But that's not the problem. We're not sure yet on what type of fuel it uses.' 'And we don't know if it may fly for a few minutes in the air before falling, right?' 'It would've been easier.' The man responded. 'If we had the ability to see but even if I were to divert the light from each compartment, that still wouldn't last enough.' 'They were both doing their best to push through the panel and the various layered cache it had.'Genie are you all right?'She nodded, still standing in the corner.Argus raised momentarily from his chair and turned around to see to her.'Are you feeling okay?You don't have to lie to me.'It wasn't clear, but she appeared to be young, a twenty-something which bit more than she could chew.What she couldn't hide was the fact that she was afraid.The tears in her eyes were almost too prominent to be ignored.At once she made a sign for him to come closer.Complying wasn't the worst part of the situation, as he came immediately into position.'I'm afraid we may not come home now.I was on my way here when this happened and from what they said, I can't get there if it starts flying from here.'Somehow, he thought that the other two had heard what she said but remained unphased.Both of which still had their own plans that needed to be pushed towards completion.'We may be able to drop everyone right?Before this thing flies?Or at least find a way to drop them near once you make it flap its wings?It doesn't sound like a good plan to go ahead with these many people."It could be dangerous if they find a way to break in, he may be right.'Agreed Barnabee.There was something off with this after all.Despite wanting to escape and the other to go on with their lives, these two, now the three of them appeared to have stumbled on something beyond them.Again, something crept in his mind as well.'I've got a bad feeling about this, I can't explain what it is."Don't worry, I found it.'There appeared to be a pump which was started automatically now, pushed on and again, pushed through until it started.Something organic was inside of it, but then again, what wasn't that they enslaved and used?A musical note number came immediately.It followed a dull set of notes.'Oh, I've heard of this before.It's one of the devices that are activated by sequences of music, like instruments."You know how to work it?'Despite being an engineer, this appeared like it was beyond his field of certainty.There was something of a silent thunder to this that accompanied the various notes.Something entertained Genie at least, who was genuinely lit by the sound of the music.She appeared to be flocking like a bird, watching how each piece turned under.'Pull its guts by the side.'They started but it was heavy, lifting all its various tubes, vires and small formed concoction from its box.'Help us.'And Argus came.Even with the three of them, those things were too heavy for humans to do.With care and harshness, they managed to pull them through and leave them at the bottom, pushing the chair back.Genie made sure to put it back against the door, just in case a most desperate one tried to bash the door open.This was to be the final lock on the door.Meanwhile, as they gazed upon it, this device was utmost certainly complicated.The view of it was slightly disturbed by the longing tubes which were pushed so far.As they were pushed on the side to side, it was revealed just how intricate this was.Tens, if not hundreds of small cleverly place towers which could be fairly easily pushed.'Let me try.'With his fair hand, he pushed against one and heard it made a long clicking sound.The entirety of this engine started shaking in a violent, if not flaccid manner before stopping.'I'm afraid of the fact that it might.No, I'm afraid that we are already in the air.'Said, Argus, as he gazed through the darkness, where used to track now there laid nothing of the sort.There appeared to be flaps of the sorts but soon were revealed not to be wings at all.'Let me try something, hold my legs.'As he said it, he became ready to do something rash and unexpected of him.He was quickly locked by his legs by both of them now.With both of his legs secured he could sit without any risk of falling through.Pushed through, he was as close to the point where there was an entry and he was right.There wasn't any protective window of any sort, as it turned out to be nothing.A blank spot which was left there and one could fall through.Looking through it, he realised that.'The conductor might've fallen of jumped through if I'm correct about it.'Both Barnabee and the engineer looked at one another. It was clear now, that there might've been a man once there who used to run this. 'And how exactly does this help us?' 'Turn me around, or at least, let me look at me.' As this turned out to be even more uncomfortable, he was caught by the legs, using his arms to push his body and he stood above the gap. Some might've thought that this was certainly a bad idea, at least from the likes of it. 'Damn this, these aren't wings.' 'But you said we were flying! And I saw the plans there.' 'No.' Responded Argus with a tone which demanded him to listen. There was apparently a sight of flapping, but that was something which didn't belong there. 'Those aren't wings that fly from the looks of it. It's hard to describe, but they couldn't carry that weight alone if you understand what I'm saying. From what I can understand, they've stretched layers that reached the ceiling and attached to it.' As it happened, they were tied and standing still, apparently, blocked by this. In a way, this appeared to be bizarrely entertaining to watch and figure out. 'Pull me back at once.' They pulled him back with just as much care as they had used when pushing him through. Now he was standing once again. 'It appears that this thing just sticks itself and flings as far as it can apparently go.' 'Does that mean that our plan is doomed now? How could this have been for nothing?' As sad as they appeared, at least Genie felt some relief then, knowing that she would return home despite her failure. As it passed, at least she had done a great job hiding it from the others. 'Nonetheless, it could work if we understand how this device works. We might as well try if it cannot fly, we could at least crawl through the vents until we reached our destination.' 'Lead the way then, if you can understand how this sound system works.' Something crept into his mind as well as the thought of his escape went by. If this worked, they could just reverse it and fling from ceiling to ceiling, in the perfect system. 'Let's see them. You may want to announce that there might be some difficulties coming for the rest of the passengers. I'm afraid that we might face something which might be disturbing if I fail the sequence.' 'We can fall, can't we?' Asked Genie. Even now, she stood there alone in her corner, as much as it could be called so in that tight space of theirs. 'I forget about her. Listen, Genie, was it? How about you tell them the message?' 'I'm certain that, if they hear from a woman, they may be calmer than hearing if from any of us.' This decision wasn't Barnabee's to make, despite the fact that the other man didn't want to interfere. And already there had been enough of it passed in silence and waiting that they could've become paranoid or even seriously violent. It was always the pain of a chance to be caught in it and they were no exception to the rule. 'Don't force her if she doesn't want to.' But as he implied it, she stopped Argus from saying anything. 'I'll do it then. I can prove to you that I'm using, right? This could be the time that I could prove that I deserve to be here with you.' After saying what had to be said, Genie pulled the small receptor and prepared. She felt a cold wind just being pushed from the far end of it. As a matter of fact, everyone in the small cockpit felt it, rather than facing it from the gap. 'Damn pipes, thought Argus, too many of them everywhere. Someone had to invent something better one of these days, and living in a cage wasn't an excuse for it.' 'Dear passengers.' She reluctantly stopped after hearing herself, slightly muffled even in the cabin. 'Esteemed passengers, we. I'm regretful to announce that our ride has been delayed for now. But before you decide to do anything of the sort which you may regret later, let me come on and assure you that we are in the best hands that could be. I can't tell you that you know him, or I or anyone who's here riding thing but what I can do is ask you to bear with us. At least until.' She paused and covered the speaker, waiting for something. 'What are you waiting for? I need silence to work with this.' 'How much will this last?' Genie asked Argus with utmost sincerity. From the looks of it, she could've waited and halted the announcement as long as she wanted to do so. 'Tell them that I'm doing my best and we'll return in a short notice. Actually, tell them to resume their seats and spread throughout it as fast as possible.' She complied so far with the orders, as well as she had hoped they'd follow his advice. This was to be a tight shift, of some sort, though he couldn't complain about the fact. Beyond the point, they listened and obeyed, from the likes of which they were unable to hear the noise anymore from the other side. 'I think it worked.' Said Genie before thanking them as a last goodbye to the people on the other side. It appeared that now, with the silence, it was the time. 'We're counting on you now Argus. If there's an outside world, take us out.' Barnabee had put all his trust in me from this point on. It appeared like they all did the same, in a certain way. As it appeared to be, this was going to be rough. 'Grab anything you can grab a hold on and hold it tight. I don't know how the movement will work so don't make me responsible for knocking any of you out.' 'The belt.' 'Right.' There appeared to be a belt just laying by the seat, which wrapped neatly around Argus. As a matter of fact, this chair in which he stood went nowhere since it couldn't be pulled outside its standing place. Neatly placed, he was assured. Barnabee held onto a bar, the engineer was standing in the corner, tightly holding the end of the table and with the other hand, he gained balance against the door. Genie was holding on the thicker and more pushed in pipes. They all appeared to be safe for now. 'Here it goes then.' His eyes lit. Argus looked upon the various notes and started remembering what the last tune appeared as being. Since they appeared to work on themselves, more or less, he neatly pressed a note and waited. It was something sharp which triggered the long-lost song. Such a song was undesirable, it was a coagulation of many high notes, followed by a sudden drop. Now, what could it be, help me damn it, don't we need to figure this out? The way it was laid out, it appeared that the main buttons from the middle were high-pitched, as well as the ones that got further away appeared to be harsher in tone. How come this argument could be our death? Just follow the tune Argus, this is how it must work. As he began, he pressed the three adjacent ones in the middle, making a high pitched sound. Nothing happened. It was followed immediately by a few other notes from below, going as far until he heard a drop which he had slightly remembered as the finisher of the tune. Again, nothing so far that would prove that it worked in any way whatsoever. 'It's not going that well, is it?' 'Give me a moment.' This panel seemed to be disturbingly tattered in its appearance, not to mention that the notes were nothing like what he had heard. Too many of them laid for a combination. 'Let me.' But as he was about to inform them, he went again, instinctively below. The notes triggered a dark tune as the engine let go. It fell back on the tracks, luckily still caught on the ceiling above, to the point of cushioning the blow. 'Damn it, Argus, what's happening?' So much of it was felt around, throughout everything, that there wasn't any doubt that the others felt it as well. 'I'm doing my best.' He failed to realise how many of the sound triggering devices he had pressed with his fists. It appeared that the machine responded, tuned to the point. A set which contained complicated low frequency and high-frequency notes came. It was a song which now included the sound of drums, beating to the point of almost replacing some of the notes. Yet from the looks of it, there were only these notes to accompany it. For once, they stopped, then so did the tunes. 'What now Argus? You realise that we can fall below if you don't know what you're doing. Unless you decide to let me look through it.' 'No, you will wait for me to be done and you'll stay there until I say otherwise. We can't risk all of our deaths by removing all the pieces from this board.' This made him feel as lonely as he felt before, thrust against everyone. 'Here it goes.' With his knuckles unbuckled, he went ahead and started pressing the combination he thought of unaided. This appeared to have been made once his arms started extending and pushing away. The result came as a sort of crawling motion. It started going on a slope, as far as it could possibly go on its own. 'You've done it, this cannot be!' It was the first sound of joy that came in a long time. They could all feel how it started crawling and how well it was inclined, to the point of being on a slope. It was something steep, which appeared to be a cut space in the ceiling. Quite likely, a path made for this alone. The vastness of the gloom was still binding to the point when neither of them could yet see anything. Nor could Argus look above for some reason. 'This is it then, isn't it?' Unwrapped by the belt, he turned towards them and realised just how excited they were. So was Genie after realising that perhaps it wasn't as bad as it had appeared to be. 'Unless the light dies out entirely, this path that was set for us should do as well.' Words more wrong hadn't been spoken. It was too soon to celebrate. A song of pain came, a shriek from the creature which grabbed it to a halt. It roared across that made the entire cockpit shake in pain and vibrate in fear. The uncontrollable urge to shake came into being then. Nothing surprised him anymore. But at the light faded and the last glimpses of what used to be the world then came to the screams of the young and the old. It happened as if in a dream, they were caught in a trap from where they couldn't escape, to the point of every joint which held a note suddenly burst. Its log poles of meat just stood there standing before bending over perplexed and unable to make a sound. The fright was unbearable from the likes of it. 'Are you all right?' 'I'm scared Argus.' That was the voice of Genie. But what had happened to Barnabee and the man who was with him? In almost a whisper he called to them. 'Barnabee, Barnabee, where are you? Answer me, this isn't something we can lightly avoid, something is seriously wrong.' With the fact that no one answered, he started feeling around for a body in case he was knocked out. There was nothing to be felt. Could he have fallen through that gate? It was quite hard, judging by the fact that something appeared to have been taken this being from behind and stopped its movement. 'Genie, whatever you do, I need you to step aside and wait for me here, understood? It might be dangerous down there.' There were illegible words from her muttering and tears. Clearly disturbed, the girl attempted to say it in an agreeing tone, or at least something as close to it as possible. 'I'll open the gate, be ready. Don't look unless I tell you, please Genie.' She said no word whatsoever, perhaps making it clear that it wasn't only a fear here that kept her frozen in place. The door went by the side with ease, revealing what used to be the light. It came to them from above, revealing just how abruptly the road below the lead. There were no humans anymore, as it appeared from the scratching marks that they desperately attempted to resist falling only to be taken further below. How could this be happening now? Supposedly, this was the only way out for me and now. Something appeared to have anchored him. 'Genie, I need you to stay and be ready to do the same as.' A glance revealed in just what condition the tune making device had come to. It was painful to look at it. But just as well, Genie was in a worse place now. Crying in a corner, alone, unable to move. 'If there's an anchor there below, holding us from going any further, there's nothing else to do for us but to try to remove it and continue further.' Presumably, one glance through that steep hole and it would make sense if the two of them ran there once the pandemonium came into motion. It wasn't entirely impossible to climb through but from the likes of it. Well, they hadn't seemed to have the best chances. 'But neither do we.' Said, Argus, as he started walking at a fast pace. It hadn't evolved into falling as a matter of fact, which made him grab a hold to the first pole he could. It might as well be the explanation for their fall. Even the hardness appeared to be softening now, going as much as sweating all over. The dimness of the first compartment appeared to have been gone now, as the next one was engulfed in darkness. 'Here it goes.' Said, Argus, as he continued his leap of faith into this abyss. What he feared most was the fall, but he found himself standing still, looking further away to see another compartment lighted. Some of them were finally there, bodies, humans, the other ones. Had he reached the point where they were gone? Is anyone here still breathing? Does anyone need my help? A few seconds passed before realising that they weren't. Something harder stood in the middle of it though. An intrusion from outside had punctured and impaled it. A protected structure of bone and skin which was covered by a thick carapace laid still. Too thick for anything to happen whatsoever, as his touch proved to be nothing more than ticklish. Bulbs came from far ends, making it far sharper than it seemed to be. Acting like claws, under the carapace, it might've been organic from everything he had seen. This was another place to be abandoned and he made his way. The next one he could probably analyze. It came and took it by the side, going as far inside as it could've gone. The image of the beast wriggling in pain still lingered within him. But this was too much, it had lifted it from the ground, most likely, in this attempt to stop them. It went as far as to impale it from multiple sides. But the dire question, once the eeriness came, and every light started flickering was. 'Where are the other humans now?' He asked with both curiosity and wonder. From such likes as for this place, their disappearance was bizarre. They couldn't have been the corpses alone as the entirety of the vehicle was full. As it came into being, the doors were still sealed shut. Windows barred, and how much further below could they have gone? Since there was only a way, he went through there, until reaching a point where he could see. Not for long though. The lights were flickering out and this was about to be their end. The shadow engulfed a body from behind and with the tail of his eyes, he saw a figure. 'Genie?' Argus whispered then. It was too tall and too well made to be her. Just a few feet away laid the intrusion which appeared to have become a tunnel of skin, or rather an escape for those trapped in this thing. I need to get her to come with me now. But Argus didn't dare raise his voice and call to her. Paranoia was in store. As obvious as it appeared to be, it couldn't have been him, dragging his crooked hands. Despite being tied for so long against that metal cart, it was now obvious that it was there no more. From the likes of it, there was something twisted that had grown out of the marks left by that cart. Only a region of the body was lifted that he couldn't see. It's being dragged now. Argus noticed the fact that the levels became even more morbidly twisted than before. Somehow beyond his notice, this machine or being was being torn apart. And this could be my escape, as he thought of it. He could go at once and be free, as there wasn't any possible way for him to go through that. Something under its arms began to creep, Argus, which was something that wasn't supposed to be there. There wasn't any doubt that this was the same one that drowned that day or hadn't. From such likes, he didn't dare return for Genie. As the first steps began, it was obvious that it hadn't noticed Argus as of yet. It turned and started to go towards what could only be called as noise. 'Argus, help me. There's something in here, something that's not a human.' She said through the broken system. Most of it appeared to have survived through the pipes and what not. It appeared that this was it for her, through the system, Argus heard the slam of the door and came closer. So slowly, that the light started dimming out slowly. 'Can you hear me Genie?' Spoke Argus through the other far end. It was fair enough that this worked two ways, from one end to another, that they heard each other loud and clear. 'Genie, I can't.' This appeared to have triggered a dead silence from the likes of which she couldn't raise herself from. There were tears audible and pounding soon began. It didn't help that Genie was standing on the cold floor, just waiting for a response. 'Why?' I don't have the weapons or the strength to take it alone. It might've come from one of those things that stopped this from going on. Genie, listen to me and calm down. There appeared to have been some difficulty to the likes of her. It was hard but immediately got harder as metal started going as low as it could go. 'Damn it, woman, you need to listen. Do you see the gap through which I got close to? There's an opening past the panel, it's dark now, but you should've remembered by now where it is.' 'Yes.' She was hard to hear from all the pounding. There wasn't just the claw alone making all the noise in the engine. Something which began tearing it apart from inside appeared to be making the disturbance. 'Damn it, you need to go before it's late, crawl through, I'll try making a distraction and save you some time but you need to face your fears.' 'I'll open the door once he's gone.' 'It's too dangerous to do it that way, you'll be killed Genie.' 'I'm not able to do it without light.' She was starting to get calmer by the second, knowing that something was about to happen. This was a hard decision to make and there wasn't anything to assure him that she would be saved the other side. 'Stay in there and listen to the door, I'll do my best.' This was steep, most of it having been left hollow between the tight places in the walls. He felt them as being the thing, almost absorbed by what fluid of what had been giving it the size. But, he was there, standing, just a few paces, beyond darkness and everything else that had happened. A liquid was now laying on the floor. This was to be lucky side if he'd trip and fall on his attempt to catch him. Argus made sure to stand on the left side as he was ready to announce his position. Damn this creature was hideous. He couldn't help but notice, even from the back, the various expunged forms and malformations of skin. There was hair there ready to grown, towards something that used to be the head. Yet, it was way further pushed back now and its brown colour was recognisable. It had to be down now. 'Damn you, creature, you missed one.' The echo came as quickly as possible from the likes of which the thing turned before Argus could hear it come. The pounding stop and it came to a surprisingly fast-tracking motion after seeing walking meat. It was a harsh drop but it did nothing to it. The blood on the floor tripped it and the darkness was confusing. Now the door opened that she could see the light and as Genie noticed that it was in the distance, she immediately pushed herself beyond the panel and the various pushed anomalies. She had gone on the other side, as well as had Argus in the tunnel made for him to get through. It seemed to have been swallowing him, from the organic feel. At the top, it clones and got pulled back. The motion stopped and Argus felt trapped. The air was getting thin, but he could feel himself being transported from a point to another. Pink, lighted as they approached something that produces a tight light source, though it pushed him below. It couldn't have been happening, but it was clear that they passed something that shouldn't have been coming at all there. It was another one of those machines that brought him there, to begin with. Just in time, it came and cut the neck of the transporter, making this operation absurdity null. The disturbing part came quickly now. It was easy to feel the force that came through him as he was falling. Argus had experienced pain before, but this crushing feeling of despair forced itself past any reason alone. The ground got crushed and he could feel his muscles relaxing once again. It spread like an organ and lowered him slowly like he was on a net of some kind. 'I'm here again.' He said despite being so close to finding a way for him to escape. And yet, despite that fact, he found himself kneeling again, looking above through the darkness at yet another hole in the maze. 'Is there no end to this prison?' 'Could there even be one way for me to escape?' There was no one here that could've known of his plans, yet he was still caught and dragged back before he could escape. Whatever laid at the bottom was still glooming, even as he waited. The smell only got darker and the substance under him appeared to be more organic than ever. Such a peculiar, disturbing thing, that looking upon it closer revealed that it also bore small hair all around it, going as far as having an entire sea of it. 'What are you?' Argus was perplexed by this, but for

looking through, he saw something come. He rolled at once in time, seeing how debris fell, a piece of armour from the engine fell and immediately got pushed and pulled under its own height. It ate it, I'm sure of it. It has to be alive, but I can't be sure of it yet. His time was almost up as well. Argus could feel himself suddenly sinking below under all that mass. As dangerous as it was, he grabbed a hold of the ceiling and pushed himself further away. Nothing in sight, no other way at least in miles. The process started immediately and it was a shame that now he couldn't run but stand there as a victim. He shouted at last. 'You've taken my only way out, I know it's you. This can't be happening but you asked me to come and release you from this torment of yours. Where are you?' There was a thick silence, grim, as his feet were at least at that level. He waited until finally there came an answer. 'Release.' Said the voice and he fell. Suddenly, he felt his entire body buried in that sea of cold air, until at last, it became warm and comforting. There wasn't any pain, not as such to be felt, but this was only the entrance, the portcullis between his world and the next. Released from his bounds, he was pushed below, left in a standing position on the ground. It was far enough to look at the giant cavern but this was it. And there it was. This was the grim side of that thing above. It was still a furry thing which moved but darker, burnt on its other side. Somehow, it appeared to be sentient, to the point of serving and obeying him as much as Argus had done. The cage was there, at last. 'After all this time, it was here all along.' From the likes of how far it was, the cage was enormous, Titanic. It was ornate, at least from what he could tell from the distance. As a matter of fact, this primal cavern had all kinds of paintings made by primordial men, from what he could tell. Men hunting mammoths with spears, images of blood. He could look above and see that some sort of those twisted black pieces of hair were only covered by darkness. They appeared to be cold, almost making the ceiling be covered in spikes made of ice. Soon, he was perplexed by this discovery. And yet, in the light of everything he had ever seen, one thing bothered him still. He was afraid. There hadn't been this promise in a long time. Neither was there a voice to guide or help him for just as much. 'You have come.' It said. 'Why have you stopped guiding me towards you? We had a deal!' 'Something's muffling my voice.' Said in a tone of anger, if it could even process such a thing. Argus hadn't stopped his motion, yet this was to be what it truly appeared as being a damned being. He finally understood what the voices meant to say. Rot the lock, contaminate it. As much as it was a cavern, this entire place was clean, every germ being entirely killed by what laid above. That twisted being made sure every infection would be absorbed. Despite that, yet he had been missed. Regardless of that distraction, he looked and saw the lock which held that dark twisted thing apart. A flash of memory came to mind, it had been the old man. Standing, and looking through one of his manuscripts. From the looks of it, either there were more cages or he had got to sketch the exact copy of this one and had it with him all along. It was detailed, down to every painting on the wall and what laid outside. Something had tried creeping in and blocked his exit. A meat glutton, a devourer who tried to take its rightful place. 'This is why you wanted me to come? To slay just another parasite?' 'Another glutton who'd take my place.' This meant he could've escaped. Centuries ago. It came with a quick response, nothing witting, speaking as much as like a human as if he wasn't the one doing the talking. There was another through which its enormous thoughts came. 'You are to get rid of it like you've got rid of the other.' But this road seemed to never end. Either this cavern messed with his mind or no progress was done whatsoever. Stone malformations occurred under his own eyes. There were sharp ragged teeth that just pushed and pulled without a care of place and time. As he approached, his thoughts were clear. 'How could you be stopped by such a lower being? Weren't you supposed to be the mightiest of them all?'It could've been true millions of years ago but time hasn't been kind to him.Enough had passed between them for him to realise that his cage had become something that drained everything he had.Up to the point where a mere parasite just came in and ate the lock.Ever since it pushed through it started sucking on the source of power.'I've grown weary of this but I am unable to break my shackles."Is that even your real appearance then?What are you deceiver?"I meant only to ask for your help, your mind conceived me and how I looked without my notice.'He felt like it was the truth.Though as dangerous as releasing it became, there wasn't any other way out.Even if he were able to climb, he'd be absorbed after the contact a second time.At least he had hope that this caged being would keep the promise and release him finally.'Just a few steps towards it and end this intruder.'Something messed up with his senses was happening.It appeared as if this end was never meant to come, just another illusion that would creep and push itself past his senses.'I can go no further.There's no way for me to break this illusion anymore since I've got no tools and nothing with me to help me now."It cannot see you.'Said the voice.'It can barely feel you, I've made sure of that.'"Then what is it that it wants from me?How can it know where I am?'Asked Argus, after being caught off guard.'It can feel the material that's on you, that's the reason why it pushes you back.'And as this command came to be, Argus finally threw away everything he had and pushed towards that bloody parasite.So cold.'I can't feel my body.'Argus said but received no pity.There appeared to be a wall of ice above, from which small ice drops fell below.Some touched Argus, reminding him of the pain he felt.It was a sign at least that he was alive, sort of, now unstoppable.The cold winds pushed the clothes as far away and this appeared to distract the glutton.From the distance, it had appeared to be only a little thing, but now that he began being pushed away from the illusion, he could fall closer from the cliff.It was obvious now that he was two times bigger than the first parasite he had defeated.And another difference was the fact that he was filled with shame now, naked, alone and cold.What made it painful for him to walk now was the fact that he knew what was in store for him.On the other side, where he laid waiting, surprised most likely.'You've waited for so long for me to come.Why me?'You had a history in your family of studying us, nothing more.It was decided that you were the best in store to help us escape.'Argus looked above once again and realised then the reason why the edges were blackened.He had led something other to the point of finding where the cage laid.'I've done my best to guide you to this point, whenever you saw it or not.'He wanted to tell him what happened before and what followed him, that presence of crawling trepidation.It bore a certain thing that it waited and watched instead of doing any action.There came the rain to his surprise, everywhere around him there fell cockroaches, black and big.Some were tied together, other tortured and crushed under his feet.I need to get there.Argus made sure to take a good look at this growling glutton.It appeared that there wasn't any bone structure and whatever it had been eating from made it grow exponentially.This alone could let him climb for hours or more than that.At least it was obvious that there was a brain in there, somewhere.Seconds alone would kill it after a touch.'Can you guide me once I'm inside of it?'If it hears me talk inside of it, you may be killed from the inside and devoured."There's another thing I haven't told you now."I know it.Go on.'Said the voice in his reprise.The intricate ornate box stood there with all the story of the primaeval beings and the humans that followed.It would've been fascinating to stand and look at it for as long as he could.But time dictated otherwise.He crawled into one of the many putrid holes it had at an end.The skin was pushed and twisted around them as if they were giant long tubes inside.First there came the crawling, when the air became noxious, even for him. But it was somewhat obvious that it had grown too strong to be bothered by his mere touch. There wasn't anything spreading but small marks of blisters which were rare. Its bulbous forms seemed to have grown strong in the time it decided to eat and drink from his succour. Soon, Argus found himself jumping on the other side. It appeared that the tunnels in the body had been covered by strong dark carapaces which filled him with dread. There wasn't any softness inside, at least none which he could see now. What was more frightful was the noise he heard, something that almost made it seem like there was voice, talking to one another. Luckily for him, he was hidden just fine under those long damned plants that had rotten but kept growing. Strangely, he witnessed this strange occurrence that everything which had begun rotting still kept growing. Small plants erupted out of wood but soon decayed and were grabbed to a halt. Others such as the hanging leaves started growing to the point of not being able to stand straight. But one thing was still disturbing now. It was looking and the guardians of the place. Argus could remember another one who appeared to be just like them. Twisted humanoids spoke to another in a language he couldn't pinpoint to any current civilisation of the sort. It was almost like they spoke of gibberish intentionally to be heard. But it wasn't going to appear like they were alone. From one of the other obscure tunnels came a bigger one. It appeared like this was the next step on their metamorphosis, at least for the time being. Instead of rotting, from various parts of the body, round bulb-like heads started growing, especially in the back. A hunchback which filled the room with dread, especially since it dragged something, an anchor to be more precise. It couldn't be removed anymore since it had grown there, either by fondness or skin. Barely now he noticed that this appeared to be like the inside of a ship. A wooden floor, rotting seaweed and other plants. The crew appeared to have begun a process of sterilisation and absorption of skin. It was quite obvious now that he was forcing them to become tender, to grow larger and larger. This process would continue to the point of being ready to be eaten. 'I've touched it as well.'

'Whispered Argus before looking down at his hand confused. Something had begun growing there to the point of looking like he was infected. His hand was slightly larger and some of the fingers appeared like they had no bones whatsoever. They'll get me. He thought, but finally, they had finished their conversation and went on with doing what they were supposed to. It was carrying from one point to another, carts, those that weren't attached to them. A glance revealed that they were some parts which made him question if there were humans here once. But it was more than that, the other one who was bigger pushed a cart which had a bulb of grown thing, like a belly but busted through the metal case. It was a thing of total expectancy that they left the corridor alone, for him to see. Now, Argus was fair, he felt like he was warned of it now. 'Don't stand too much still, you know what will happen immediately after.' This was the only time he dared not ask for a voice to talk to him. Stressed and filled with dread he came to his feet and stood still. This short run from one point to another was dangerous as well. It was just dark enough not to be seen other than when he was in the tunnel. But this wasn't about to be the last of them. Deeper as he went he noticed that there was a sort of balcony for the watchers. It had made a nest in itself, to the point of having a few dozen young standing, attached into holes. A colony that needed to be fed and taken care of. From the looks of it, there had been other human who came to this but eventually got changed into the abomination Argus saw. 'I don't stand a chance against this. Against this madness.' Said Argus, after throwing another glance. Inside of the parasite, the skin had become almost as hard as the very ground he walked upon. It took everything it could from inside to feed its young. 'If they get out.' Now you understand. 'They answered. But how could they have taken so many of them?' The means don't matter, just the end."But you were once like it, why are you helping me now?"It's simply because our lives are coming to an end.'There hadn't been any sustenance they could devour to grown again to the mass they once were.'But don't worry, you only need to do one last thing in order to be free now.Listen to our advice.Her young will die once the brain stop functioning, they're not living being yet."How could this be, I can see the towers in this thing, the dark ones covered by her carapace.And the bridges and many levels below where they cry.I can also see just how many of them truly appear to be, going as far as having them just buried under one another after leading to an endless abyss."And none of them live yet until reaching maturity.'It quickly responded.'If their host dies they will all stop thinking.They have nothing in their minds, mindless beings that wouldn't be able to feed themselves after it dies."It planned to transfer its entire brain into everything, to the point of becoming a thousand and a thousand more."Never being caught, and forever growing old."Then what do you have me do?"Cut it's feeding tube at the end and it will starve in minutes.Her brain will die instantly after being cut, that's the weakness she had put open herself once she started growing accustomed to that type of regular feeling.'To Argus, this appeared to good to be true, only but a cut and the parasite would die.At least before releasing a legion of young that would swallow the depths and rise upon the world.From the looks of which they were big, grown, too tall for a human to take alone.'But I'm infected."Look again.'It appeared normal once again, but this wasn't about to last.He'd been standing on a plank for the last minutes, henceforth came back to normal.'Don't touch the skin for too long now.'His condition became obvious even without their remarks.I need more than this.'Then look for yourself.'It said and at once he started feeling how the entirety of his being was being transported.He couldn't see nor move but feel.A state of idiocy which kept him feeling how he was pushed through a cart.The tight spot he was in became apparent to him as for the pain he felt from having not enough space to grow.No mouth for it to speak.Barely an organ laid around, the long extrusion-like hole which kept him alive by breathing through it.I need help, he thought.Release me now.But this wouldn't be heard or answered, as well as it would've been laid for nothing.None could hear and the mindless slaves only did what they could do best, obey.The masters spoke and soon he felt taken by strong arms.His arms and ribs, parts of his knees and lungs were squeezed tightly before being placed inside one of the holes.The texture was obviously hard and shallow, as to be taken as anything but lightly.At the other end of where he laid was a giant thing which felt this scent of fear.'It will eat me.'There came nothing out of it, only but a puff of smoke, thrown away from the small hole which got used for breathing.'I got your point, release me now, I can hear it crawl.'And it made a lot of noise for a mindless creature, crawling and opening a sharp appendage.It went softly around the body of meat.There was somewhat of an examination around it which had shown some sign of intelligence.From the likes of it, his entire body was encompassed.But it was going to get worse, as Argus found out that he could feel no pain now.Another grim thought started brooding inside his mind.At once, those extrusions went under and above, encompassing his entire body.It took only a bite to release his sight and released a crooked dual vision of what it is that gazed upon him.A pair of the long pain of hair laid on the body, black and moving at distinct times and unison.There were no visible eyes or a mouth despite the fact that it was time for it to eat.Something made it wait and look through the insides.Perhaps it found out?Could it now?No, it waited only to start inserting a liquid from the horn it bore.It could cut skin like it was nothing more than butter.Suddenly, around it, the skin changed to black and melted, ending his vision from one side.Now, as he laid partially blind, it waited a lot more for the other side.From the likes that he'd never get to see one so closely, he looked around. It appeared that this piece in which he grew had half of its body connected through. One end now became apparent, that it'd feast tonight. Long teeth, crooked and shallow could cut and eat, push and gnaw. They acted like small hands in the sense that they could grab the food and carry it in its mouth. It ended soon before it could inject anything else in it. Argus stood once again on the balcony and watched. 'Is this all? My body has regained control but that was too short to mean anything to me. This arrogance didn't work for him in the past. Something made him want to drive their reason away. To make them mad and hurt them. 'Do you want to suffer yet again?' 'Make me.' This seemed to have been something that they could've done but instead of a vision, there came a headache. Voices came rushing down, forcing him to kneel and bend in pain. To crawl like a thing which was below human. Flashes came but he couldn't be forced to see anything anymore without him accepting it. 'Not anymore. You can't hold me!' He said as he raised himself above. They couldn't force him to do anything anymore as he observed. From his ears, along with their fleeting voices, there came a black oil that had run its course. It came a lot out but with each drip, the voices had begun to say not a word any longer. This was what they were, he looked at his hands and saw them just slip through his fingers. Now I'm alone. 'Now I am free.' With that, he went through the tunnel and turned through the passage which was used by the workers. He could feel a lot lighter, faster and in a way, he could once again think of anything without feeling any pain whatsoever. This meant that he was alone as well, without any outside help of intrusion but as it concerned him, all fair. Stone became an intrusion of sand. They carried it from above most likely, as well as the hive entrance was made out of a material which was produced by another creature whatsoever. He memorised something of their movement patterns but knew they weren't blind. 'I have to go before it's too late and they return.' First, he felt how deep the sand traps were, and how far he could sink. It wasn't like the moving sand that would swallow him whole but holes laid around. They must've been used for storage once. At least Argus considered himself lucky to stumble upon them now. His foot suddenly got inside one but it was quickly and easily dragged back. This appeared to be something useful if it weren't for the fact that he could just as easily suffocate. The light of the place had been taken from far away, the bulb of light resembled the ones from the bloody concoction he had come from above. Its resemblance was uncanny. They had grown everywhere around but had been covered in bandages. At least from what he could see and as far as his field of vision went, this appeared to be a norm. Noises became audible and this was to be his chance. He threw himself into one of the holes but made sure that he turned his head and left the nose above. It was just enough that it worked. Argus had his nose just dirty enough to look like a rock. The sand just stuck on the dirt and staid. Now, holding onto the walls was harder than it appeared to be. Something wasn't well down there where the sand trap lay. There wasn't any possibility for it to shatter or to break. But his strength wouldn't allow him too much exposure and for him to stay there and feel how something was growing through his hands. He could hear their broken tongues just go on and on through the same way he had come from. It was the time for another one of their meeting apparently and while risking to do it worse than ever. But this was the time for him to raise his head and breathe. There were none. At once he blew out of the ground and came to his senses. It was more than a clear view and a clear way for him to go undetected for the time being. So, he thought. Argus came to a sudden crossroad that went below. There was apparently another level below them, the storage under the hive. From the looks of it, there wasn't any way for him to avoid this, but nonetheless, he couldn't try. This was to be a lot more dangerous than anything he had been noted for doing. Checking the metal casing and the unclosed door, he awoke into the room from which they stored all the meat. It would come as a surprise that it wasn't just human meat or from any creature that it was taking. Long piercers of metal suddenly pulled away and cut off the glutinous pieces of the parasite. There were a few engineers of the sort that forced Argus to hide between the array of metal walls. Without a doubt, once he pushed himself further in, the veil of darkness would keep him hidden. At least from that sick looking engineer or warden of the sort. It was unclear what it was by simply looking at it and how it started rigging that thing. But how? Why would it feel itself to its own mindless pieces of the body? It just didn't make any sense. This action it had, this plan felt too damned to be understood. At least he had to wait and take just one out. From another glance, it had its back turned. With that, Argus went back to hiding with his precious information that would damn them all. There was apparently too much bulk in it as well, that it pushed its spine outward. From the looks of it, there was a frailness that would make it tremble and be denied the gift of life. It appeared that he wasn't doing much work. What could it be doing by tickling them now? Once the next turn came, he lifted himself to look through the large oval-shaped hole in the metal. He noticed it now after he risked being seen, as he had looked beyond the corner. That thing that was tickling the metal suddenly hid as well from the looks of it. 'It's not working with them.' Said Argus but cowered at once. The brutes had come now, the next step most likely. It had become apparent that anything that had been bone suddenly grew outside in the form of an exoskeleton. Black bones, the ones that would've been the charred remnants of an inferno. Even as the arms grew to the likes of tendrils and pitchers, they still were restrained to the simple commands just like the others. They carried the orders of transporting, even if the brutes managed to carry two carts at a time. The likes of it made him tremble. Argus knew he'd fall into an encounter with one of them sooner or later, but this wouldn't do. Quick and nimble in the way they grabbed those moving slabs of grubbling horrors. Even more, as his vision suffered from them being taken away, the slabs didn't appear like meat. Neither did the slaves look like humans. So far they were stuck in a partially deformed state between the grim and the humane. He felt the repercussions of having them forced out of his head. Soon, even a glance at his own body would reveal, even through the darkness that he didn't look like one any longer. Anxiety forced him to crawl into a ball and stay there in the darkness. He'd throw a glance but look away. Something crept along but they weren't the common cockroaches. He could still see them nonetheless and feel his skin crawl around his body. 'Why?' Came out of his mouth without being able to control it. 'Make them go away.' Was the next whisper he muttered. Even as they passed, it was the humane thing that they weren't looking like people he could've related and pitied. Whatever he had seen or through the parasite appeared like, this wasn't it anymore. Parts of it that they were cut apparently appeared to have gained a piece of sentience and started moving. It was a white texture that was inflating and extending that he thought he saw like a glutinous belly before. But this wouldn't do to gaze too much upon. The ground was just cold enough and shallow for him to stay. It was then that he fell asleep, hungry and thirsty in a long time and perhaps this wasn't the best place but it may just do. As this delivery ended, he could see them for what they truly were. The first creature that hid away just as he did had nothing to do with this whatsoever. But nonetheless, it was doubtful that he could get his help now, especially since there wasn't any way to communicate with it. It was the time to go and all alone. But one thing he noted as he lifted himself above the other. That being was still afraid, even of him, despite not knowing who he was. Another glance at his own body revealed why. It's almost as if he had become such as them, basking in their appearance and how they looked like. Argus managed to keep himself sane for as long as he could remember. This journey had already taken a toll that would be too high to be paid. This is what he had become, just like the monsters he had feared in a way. Forms around his hand and pieces of his clothes had fallen off. It wasn't that he came to embrace it but the time for him to become a servant wasn't there just as much. With that thing in hiding, he threw another glance around. A wheeled metal box laid just around the corner. Fate had smiled upon him to the point of his wish being granted now without any repercussions whatsoever. Argus grabbed it and started moving towards the sentient piece. Quite light from the looks of it, but it was about to carry a piece of the parasite throughout the entirety of the compound. The concoction of metal started slashing with its tight pincers to cut a piece of the sentient blob. It pushed, then pulled a piece of it, smaller, but quite enough for him. This he grabbed and pushed inside. He could see that the dark thing hadn't looked at all like a human being. Quite the opposite, to the point of it looking somewhat of an organic shell, twisted and bearing a texture of white lines being bored inside. It moved in the chart and took the boxed shape of it before making a distinct sound. He knew it was time to go. But just as he went on ahead, he saw that thing snooping high and low, trying to catch him with a glance. It was particularly disturbing to think that he was in the same position as it. 'I will be back for you before it's over. You should run away in case I don't return since it won't be safe at that point.' There appeared to be some intelligence in those bulb-like eyes, glittering in the dark. Perhaps it wasn't as nimble as him but he had to try. Argus had another sicker path to take from now, as he reached, the entry, to this amorphous thing. The scent bore through already and he could finally take a good look at everything. The nest was built around and under the organs from the looks of it. A sort of respiratory system hanged on the ceiling, just growing in size and pushing back. It was terribly strange that it bore them around, guts and all, but lowered and protected. This thing tried to take the appearance of a human but had failed. What he had missed upon his glance was the fact that there were bits of a spine but not a wholly grown one, which had failed to take form. Remains of these failed experiments laid around for all to see. 'Glurk yaata.' There came a voice just as he was passed. It was brute which was at least twice as big as he was, deformed, boring somewhat the appearance of the shell but taken from the part of the body which bore the muscles. Tissues on it became apparent but what didn't remain the fact that they bore bones on their outer side. Argus nodded and remained surprised. 'They appear to trust me. I know you can't respond unless he'll hear you now, but I'm almost close to its mouth.' A wicked thing that was, boring through the cage, even from the distance you could measure a hundred pairs of teeth, all crawling at the same time like they were their own beings. Somehow the path had been laid fair for him to go at the point of being unprotected and reachable without him having to climb. But how long could he come and go without being suspected? For now, he carried the cart slowly without being suspected, after all, how could someone as weak as himself do this? This was indeed something of a conundrum once he reached the higher caste of brutes who appeared to have taken the higher ground. I need to think and I need to do it fast. Even the apparent prolonged vision appeared to induce some paranoia. For the crawling of those sentient blobs didn't become apparent, since they were hiding in their nests. And the skin below was covered in shells and sand, that he wasn't in danger of being caught off guard. I need to find a place where I can be alone. Then came the first thought he could bore now. It was the various ridges which had stretched that thing around the walls, only to give it another layer of protection. Too much for one man, as it seemed. Dark corners were received after feigning that he was doing the task he was given. At least a corner or two and two nesting regions were traversed before he finally found it. It was under a broken bulb just around the wall. The area was pushed in front just that he could stand and sink under it for a little. 'Poor little thing, you've died just above.' It was quite strange to relate but as he said it, his nervous tone hadn't managed to lower itself down anymore. There the paranoia brooded even further than he had expected. Past a point, he could see the common parasites just become expelled from his body and into this world. Spiders became not only bigger but started carrying legions of grubs with their webs. It was almost as if they were working with one another under his instructions, perhaps to the point of doing anything but to escape. Such a pulsating thing that didn't appear to be truly alive nor truly dead. Whatever happened once it got cut away from the rest of its body, it kept moving and doing whatever stagnant shivering movements in the dark. Gladly, for him, at least there wasn't any voice for it to call for help. The fact that they managed to create a proto-language, to Argus at least it was alarming. It made him feel like sooner or later he would be found out. But now, as he stood deepened in his thought, afraid of the dark, he started hallucinating even more. There wasn't anything to inducing but the prolonged exposure to this dark spot. It managed to do something to him that nothing ever did. His body shrank under it, most likely from the commotion. Now, the ants and the lions and the horses were going as small as he could grab them and see them shimmer between his fingers. Gazing at his hand appeared to be repulsing. Argus often wondered if he was right, but this answer didn't make it simple for him to understand that there wasn't any certain way he'd be accepted. Said by his own self in corner of pity. 'They'll see me as a phreak and mock me. They'll force me to sell my body for their experiments, by those that used to be my human fellows. I'll be sold as a slave and dance like an animal in the circus.' As these scenarios appeared to be his fate now, he wondered what could be the chances. Either death or be forced to stay. There was plenty to explore but once he'd lose the gift he had been given, he'd feel hunger and thirst again. As a matter of fact, most of them, at a certain point appeared to be suffering from the same condition as he did. Now, Argus was about to free their patron and he could see it right now, just as he came from the darkness. Realising that they'd suffer more than him, he understood why it was that they stopped Rahaka. And certainly why others kept this secret. It kept them from the weakness and inglorious hunger and thirst, but for how long would it have lasted? This paradise had its price. 'I need to be free.' Said Argus, now knowing what he had even thought of desiring ever since he was caught. Pushing the cart, slopping as if trying to imitate the creatures he had seen, he left the dark corner and moved on. Looking about, the intervals of feeding were long, at least long enough as for him to make his way further above. From the looks of it, the holes were being filled to a point of getting encumbered. Weighting down, the heaviness of the nest should've bored down whatever laid in the underground cave. Yet, neither this nor anyone raised against this glutton and its plan. From the looks of it, he would've become the next one, a being with a thousand or hundreds of thousands bodies. All of which laid dormant until the food came and a bigger chunk of sentience was added to their mass. The purpose? Most likely, until they were big enough to push through and most of the outer mass was done. But this process was corrupt, as eating whatever it could grab from the prison appeared to be making it grow bigger. In return so did the smaller bodies, from the likes of which they could've outgrown the cavern and ate through the white being which gave him passage. This appeared to be a tainted thing, as to say, it could've gone as far as devouring the entire planet in their wake, unless its plan was to enslave it. Even this small one appeared to be peculiarly moving in his presence. Despite the fact that it bore no eyes and no ears, it appeared to be shaking nervously at a time. 'Do you understand me?' There wasn't any response he could've interpreted as a yes or a no. Argus looked at it with a growing curiosity as if he was looking at a pet which was about to grow. A piece of muscle from the looks of it, but undoubtedly, eating it would only make him a piece of the parasite. Perhaps even to the point of having to look at one of the brutes out there. This wasn't a fair chance, but he raised himself past the mound and the raised pits of sand. Plenty of it laid around and there was something about this wheeled box that made it easy for him to roll over sand. It made no sense whatsoever from his standpoint, yet he couldn't complain. There were only ears everywhere around from the likes of which. And the taint of silence and loneliness came to an end. One extrusion, a giant wriggling appendage came out of one of the holes. It was unexpected but wasn't one of the children he had unexpectedly looked as if he was about to hatch. A striding thing covered in mould and throwing away pheromones into the air. Fairly, it was far away, but it appeared to have been locked on him for a second when he was moving. Wait for Argus and hold your breath. He said to himself and after all, it'd be rude not to listen to your own advice, especially when it came to a situation such as this one. It pushed towards spreading as much as it could everywhere in sight and beyond. Once there wasn't any motion to be felt, it was pulled back with a heaviness that was immediately shown. Its massive size made it look like this was the biggest it could get in an entire lifetime. Such a malevolent piece finally went back, crawling as far and as deep as to make him wonder. 'Is this the thing in which they evolve?' This was the darkest wonder he could've had, making sure that there was something to it, at least from his point of view. Weak, at least, that's what the substance felt for now unless it was nothing but a warning shot that was thrown out there to distract him. It was quite obvious that now he could force himself past that spot and still breathe the clean air. The cavern did good in preserving the air unless there was another thing down there which managed to clean it before it. Such it was that he wheeled away. All four of them were going through, pushing as if they couldn't be forced anymore past that point. 'We need to go now, I may need your cooperation in case of. 'Something cut his speech. 'It was all for you, wasn't it?' The blob had something of a harder reaction that he had, once he came into contact with whatever that pushing thing spread. It was something which transferred its malevolence into this before retreating. Small pointy flakes grew out of it, leaving the outlandish look that sluggish organ had. They were quite well endowed to leave a cut or two, deep enough to leave a mark if handled incorrectly. 'From this point on, anything may just go and happen.' Spoke Argus to himself. Boding with it was hard enough to do with himself, though he buckled up and did it nonetheless. No more time for wasting, the entrance was ever approaching to the point of their giant nests being too close to one another. Soon, he'd be taken alone by others who'd spread those things. And perhaps, he wasn't as right about who got affected by them and who wasn't. From the point of his shoulder and down below to the fingers, they spread like a disease. A condition which made him look even more deformed, to the point of cracking his skin. It made him no less stronger or disturbed his walk, but this sight made him think of what he'd say. 'We need to avoid them. Not much of speak I take it, I should've expected that.' Somehow, there did appear to be a way around. It was best that for now, he avoided most of the nests which bore those extrusions of theirs. 'Damn it.' He said once he noted of what was about to come. The upper regions appeared to have called upon legions of their servants. It seemed like they answered the call. Hulking slaves encompassed in their outer skeletons, bearing twisted end hands and pincers and long rope-like grabbing appendages. It was a sight to behold, so many of them which were once just kept in store, used for nothing else until this very moment. This wasn't the right time, but he was entertained. One thousand meters laid between them, and past the encompassing mist which laid around, they couldn't see him. Argus turned and looked at the hole from which the parasite was eating from. He realised that was the same point from which the mist had suddenly appeared. A friend in high places it seems. I pushed towards hiding away as possible. There wasn't any other way for me to go for since they would eventually push past the mist and kick in the muscle memory they'd been petitioning for centuries. Eventually, it was true for him that he'd be smashed immediately. Something told him that he wasn't supposed to feel those pheromones around him and the bulb. Another gaze made it seem like it was blooming. Such a sight to behold, it bore through him at least until they were both away from the nearest nest. Lost in the mist, he knew where to go, especially since what laid around was a wall. I got to feel it for myself. Upon going as far as seeing that everything disappeared, I touched it with my left hand. Such a problem, it ended up as being once suddenly, the skin and muscle liquified withing second. A human roar came from the distance. The brutes came towards what they thought they heard. It wasn't a need anymore, though it was turned around, to the point of having the blob fall and bounce in its own terror. The blood didn't seem to satiate it, contrary, to say the least, it brought too much pain, to the point of forcing a sound out of himself. Screams and shouting, the pain never ending, a gluttonous thing that he could see bits of his bone but his hand wasn't entirely lost, so he thought. 'It can heal me, it can heal me.' Said, Argus, while his breathing wasn't controllable anymore. At this point, he would go as far as to an anxiety attack of the sorts. His knees couldn't hold him as he ran and fell onto the sand. The blob rolled far away, having saved most of the shouting inside of it. It appeared to have pulled the brutes for the time being in the wrong direction. Despite that, though, it couldn't have helped him any less, this was about to take a turn. The pain was too much to take now, a hard blow which bore from inside the bone marrow itself. 'How could this have happened?' He asked himself, looking just how scattered his clothes were, his dry skin and lips and his head. Argus hasn't even recognised himself after that scream of pain. It was something an animal or a creature would've made. Certainly, a man could look around to expect no human after having heard the shout. That's not even the extent he achieved in this. There was another thing that was tainted, as he felt his knees just drooping to be swallowed by the sand. Something below was aching, making him desire to be taken back and fall below. And another desire, now that there was nothing to control his emotion, lost as he was. He wanted to suffocate and die easily rather than be caught by those brutes. Who could tell just what kind of torture those mindless slaves had in store for a man like him? Especially since he was laid frail by everything that had happened to him. 'Let me go.' There came a whisper. Argus thought it to be a hand in the mist, taking and having found him at last. Looking back revealed that there wasn't anything there, just the thick encumbering thing. He could grab and smash in right under his fingers, at least the ones which he had still worked on. 'Where are you?' He asked, refusing to remember that the thing couldn't speak to him while he was inside. One way or another, he found himself standing by the nest. Looking dire, Argus hoped for it not to come out again and spread its spores everywhere outside. With a gushing wound, it appeared that a kind of mould was still growing inside, spreading as much bacteria and brooding for an infection. Little antennas grew out of him, to the point where it appeared as if he wasn't in remote control of what was happening with his body. An infection was the darkest joke they could've played on him after all that's been happening. Now that he felt pain again, real pain, not the imitation, it wasn't as easy to desire it. The end of the journey, that is. Running rampant and away, he found himself touching the other side of the nest. Knowing that there were two of them touching one another, it made it a lot easier to find out where he had to go. The mist seemed like it was going to go away even without his help now, as the expunged thing appeared to have absorbed it. Within seconds after tasting, Argus saw a tube coming out. It was one of many that came from the parasite's mouth, but at least this appeared to be that thing with which it suckled on. Hundreds of them that came out of the head region, if you could call it that way. The brutes were too far or had been affected way too efficiently to regain control for the time being. Most of them were turned around, creeping or crawling despite what they appeared to be. In the distance, even the sociopath, that little being he had encountered stood and hid away. It thought Argus hadn't seen it now, most likely that he hadn't seen it before. Nonetheless, both of them were strangled now by that which had to be done. There wasn't any protection to be used. He pushed away and got away from the nest. This would be quite a peculiarity, as he went through. Its neck felt a heaviness approaching and it extended. Argus grabbed a piece of the skin and tried to hold himself still as the power it had was beyond any reason. Despite not being enough space, the parasite pushed its entire body away and inward in order to stretch a neck. It was just as meaty and bore its every wire and digesting tube. Even the ones made out of metal and copper which were boring by a thing which was alive. This is where it darkened the neck which began to appear like a tunnel. One last line of defence. Argus stood erect from the likes of it. Nothing laid which could stop him. At least until he saw that the tunnel had pieces of what used to be a highly working machine. Whatever laid in store there, he could see right through. It was dim, even for him, but vague. He realised now that there wasn't any way for him to regain the full extent of everything he ever had, so this had to do with it. A leap revealed but a world. 'But it cannot be.' Indeed, forced into the dark tunnel, his mind was struck by realisation. It was so close to the cage that he could hear the whispers it bore through the gateway. This would be a bloody sacrifice since he could feel his body moving despite seeing himself standing still. An illusion of a world that was swallowed into nothingness failed now that he was so close to hear him and be guided. 'Walk.' The voice said. And as he did so, he felt himself reaching it. After having avoided the almost invisible tentacles it bore through the tunnel, the small spore inducing thing that would've paralysed him, he managed to reach its mouth. It shattered the darkness and the metal wrought something of a reflection. This attempt to trap him in the last approach failed, even as it sacrificed some of its mass. Many tentacles laid flaccid against the wall, filled with spore which by now laid expired. Argus looked and what could've been and could only laugh at it. For his touch now filled that thing with dread. First, he took the metal tube and pulled it out with his own hands. There was at least going to be some heavy lifting and some work to be done that needed him and his strength alone. It was ringed from the looks of it and got to have a stinger at its far end, that at least would explain why it's the longest one. It took a while and at least some attempts to get it right and drag it through the small maze it bore through it. From the looks of it, something was truly happening, as the first long tube went off. Truly, this came as a surprise, but most of them had liquified inside of it, from the way they moved when touched. This meant that there was only a way to go through, as the metal tube fell and left a crawling hole. 'Is this what they meant for me to do?' This would be his final question, as he gazed into that deep sickening abyss. It was an attempt to push him as further away as possible. Nonetheless, it had failed. Argus would crawl inside and act as an agent of disease, a giant thing that would grow slightly in bulk only to take on its part. He could feel just how the tendrils would grow around from every side and attempt to devour him. First, it stung, but as the pain went away, it must've realised what was happening. At last, Argus understood. He had lost his vision momentarily. After that came his hearing and the voice to scream and shout to his newly found god. It had happened indeed. From the looks of it, the devouring creep had ended its life as it pulled out its crushed mouth out of the cracked cage. As it fell, the parasite was beginning to melt just like the previous one, slowly degrading. An escape from the likes of it, came to the end, as that thing started forcing its way through. From the bottom of the cavern, he stood there and watched with a new found eye, something that had grown from him by the time he was there. Waiting as it pushed itself with its true form, or to say the least what he thought to be. It appeared that this was to be the other way around. There wasn't anything to stop it anymore as it began crushing and pushing pieces of his prison away. Leaving left a primordial roar, which shaped its form to something truly horrendous. Its bulbs revealed something of an overgrown body, infinitely more formed than he had expected. Despite what it appeared to have been, this was nothing like the vision he had been shown. The horror it bore was like a disease that had nothing to do with the little primates that had worshipped it. And after the original display was done, it went on ahead and crushed its prison in half. A strike was enough to break the cave in both of the sides. I witnessed it in its glory, the many heads and the sharp tubes it had born back. Argus hadn't even noticed yet, but it had stolen most of the tubes and avoided him in the process. It came to be that now it pushes its many limp heads without eyes or features but tubed extrusions to devour what belonged to it. Such power prompted them to take the living matter in an instantaneous way. All of it except him, spared and left into a pool of primaeval matter which didn't even belong to him. Wondering now what it was about this that he heard, could it be true that god he saw or just another trick of the parasite? The human voice he could recognise wasn't there anymore to confirm anything or state anything new. It bore quickly with that living protector as it devoured it immediately with its elongating neck. The mass it had become had the power of flight and the strength to force anyone into an endless dream. Its horror laid not in its expanding form, now that there wasn't any limit for it to shift. But this was a living side of the universe which he wouldn't get to see anymore. There'd be no escape from the likes of it now. And then he closed his eyes and felt only but turbulence. It had taken him inside and delivered him into what could only be called a vision of the world. 'I can see it now, I can see all of them.' Said, Argus, as he found himself standing, in a pseudo position, barely having attained a bit of consciousness now. He was barely human, to say the least, stuck into confusion and the vision of might. Around him was a room made in the body, a sack of the sort, fashioned to his liking, or at least the liking of a human. It is now that he turned and looked above. There were small intrusions, holes but longer through which air went through. It was through them that he could finally hear it speak. 'Argus, this is it, your choice is nigh. Do you wish to stay here forever as a part of me and witness the universe or return to your planet? Bear in mind that the latter could bear consequences graver than you could ever expect to handle yourself.' This choice was still beyond his imagination. Again, he turned to look above. It appeared that the current form it bore was the one of a steed, bearing to traverse the universe like it always did. 'What do you plan on doing then?' 'Roam until I form my shell.' 'Why do you need to that? Isn't that what those little parasites do down there?' 'Indeed it is, but it's what must be done. After that, I shall devour planets for millennia in a pseudo-conscious way until the end of all life and matter.' 'And you wish me to witness that? Again, why would I do that to myself?' Asked Argus, slightly repugnant from the likes of it. The idea of being kept for long enough to witness the end of the universe was far too much for him alone to make. 'I've made my choice already, even before I decided to help you here.' 'No matter how hard he tried, Argus couldn't understand the reason behind it. Knowing that this was about to travel as far away as possible without him. Parts of its body had already taken the form of gas as he was getting ready to distance himself from the planet. By now, it could've been miles away, but this it chose, to wait for a simple being's answer. 'You're here now if it's so, could you finally give an answer to my questions?' There was a warm push through the intrusion. But, as insignificant as it appeared, Argus took it as a simple answer, nothing more. 'Why have you chosen me and why keep the promise to such a lower being?' 'It was needed in order to repay you for what you've been through. You may have observed that I was imprisoned for centuries, to say the least until you arrived to release me. 'But why did you choose to keep your promise? You could've just disappeared or absorbed me and went away without a single word or deed. 'Is that what you would've desired?' This was already going nowhere. I had to make a change. Clearly, there was something to be decided, if this was to be his return home. 'Well, it's too late now, is it? I felt like it went too fast, hasn't it?' 'I needed only a push to be able to free myself, nothing more. 'Why the intricate devices and who built your cage?' This way beyond Argus's knowledge and desire to have known. The heat raised from those holes made him firmly aware that there wasn't any need for his questions to be answered. It went silent for seconds. 'You know the answer to that question. Argus has seen them, hasn't he?' Answered the intrusion. Somehow, this room of his appeared to be smaller, but he has noticed something else. There, at the bottom of the cavern, in his memory, something was going to get him at all times. It crept and tried hiding away before having made itself be known. 'I understood.' Said Argus, without much of anything in regards to asking a question. Nothing particular came to his mind, nor any desire to know or be bestowed upon a cosmic knowledge of some sort. 'Will you release me now?' 'If that's to be your desire. 'As it appeared, he hadn't taken the time yet to look upon the earth and its beauty. The majestic sight was breathtaking, to say the least. Though what was even greater appeared to have been the patience it bore for him. I waited until he was done to be released. 'Will there be consequences for coming with you?' 'Argus will be no more but in a state of the prolonged entity until it will be no longer possible for your lifespan to be extended. 'Then it would've either come to death, from a life full of solidarity or worse, the vision, the punishment. 'Or be taken as an insignificant part of you. Another head as I have seen the vision. This appeared to be a general idea, at least as he looked upon it. And the world was still full of plenty of them, just deeply rooted and taking as many fools as slaves and bringer of sustenance. 'Will they ever. Forget that. I remembered that I had a question. What will happen with everyone I've met in your cage now that you've left? The council and the worlds I've came into contact with? Everyone there was cage just as much as you were. 'This was to be a dire thing to be answered now. 'They had a chance to escape once the cage was cracked, but now, their fate is in their own hands. 'Below the earth, through the sturdiest shallowest depths laid no light. No clean water and the sky that was no longer blue but metallic. The natural lights were of bulbs, but the people who were unlucky enough to be filled with dread became apparently stricken there, lost and afraid. This was the vision which was laid there, for him alone to see and decide. Were they worth saving and was it something to be desired? 'Will you let me go there and guide them back?' 'Most of them needed only a push in the right direction as for the others who were mostly human did belong to the human world. 'Henceforth, you've made your decision. 'I've waited too long to bear and other question. 'Then this it. Where we part ways. 'Will the way back be dark and shallow like this journey had been?' 'I can't promise you anything Argus but I shall leave you above, close to a point where you may make your way towards the depths or not. The rest is up to you now. 'His vision was about to go dark and he could feel like he was about to pass out and lose consciousness. 'Like others before me, you have served me well and this may be your reward. Bear in mind that whatever happens to you, there will be no longer an afterlife deserving of a human being, but something else. We may meet one another in aeons to come.' At which end, it spoke of his real name, that of which was once lost in time, but not for Argus. One blink revealed it to be the night. He stood erect upon the plain, there was somewhat of a march further away. 'Could this be?' One moment ago, he was at the peak of the world but now, his voice was only an echo. Knelt, he touched the ground and felt just how cold it was. But, one thing he hadn't noticed. It was the man who stood in front of his wife who, in her turn held their child. It was peculiar now that they stopped in the middle of the night after seeing something crawl. Argus turned towards them and waited now. He looks perplexed for a reason or another. It was important to note that what laid in his hand was a revolver. An old model, the kind they didn't make anymore, some sort of an antique. Somehow, this disturbed him more. Nothing new with what he had done then, doing it again with his newly found eyes. Perhaps that was the reason why he refused to move. His own breath betrayed him, knowing he couldn't hold it to a candle. Something which he hadn't accounted of, yes. That's what made him appear as disturbed as he appeared to be. It was late enough that the child was sleeping, as nervous as both he and his wife appeared. Something changed the man that night, after what he saw. A gunshot was about to disturb the child as well. In front of him laid a man who looked as if he was as afraid as he was. His hands were shaking and from here, he could hear his. No, Argus heard the heartbeat of the child instead of that of the man. It was such a long journey and home wasn't far. Pity, that he was so close to returning to the place. There was a shot audible in the middle of nowhere they say, as a child wept with her mother. Since that night on, the child had never shut her eyes again. It was too far from any town for anything to be written about it or anything else to be found other than a black spot in a field of green. An abandoned vehicle where a message said. 'Where have you been?'

Ante Dyotoromus

It was a harsh endeavor trying to escape the hard shell surrounding it. There were others who found their way in the damp moisture everyone dwelled in. They stood so close to one another that a putrefying reaction forced a mad concoction to occur in the moisture. Toxicity reached a new high. It dared not move without the help of a digging primate resting nearby. As easy as digging itself was, this was still a prison they were in. At least eighteen empty vessels lay around with no one around to feed them. It was a sad sight to wonder at. Greed between brothers, they shared the same idea, rather than face starvation they attached themselves to a network of large tubes preventing their inevitable demise. How pitiful of an imagery that was. Seeing them grasp like mad beasts rather than accept defeat. It was time for yet another one of them to succumb to that damning hunger and go ahead in the titillating deformation that dream had been. Only someone below scum would dare such a thing, but as it did connect, everything became so clear. They drained another one who had grown weaker and succumbed to some sort of deep sleep which lacked every kind of sentience. Inside of which it managed to host at least four of seven primates at a time. All of them shared the same dream while they were being drained. And what of their curators? Four of them looked for their every need, slaves that had built it in a hidden hold under a factory. To be more precise, the factory had an abandoned railroad system that went under the entire city of Newsworth St. It was hopefully forgotten unless one were to count the deep archives which had already been home to such unreliable sources, to begin with. Nonetheless, no one would miss those men, those women, those beings, even if one occasionally had a child, this was for the greater purpose humanity was meant to serve. A small town, no, a bigger one that extended to the very depths of their minds, past the most inner succulent substances of information and memories they bore in their rounded misshaped heads. It was fantastic, glorious, this arrogance, undone. Sheif, was the name of the traveler, who had come from South Arabia with much of business and a dream never to return to the sandy pit where his parents and every generation before him ended. He walked past a crowd and wondered at a sight, two interconnected towns that were separated by waterways, with nothing but a bridge going through. From the looks of it, with the many people around, there wasn't any problem of having to settle in. At least, not since the day before, when he was asked for. 'Would you happen to be a regular, sir? It seems to me that I've seen you around, at least once or twice.' 'No ma'am.' He said, with a somewhat shaking voice and a dialect that was anything but local. It surprised him just how fast he managed to grasp it, with not only much ease, but no difficulty at all. Even more surprising was the fact that the transaction went more than smooth in the recurring days. One glance at the storekeeper, the name Eileen popping in his mind. She had somewhat of a drenched coat, looking as if she had waited for someone in the rain. 'I wouldn't want to intrude, but what might it be that you're doing with a wet coat inside?' There was only a hidden kind of laughter, soft and almost sharp and mad, like some coyote or hyena. He must've missed it but that coat wasn't on her anymore. Something else appeared to have crept around him, other than this. On the way out he had gone all wrong, stepping on stones or a road of some sort of glass, perhaps being disturbed by some people who appeared deformed by sight or rather only for a moment had it passed. 'What's going on here? Who's playing tricks on me?' 'Don't be vulgar now, we wouldn't want you to have an accident, not at this time of day, would we?' Two hooligans lay just waiting around the corner. No one in the crowd appeared to have noticed or even cared to pay any attention to them. By the air of familiarity, those two had followed him for some time, even to the point of having flashed a knife or two around him. 'Well, what's it to you then? I've got nothing of value on me since I only take what I need.' 'So be it, stranger, you'll return what you bought and pay us in return.' 'Do what my bud says now or we'll gut you like a fish and serve you to your neighbors, there in the dunes.' That had been much more than outrageous. It was a mad cry of a fight, from which there wasn't any escape whatsoever. He would either have to fight or knock. Returning back it, he went straight to the counter and muttered something. 'Is there a phone around?' 'Something's the matter?' 'Eileen, was it?' 'That wouldn't be my name, sir.' There was an awkward pause that wasn't pleasing nor was it any help whatsoever. 'Some men here made me a deal, I'm either to return what I bought and hand them my money or else.' She waved a hand and looked past the window. Two slithering fellows laid across the unlit street lamp and pretended that they were doing something which they should've been into. 'I think I know those two. Common scum, going around and terrorising my customers with petty insults. There's no need to worry about them.' 'But they made it so I know they mean business.' 'Don't worry, here. Sheila, keep the counter steady for a moment while I head outside."Just a moment, ma'am."The second lady had taken her place and apparently, as he was being led to the exit, it started.'You don't have to do it, I'm sure they'll leave me alone if I give them what they want.'"Don't act foolish now, there's no way they're going to leave you alone after that.You can't be that naive as to think they'll leave you alone after you give them what they want."Isn't it worth the risk?"No, now keep going that way until you hit what seems to be a dead end. There isn't, just take a right immediately after, trust me on this."Though he didn't even get to ask her name, Sheif went along the path she had sent him to, seeing how there wasn't any way for him to be seen. A wall lay blocking the other side, making him think of the point this entire side of the track and whether or not there was something about it. If there was an exit, someone could snick inside and do more harm than good, especially during the night.'Just make it to the dead end, she said then immediately turn to the right.That should be easy enough.'It didn't appear that it was to be something with much sense, though no one was following him any longer, while he still had everything at hand. He paused at the dead end in order to look around. A wall thick enough lay in the front and at each end. No secret entry, no way to go, nowhere to run, at least not unless he turned back and tried for it. The bricks were placed almost too perfectly in a way that they wouldn't even allow the most experienced hiker to get a hold of them.'She tricked me."Yes, she did..'.Answered the man while making way with his grunt. They were both closings in despite seeing that this wasn't going to be much of a fight. Not now that they both have a pair of bricks inside their hands, brought especially from a farther place for this special occasion.'Well, have you any last word before we go ahead and grind your skull to death, buddy?"Let me get to my house, I promise I'll be able to repay you in exchange for my life."No, no, no, that's not how it works no longer.You had your chance and you've chosen to flee rather than pay us what's rightfully ours.'He had already dropped his bag and got down on his knees, desperately pleading for his life.'Please, just let me go, I'll promise, you won't see me anymore after this. We'll strike a deal, everything I have for.'He was silenced by the far end of the brick. The strike had managed to inflict enough damage that some of his teeth had flown out of his mouth and managed to land somewhere in the dusk. The door behind the small shop opened and from the looks on her face, she was just as surprised as he was.Shocked, rather, to the point of being too afraid to move and help. He was then pounded by those two fiends, though not before there came the chance to call on the authorities, who coincidentally lay just around the corner. It was a mad act they had pulled, that they got in time to witness that happening, for, by a mere slip of a moment they thought of disappearing into some unknown point in space and hide themselves inside the walls.Those two had been known to delude the authorities by some means.'Stop right there, you won't get away with it this time.We have you surrounded and red-handed, scum!"It was too late for the man on the ground, judging by the looks of it, had most of his ribs laying open from the bashing, not to mention that the skull had almost been completely flattened. Despite having two guns paired and pointed at them, they dared not go ahead and throw the bricks. Instead of doing that they had them on slowly recede towards the ground as they readily accepted the surrender.'Get down now, or I'll shall open fire.No funny stuff now.'Slowly they approached both of the smiling men, knowing there was something up with the way they acted. It would've been far too easy, at least if it wasn't for the fact that they started to succumb inside the ground in the same way one would if he were to jump in a puddle of marsh mud.'Shoot, shoot, aim for their legs or knees.' The voices came from behind.By the time the others started unleashing pellets of pure fire at them, it had been late.A soft blow or two but they were already in their place, looking at the ground in surprise to find that there wasn't anything to it. No secret passage, nothing of the sort. 'How could this be, partner? Are they some kind of wild demons sent here to terrorize the people of this town?' 'Oh, they are demons all right, but not the kind you expect them to be. We'll catch them, trust me, we'll catch them all right. There's not the least of doubt about that.' Finally, they were getting to wrap up, seeing how one was left there to watch over the corpse while the other made it for the phone in order to call for backup. Meanwhile down, under what seemed to have been a small cave, as there wasn't anything other to get through, both of them realized that it hadn't been much of a plan. 'We've got nothing but a bunch of groceries, cheap at that and none of the green.' 'Shut up you runt, if it weren't for you, we would've had him by now.' 'It wasn't my fault, you're the one who scared him that way, and she's to blame as well.' He pointed at the wall, as rounded as he was, going in a random direction despite not knowing where she might've been. By now at least, walking with an apple for each mouth, they realised that there wasn't much of an exit around. 'We'll have to dig our way out.' 'Later, after the day comes, I'm quite sleepy now, aren't you now?' 'Wouldn't you know the clock then?' 'I would, wouldn't I? After all, between us, I am the older brother and I was left in charge to take care of the two of us.' 'Just lay there on the pillow.' It was an inconvenient pile of stones which lay not so far from his head. Most of his feeling inside the body was dead though, so there wasn't much complaining. The sea was rather clear, or might it be a lake now they neared? It wasn't clear or as wrong that neither of them had the same dream despite being as connected as they thought they were. 'Well, well, what shall I do?' Such a body had he received, much slimmer than his own, younger as well. He tried going with his small fishing pole-blade attached, but there was a tall ladder, at which top there laid a mermaid watching the other swimmers. Despite such warning, his pole jumped out, bouncing all around the ladder, being entangled before getting on the ground. 'What's going on down there?' 'I'm sorry ma'am, but it's my fishing pole, it just jumped out of my hand and started jumping on its whim.' She looked directly upon it and climbed down, dangling her fishtail left and right. It was a tight fit with each stroke of the tail, but she came down and inspected the thing. Much smaller than she expected and no sharp-hook attached had disturbed the design. 'Why is that you have it now?' The mermaid asked while going on to pull some of the strings out. Looking at it now, in hindsight, she managed to pull it out, leaving nothing but a hugely formed knot while the pole being the only thing that was caught by the string. 'I can't undo this knot, and I can see why.' She took a good look at his wrist and noticed that the pole had always been attached to his hand. It was a mystery how he had it tangled in her post for the first time. 'I'll need some water even if I could think of something, but not of this kind.' 'I can make some, just give me a chance.' The man rolled and almost spoke in his dream, being pulled into the sweet fragrance of deep crimson with blue. Such a marvelous sky did more than pull his attention on them. But it came to pass that he did as he was asked to, placing his hands on the sand until he made a small puddle. It was a misdirection of the fact that he made it far too close to one of the legs upon which there stood the ladder, but it was welcomed nonetheless. 'Will this do, then?' 'That small puddle over there? Why it's too small, I wouldn't have my wildest dreams take me to that point where I had to rely on such a tiny thing. Do well and follow me instead.' 'To where?' 'Towards the sea, you dummy.' She might've had the lure of something exciting, contrasting with the beauty of the sea. Never had he been pulled under but kept outside, waiting for this curse of his to be united. For a few moments and after watching what happened to the bubbles underneath the water, he glanced, mostly at her as she came back. Something about her beauty and the fact that she had a fishtail made him want to be much nearer. At least more than undoing this curse. I could do nothing about it, trust me when I tell you this but I'm unsure of what could be done."Oh."Do not worry though, for I managed to untangle everything, everything other than the one tied to your wrist.'As he grabbed the fishing pole blade and noticed how small it had become, he realised that it wasn't anything other than a small grabbing wooden handle which was attached to his hand.'I'm terribly sorry for that, but I believe that it might've become a pole because it had too much room to breathe, you know?Since that string was holding it far too tightly."Why, thank you.'He said while rolling around.It was a sweet dream, the sort which brought him happiness and a smile. Not unlike his brother who found himself stuck in the building, walking down the stairs and looking for something which had lain around to jest with. By the time he was at the second floor, he leapt to the bottom and found out that both doors were locked. That of which lay behind it and another one in the front. Everything looked right outside, but inside, it wasn't.Not after judging that there were a lot of bottles filled with some sort of liquid, abandoned on every floor. Since there wasn't anyone around, he started going to each floor in order to check what was wrong with them.'Is someone trying to play with me at this time of day?I must inform you that I've got work to do and I cannot abide this sort of mockery.' He almost ate his tongue at the sight of a fellow which resembled him. He must've been climbing something between the third and the fifth floor when he first noticed the fellow.'Who are you?Wait, stop, stop right there. I think I know you.'He stopped immediately despite thinking he had reached him.

Despite looking like one another, he hadn't the determination nor the physical prowess he owned.'Are you inside?'He pushed his lips against one another, thinking of what might've been done. Perhaps it might be that his neighbors had a better idea, regardless of the man who shared his looks and the bottles. Now the plants looked all wrong as well, as they were set.I need to get out of this place before it's too late.'Well, I'll make sure nothing goes wrong as I make my move.'Then he proceeded on knocking on the first door. There's no one home.'What the devilish hell, is this place abandoned?I need to get out of this damn thing before something happens to me.'The eeriness of the place made a cheap hotel look like a saint's cathedral. Footsteps came nonetheless.'I may be of service.'The man almost leapt like a stray cat at a sign of a stranger approaching. Not only had this man gotten too close for comfort but he also came from relatively nowhere at all.'Who are you and what's your business here?'I'm here because you called for help."No, don't come any closer yet, I don't know if I can trust you, at least not in this condition."What condition sir, are you not in need of someone to escort you out of the premises?"I'm in need of an explanation."And what for?If you don't mind me asking."What's with the bottles here?They're everywhere and they're making me more than uncomfortable.'A mere mention of the things had visibly shaken the other one. He appeared to be more tense and defensive the more he approached one of the bottles.'They've got nothing to do with your situation sir if you please now, could I escort you outside?Don't you want to leave this place and never return?'It sounded too well to be the truth, and judging by the look in his eyes, perhaps it was.'What would happen if I were to spill one of the bottles on the floor?'No sir, you are a stranger to this place, that would be a destruction of property, even, murder.'He covered his mouth but the words had already been out. Knelt down, he had his hand just shaking at the far end of one of the fat bottles. No brand encompassed any of them, but they weren't as clear as to see what was inside. Such darkened ooze was an anomaly, to say the least, there wasn't any saying what would happen if a normal person would try drinking a cup of that thing which lay inside. But this wasn't a deal of drinking, it was one of murder, taken from the very words of his companion.'Wait, perhaps we could strike a bargain."What's inside of them? I won't repeat myself a second time so you either tell me what's going on or else. "It's another human being trapped inside of it. We're setting traps for them to be pulled inside as we ready them for transport. This so-called declaration didn't make any sense whatsoever, they were so damned tiny after all. A whole human being couldn't possibly be encompassed inside one of those. But even stranger was the fact that the peculiar thing if it weren't for the fact that he was a human acted in a bizarre way when he walked around them. Tell me everything then. Why do you look the same as us and who put you up to it? And no sudden movement. Even the second step he tried taking took him by surprise once he saw the bottle dangling from one hand to another. Each hand now held a bottle. The way I look is a result of me taking off the skin of one of those who were living here. Eight floors, at least of that I'm sure to remember. "Do they all need to be skinned in order for this process to succeed?" No, but it makes us deal with strangers a lot easier than using our form. "That sounded truthful enough. Why are you placing humans in bottles then? We might as well get down with it before going on. "For later study and consumption. "Damn you, were you planning on taking us and sipping us like wine on your way home or something? Sick things, so what would it happen if I were to drop one of these?" Don't, they'll die and succumb to agony!" And what's it to you then?" If even one of them happens to not be properly set, they'll have my hide and store me in one of them as well. Though the idea of cannibalism seemed like a proper punishment for the fellow, there was still more than what he needed to know about the place. He couldn't leave now, at least not after what he heard. If that's so, you wanted to trick me into coming with you, right? You were never going to escort me to freedom in the first place! The creature only nodded at the conclusion. Well. Caldwell paused. Without a second thought, he grabbed both of the bottles and carried them for a ride. Keep walking, you'll have to show me everything else. If there's anyone else here I'll want to see him as well. Other weapons, other things, anything else of value that might interest me, when I say anything I mean everything. Without a second thought, he went ahead and hugged five more pints, knowing that they were humans, holding them in his arms. The creature's skin became pale in an almost unnatural state. Saying that it only removed the skin was a lie unless the skinning involved the pulling out of the eyes, the nails, the teeth and various other visible crevices. Nonetheless, he saw it now, how it oozed as well under that skin. It was the fact that something made it anxious or nervous that it acted in this sort of manner. Well, what will it be then? You either listen to me or else. It nodded. No, you're the one who's going to go first then. As it walked up the stairs, it was obvious to Caldwell that something was wrong with the story. Creatures that stole them, that might've explained the disappearance of the people, but what might've been the cause of his lookalike? A cover-up that might've been the sole reason for the secrecy and the hidden things. What's up with that one that looks like me? Last time I checked, I still have my skin entirely on my sides. Care to explain whether or not there's something wrong with that? There was a speechlessness that bore him nothing else but that flaccid stare. Too afraid to make a move or say anything, he wondered if those bottles were that precious after all. You'd better spill it out or I'll spill them down the stairs. And from what you've told me, your masters. No, well, it's not someone of the sorts. I lied to you, we're not. There came a pause as he lay back from the small acid can that was thrown on its face. From the far side there he was again, the man which shared his appearance. By the likes of it, he had just missed them both by a few inches, especially since a part of the acid had reached the wall. Who are you and why have you done it? He managed to flee before the shrieks of terror even had the change to reign supreme. Poor thing was wriggling on the bottom of the floor, with a piece of the face entirely melted, leaving a form that was almost as tainted as his mind could comprehend it as. A robust thing with many pieces of skin turned to resemble pieces of hair. They attached to its skin, that's how they held the eyes and the various things that had belonged to humans. No, as ugly as it had been with its darkened skin and small entries inside of it, this wasn't something he felt proud of. 'Stay calm, I don't know what to do but.' Even now, it tried its best to reach the bottles which laid in Caldwell's hands. Though the shrieks ended, so had its breath. Nonetheless, he dropped the bottles in what seemed to have been a pointless struggle which he soon regretted. He realised why they were so important after all. The pool which formed a few feet away had the bodies of the people which had been previously murdered and prepared for transportation. By the likes of it, each and every feature molded itself together, forming a moving pool of skin with many eyes and dangling teeth. Such a terrible thing moved its eyes closed and made bubbles in itself. The blasted thing, it could still breathe even now, they all could since they must've been kept as fresh. No thoughts came over whenever or not they could hear or think as such an existence was too boring to count. 'I'll free you all, don't worry, whoever else was involved will pay for it!' He acknowledged that the creature beside him was already slain, a cover-up as it might've been. Like a madman, he came closer and pulled out one of the static plants, which in appearance resembled more of growing trees than anything else. He pushed every bottle underneath until each of them managed to spill the remains of the humans that inherited the earth. While walking on the stairs, he looked mightily vigilant by the normal likes of a watcher. 'I know you're there, don't worry about me, I won't end the same way as you have.' Though looking back on it, that wasn't the only thing he had to complain about. Something wrong was happening in front of his eyes. It was almost as if he had performed a dark sin which came back to haunt him even though what he had done was an act of mercy. Behind, at what seemed to have been that of which was freed became a pair of moving pools. 'Stay back you thing of despair, I have no fault to share!' They couldn't, wouldn't comprehend reason, slime, ooze, something which lived now only to throw the anger at the first one which came into contact with it. And there he lay upstairs; grinning at the top of the image of terror he had created. It was a clean shot where he laid, though there was a hesitation which lasted long enough for him to notice and get out of the way. He waited for something or someone. 'I'll get you for that, don't worry, your days on this plane are gone!' That cutthroat, that fiend, the people didn't deserve this. Seeing how they would have great difficulty in climbing the stairs, he continued whacking what remained of the people. Without a doubt, they had to be free, no matter of the danger they appeared to provide. Even then, with the blunt force that almost ruined the tree, he was approaching the very end, ready to face that one which shared his appearance. There wasn't only one of them who had done all of this, capturing every single one of them. No, it must've been someone else, that thing which still taunted him. At the last floor, from which it threw, bottle after bottle jerked as it was thrown and bounced off the metal railing. Luckily for him, Caldwell wasn't matched. Not only that, but he was so absorbed in this entire conundrum that he had forgotten himself. Even though he lay just there in front of him. By the end of which, it appeared as if there was no bottle anymore lying on the top floor. He had cleared the board, prepared the battlefield, and readied himself to face what he feared most, himself. 'What are you? How did you manage to make yourself look the same as I? Answer me or I won't hesitate to harm you.' His face turned towards what appeared to have been the weapon, the grin having never left. 'You're right, you must've really known me, and I won't be using this to harm you. But I will be using this.' A sharp, long enough cutter to cut him enough to bring him to the brink of death if that meant to be. Desperately, it started feeling himself around. 'No more acid, is it?' The desperation had begun once awareness of the approaching mass began to dwindle on both of their minds. 'By the looks of it, our friends there had formed a bigger pool, you could come here to watch for yourself or take my word for it. Not much of a talker, huh? It doesn't matter, I'll get my answers one way or another, whenever or not I'll have to flay that skin and see whose hiding.' There was something in Caldwell's throat as well, as he glanced down. The truth remained that those pools that followed got together into forming some sort of creature, tall and amorphous. Many pairs of openings with their sharp teeth brought the promise of pain. Even worse would be the fact that there was a chance that he wouldn't die but be chewed to piece in a process that would make him become part of them. 'If I am to die here, I'd rather take one with me before I go. And it'd rather be someone who deserves it. Take off that damn face!' Caldwell confronted that thing. Suddenly, as it was cornered without a way through, both hands tapped the sides of the head. 'It did as it was asked, slowly pulling off the face, until it was ripped off the rest of the body. This managed to rip it off to shreds by the many sharp needles which had the pieces of skin inside of them. Damn it, Caldwell thought, that was the skin of a real man. A real man that looked exactly like him, a doppelganger, a twin brother, or something of the same sort. He had no idea whenever or not it was blind, not with such an aim though. The head was truly darker and hairier and it seemed to have control on the many needles. Suddenly it did more than expose itself, splitting its head into halves to reveal some sort of mass which produced a small cloud of gas around it. The insides of which were nothing unlike the meat of man, having more of a space inside in which there was something written inside. Despite the carved gibberish, he could've sworn that he saw his name written inside. Caldwell, in perfect penmanship. 'Don't come any closer now, I know what you're trying to do! You won't get to use these damn toxic fumes on me.' His plans managed to backfire once he became nervous. The sweet approach of the many-faced liquid promised on being a common enemy. Was this worse of a fate that inhaling the fumes? He had heard of ecstasy and pleasure from something that was earthly, but this might've brought him more. Unless the effects provided something worse than the famed mustard gas. With a piece of his shirt ripped off by the edge of the knife, he used it to cover his nostrils. There wasn't a way he'd come any closer to the stairs and try to feel. Many of them were in reach, with half-formed nails and hands, becoming darker by the second. He hadn't realised that yet, but they had absorbed the one half melting creature which had laid abandoned. It was a wretch filled with gas. 'Stay there, both of you, stay back! I won't hesitate to use this.' The many hairs appeared to have assimilated the skin and were pulled to him even closer by the promise of skin. That's how they were planning on eating them. Looking around on the ground made him realise the ruse, as his lookalike face wasn't anywhere on the floor. It must've been a trick of the hand which distracted him from the fact that he'd abandon such a pure meal. No, those needles were its mouth and that entire humanoid body was covered in them. Even worse than it, now came a mass, a hybrid between what was a human pool of skin, to have become an aberration of sorts, a man, a creature that would show no mercy and no intelligence. Caldwell, having no chance, went to the only door and tried bashing himself against it. While facing that thing nearest to the wall, seeing it still fuming in a defensive position, he came to know now that there wasn't anything to do but throw off the knife and accept his fate. No, I need one last shot before I go. The world cannot face something as smart as that thing, at least let it deal with a dumb thing such as the mass had become. Going on that alone, he leapt with his lungs closed and slashed as deeply in the expose organ as he could. It fell on the ground like a dead man would without twitching a muscle. 'I'm still alive and I've ended you, this cannot be.' He almost came on laughing, if it weren't for the fact that the remaining gas had already entered him and he fell. There wasn't any movement in his body, to the point of complete paralysis. His mind remained whole but everything else went slow. The pain was felt once his head reached the ground floor, but it wasn't enough to kill him. He felt the pain and heard every step. That blasphemy was walking on those needles and worse of all was the fact that his eyes were open and so was his mouth. Soon there'd be a time where there'd be no option but to face that his maker and despair. It seemed like he waited for an eternity and it tortured him to see a dark figure at the end of the tail of his eyes. But it came nonetheless, and it brought the many pointed little feet which felt like a rug sweeping over him, all the way up to his feet. Most of it managed to cover both the man and the dead creature before it began its feast. There'd be nothing short of cannibalism there. It didn't appear to even grasp the concept as it began devouring them both, throughout the remainder of the night. He felt every single strand of hair, pulling him through like small sharp straws, ready to pull him in what seemed to be the most tainted of organs. Without anyone to get through with him during this endless stream of suffering and torture, it seemed to him that he awoke during the night alone. It kept on that until he realised what was going on. My doppelganger, he thought, while doing his best to see through the night. From the looks of it, desperation made him look around for the bile that lingered in the confines of his mind. Nowhere to be seen, he was aware of that. But that man in front of him looked exactly like him, devilishly so, at least when he was covered by that dark curtain and the lingering cold. 'I won't let you steal my body again.' Caldwell came down on him and attempted to smother the other man with his bare hands. He wasn't aware of the fact that it was a dream until he started struggling at this attempt to kill his fellow. 'Let go of me you damn fiend. Just let go of me, you hear?' 'You can't trick me, blasphemous creature, I know what you are and what you're hiding under that hide. You may look like me in every way but there's no way I'll let myself be tricked by your damn lies.' 'Stop Caldwell and let go of me, I can explain.' The man said as he bit his hand. 'His hands had apparently gone over his throat and mouth, nose and whatever other blasted pieces of him he could get his hands on. It was a damn pitiful attempt to smother, but there wasn't any way he'd complain about that.' 'Well, what must I do now?' He asked in a pitiful voice. 'I cannot slay me and if I wait any longer, you'll store me like the others for later consumption.' 'It was a dream you damn blind tool, was that hard to understand? Or did you need someone to spell it for you? Wake up from that damn curse and let us leave this place.' Caldwell regained some of his confusion, still somewhat confused at the idea of it. 'Isn't it the middle of the night though?' 'Look at the clock, mid-past morning at least.' Each of them appeared to have a pair of small clocks at their wrists, limited edition, the type you wouldn't see tied to their hands. 'You're right, but how could that be then? We must've stumbled into some grotto of a kind.' 'Oh my friend, there's so much you just have to remember now, without a doubt, you've no idea just how far one could be from the truth.' And the murder. 'Thank you, Cervantes, I'm in your debt for this sudden realisation. And I'm afraid to say that I almost became your slayer, your attacker, the one who almost shook the life out of your sleeping body.' 'Forget about it Caldwell and let us go and explore this cold thing that seemed to have become our prison.' 'Indeed my friend, but let me grant you this gift of fire first.' There wasn't any word to describe the ingenuity the man had, at least nothing he'd think of once he realised that he had brought a torch with him. The entire small thing was revealed as nothing more but a small box-like which lead to nowhere. Just a small thing lost, perhaps it might've been the interior of a ship or an air bubble in the space between dirt and the rest of the ground.'No escape, my friend, there's no visible way for us to go.'We could face the facts and go either deeper or try climbing until we find a place to come.'Both of which nodded and pondered at the sight. The murder upstairs had already been taken care off and covered before someone important even took notice of the fact. Disturbing the entire city over a damn murder while the other one promised protection, no.'Officer Malloy, at your service, sir.'A few hours after the murder had taken place. It was quite rare for such a thing to happen nowadays.'Sir, there's been.'I've been announced, sit down lad. Malloy, was it? A young man who became an officer, at that age, to follow in the footsteps of his father.'Eight generations of officers, sir.'Good lad, and now I trust you that you've dealt with them as well.'Yes sir, I have.'There was something disturbing about his boss. For a fact, he had never turned around, making it seem like they've never seen one another face to face. It made the lad wonder if he even had one, to begin with. Second of all, though the thought of a hollow face and a body reigned there, something else came to his mind. That man never left the office, he was never seen to eat or drink or even leave for toilet breaks. Unless he did everything which had to be done at night, there wasn't any stable explanation for it. I trust that everything's in order then.'Sir, If I may.'Serious as ever, he was ready to tackle the entire issue by himself, even offer to go ahead and investigate the two murderers alone. Something stopped him from muttering a word once he got up as sudden as he had. It was a weird angle, but he was sure he could see a flatness which wasn't as normal to the man. Something had to be terribly wrong with him, that was the most certain thing he had thought of so far. The thing about it that promised one of the most disturbing aspects of the fact was that there was something missing from the man. Something he couldn't point out himself by looking from that angle, either a nose or a hand. I believe that would be all then. Forget what you saw and carry on, we cannot bother with the things we cannot understand.'Sir?'You've heard me, officer, there's nothing else here to look upon, just walk away and pretend it never happened.'Won't another murder occur because of them? It cannot be anything other than smoke and mirror, right?'He most likely had heard that dark cackle, the one you'd hear from someone who missed a few teeth in his mouth and blew the air to make up for it.'Dismissed.'He was out of there as fast as he could lick his boots. The exit even caused most of the other police officers to look at his suddenness. Even the likes of the men waiting in a row for some conviction couldn't help but stare at him.'What you all looking at? Haven't you work to get back to?'The man stood in his glass office, turned with his back, refusing to give him the time of the day. There was a need to refill his second cup of coffee while he waited for another case. By the machine, there was a bunch of his colleagues, standing as if they were filling a giant knocker together. Still, he leered from where he stood. No one else was bothered by the fact, other than him, though he dared not say a word to anyone else. He must've covered for them if that would be possible.'Hey Mal, anything I can get for you?'Nothing, I'm fine.'Come on now, it's on me.'I already said no, I don't need anything now.'Tough day, huh? Is chief giving you trouble then?'How'd you figure?'Other than the sudden exit and the fact that you've been staring through that mirror for the last half an hour.'Half an hour already?'There were a shock and the carelessness he had displayed by himself. It was late and in case he had missed an important call, there'd be disturbance not only the area where he was set but in the main base altogether.'Thanks Frank, I think I'll hold you on that.'You that Mal, you do that.'His voice faded and he made it to the car. Down the St. street apparently, there had been a small riot which ended with the men and woman who wore their peculiar garments to have disappeared. In the hollow place where they had left now reigned a mighty black spot of ash. There had been a fire, a big one, the type that could've brought ruin in the entire city if came for it to spread. Yet, no trace of it other than the spot was left, a type of reminder. The police arrived, yet they haven't found anything of value and were forced away. Other than the fact that the people from around avoided it, there wasn't anything about what happened. Perhaps the abandoned buildings behind, through which the wind ran through. No one could've guessed that it was no wind but the people standing there locked. It was burning inside through the smoke wasn't coming out. As a matter of fact, not even light came, as their punishment had forced them in. The buildings which laid around had swallowed them whole. Within ninety minutes at least. 'Are you sure we'll be listened to, now?' 'Yes, we are about to be listened to if we show them that we mean business. They can't just walk over us as citizens of this town or as people and ignore our needs. We're so much more than that and they know it!' 'Such arrogance didn't bring anyone anything good. Rather, it made him sound spoiled and touched. 'Everyone will know that this farce cannot go any longer, because of their pride and covered crimes. This isn't perfect, we're not perfect, everything because of this jealousy of the neighbouring city.' 'Save it for the masses then.' 'Oh there'll be time, already, I know there'd be.' At the sight of them, with their coloured shirts and headwears which had been sewn to their red shirts, the various carved signs of their embroideries made them look more like a cult rather than a gather. Were they now? No one appeared to have passed the same street they were preparing in. Perhaps it was that from the distance, their masks looked like giant beaks. And those robes from the bottom looked rather bloody in appearance. Various marks and spiny bushes laid around as well. Every sign that something dangerous was about to happen. 'Just as I have said, once we'll light up our small effigy, they'll be forced to come and look for us.' 'Won't it be dangerous? We could be fined for that, even arrested.' 'No, we'll see it through, we have to. When's the last time you've heard of a murder happening?' The burning isolation brought blisters to the men. None of which died, not stained those suits. Though inside the buildings after the dark, they're faced melted, the spine contorted until they became as long as the beaks they were wearing. Worse of all, they were alive, all because of that damn drive which happened minutes ago. 'Won't someone call the police on us before anything happens?' 'Not unless we act fast and commit a crime.' 'But we are committing a crime right now, aren't we? Arson, public disturbance.' Said another man. In total, they had been something more of a small crowd, looking and listening if not preparing their small effigy. 'I've got a permit for this.' 'But it doesn't specify what you were to burn. Where'd you even get that though?' It didn't matter the fact that it was stolen from the archives, though from the looks of it, there was a current signature and his name inscribed on there. A mastery over the simpletons who didn't know how to respond to such a submission such as he had done. No one bothered to ask him whenever or not the document was legitimate any longer. So many of them were far too busy wailing at the thought of being robbed of their freedom, the second thoughts, the many sobs he heard, it made him anxious. 'Oh, shut up all of you lousy heads, as soon as we light it we'll be fine. No one will bat an eye once we show the permit. Remember, we're only doing this in order to cause as much disturbance as we can, nothing personal to the likes of it.' He ruled his moustache as he looked like what he had made. Everyone stepped back at a flame erupted from under the effigy and engulfed it in a hardened flame. 'Look at it, isn't it beautiful? Could the black smog not be any better than what we're seeing here?' Surely, there wasn't anything that could stand against such beauty, at least not for him, as he thought of it now. 'Well lads, I think, it's time to be prepared for them, for they'll come.' But he had no idea once the gust of wind started pulling in the fire, straw by straw it took the effigy apart before one final burst of flame and fire came to it. A black pool was left behind and before anyone could say anything about what they saw, it was far too late. Their shouts were drowned as the doors and windows opened, while the planks moved apart. It was too late for anything to be done, for they had already been taken inside and showed through the walls and ground. Most of them were on the bottom floor, either looking through the material or seeing the basement with its creaking noises, rats and small cockroaches which dwindled. 'What's going on? I can't see a thing, is this part of the plan?' As the doors locked and windows slammed, their lives were taken apart, one by one. While the darkness and cold provided some kind of comfort, it ended once they saw that the effigy wasn't taken apart. No, it lit itself and burnt the place, spreading to their uncovered bodies as it was promised to be done. Now they made sounds like small creaking birds once people approached the street upon which the black mark had been left. It was a miracle that the fire had temporarily stopped, though its effects promised a long running time. At least, this was to be done in the case of it. 'What happened? Can anyone hear me? Please, someone, help us, we're stuck in here, we're.' He stopped talking once he heard the others. Some of their skin had pushed through the material as it dragged each of their heads down. It was quite obvious that they were trying to talk to no avail, for the pain was great and no one was to see them in that state. Death wouldn't come, at least as promised. 'If someone's out there, please, just spare me, spare me.' On the other side, birds could be heard during the night. The dark spot was mostly cleaned and what had remained of those that had started it still remained unknown. 'I told you we should've taken the other route.' 'I know where we're going, just listen to me for once.' 'Right, like the last time where we ended going up that damn way and waking up at the wrong time of the day?' 'Why are you putting the blame on me? It wasn't as if I wanted to rob that poor fellow and bash his skull.' Said Caldwell with a somewhat hidden grin. The least of which made it curious that he was certainly trying to hide something from the other fellow. 'Please do tell, what were you going to with him? Were you going to offer to show him around? Or what was it you asked of him?' The memory of which still made him sound like a most tainted being. 'It was low, even for you. Worse than that time when you started chasing children to steal their pocket change and candy.' 'We had to eat, you can't complain since you ate some of the candy as well.' 'Right, at look at my teeth then, they're crooked and worse for the taking.' As he opened his mouth, fully stretched, it had become obvious that there was something of a decaying jaw with empty holes inside of it. Not being the worst part of all, there was something more to it. Most of his teeth had apparently grown inward, to the likes of which there wasn't any fixing. 'If a dentist were to see you, there'd be nothing left in your bloody. I see a bloody man there, could it be that I'm seeing it right?' Caldwell pulled him by the near edge of the pass. The street lamp above them had been malfunctioning for days, to the likes of which there wasn't any doubt that they hadn't been noticed. 'He's a drunk as well, see that pint?' 'Why isn't he moving though?' It wasn't that they hadn't seen him walking, though he was a man with a pint, with blood on his shirt, he stood against the wall. There wasn't the least certainty whenever or not he was alive. Not even the slightest chance, as he had thought of it. 'Well, should we at least try for it and see whenever or not we could try for his pockets? He must be knocked down cold.' 'An easier target than that wasn't even the likes of anything they've ever thought of. Might've been a ruse or a trap just for the likes of them.' 'Say, doesn't he look like a dummy?' 'He might have the appearance of something that's not supposed to look that manner. Now that you're telling me, I'll say, only one goes for it and sees. That way if they try catching us, the other one will be left to rescue the one being caught.' 'You're the one with the brains Caldwell, I trust you'll go then?"In no certain manner, you're going to go over there and I'll help if you if something goes wrong."They both peered around and it wasn't the likes of it that made either of them bother. As a matter of fact, that thing that laid there wasn't a looker, he probably didn't even have pockets filled with gold or anything of the sort.He might've been a homeless man, or that blood on his shirt might be nothing but puke. The waiting made both of them anxious to the point of having a short stroke.'Are you all right?' asked Caldwell before trying to walk around and look at the face. There was some sort of reluctance when it came to the fact, but he couldn't fake it.'You're a bloody liar, I know of your little plan, trying to go ahead and avoid taking any sort of responsibility for yourself.It's all Caldwell that, Caldwell there, well that won't stay for any other second any longer. You're the one going.'As he had done, with a glance behind and a fake injury, he tried his best to look somewhat peculiar in his manner. To no avail, as it became even more odiously sure. He'd be the one to walk, slowly whispered by his fellow, after all, there couldn't be a ruse at this hour of the night, no one sane would walk that street without their lights. As he approached the corpse, he bent over to snatch anything of value before noticing one of the most contorted things he ever saw.A pair of blood bubbles formed around the neck, something was cut inside at least a few inches, but it wasn't his jugular. Something either was shoved inside then cut or something was inside.'What's taking so long? Just take his bloody purse and let's get out.' But he wasn't heard, he was busy going around messing around his neck. What he had done wasn't safe.At least this wasn't going to end up well for either of them.Without any warning, the bubbles started popping, to the point of snapping off fingers, liquefying them instantly. Bone turned to mush, skin turned to blood as he stumbled on his back.'No, step away, get away from that.'There was a rapid pair of shooting long straws of blood going in every direction, yet they somehow missed him despite the fact they all flew in the same direction and he was a static target. Afraid of doing anything other than standing, he tried saying a prayer but failed. Nothing would do, at least nothing that would save him from this torment when he needed to survive.'I'm coming.' Said Caldwell, though not a single step further. It appeared that the bloody man had moved, waking up some of the most foreboding of manners in which he'd rather choose to abandon the fellow. Not that they knew one another for that long and the thing of which he looked like him came only because he was in his presence for so long.It wasn't worth it now, he could take him. And as he walked away, he heard the shouts, only but once noticing that cadaverous thing get up on its own and fall on him, leaving nothing but a pool of blood where his friend had been.Heavy breathing forced itself upon Caldwell as he finally found a place of rest, taking that of which he wouldn't be bothered with. There once had been a man following him before he died, but now, it wasn't like that no more.He was a man that walked alone in the middle of the night, touched by something, followed by a bunch of rats, flees and many cockroaches that appeared to have been begging for company.His misery made him accept their offer, at least until a suitable replacement for that man came, though one thing bothered him now. It was the fact that he was followed, by the mirror on the bottom streets, at the corner of his eyes, it was one bloody man, coming to end it all.It made it seem like there wasn't any sound for the likes of him, and as a matter of fact, there was nothing out there. 'Hold in on, you've lost a friend, that's all, it's far too normal for you to care of there kind of things now.' With that in mind, he failed to see another of the pair and walked directly into a blood-stained shirt.The pain he felt when his hand came into contact with that acid filled brought him to his knees to wail. With nothing more to do but weep, he fell again in the mist of the ground, before he could be touched and finished off. It wasn't that there was anything out there at night.But the entirety of the city was now filled with men that had stained shirts, cleaning what they could before taking back any additional gallon of blood which might've fallen off their victims. The daylight had done a great job to wash up most of the evidence of anyone's existence at that point, at least of that creature that cleaned the streets. Good men were lost because they wandered in the dark, as well as maidens who stumbled and couldn't tell where they went. Yet in the darkest corners of the depths there now laid a man alone, singing to himself as well. Caldwell went on with his delusion and how he was sure. 'I knew this would happen, my dream was a premonition, an unholy commission that warned me, I am sure.' He was certain of the fact that something went in his head and happened in reality. Despite the differences and over the fact that he looked at a bloody infected stump where his hand had laid, there wasn't any doubt whatsoever. It must be that way I say it without any doubt whatsoever and without anything contrary to what I say. For that would be as far as he went, going from floorboard to floorboard while he attempted to find out where the owner of this small cramped basement had placed the light. There wasn't any mention of his escape, nor the fact that this place was owned. Nonetheless, there was one tied to a small string of beads, ancient as a matter of fact by the looks of it. Dust, old TVs and well as plenty of not working typing machines that were left there with the rest of the junk the man had brought to himself. Which brought Caldwell to a stop, mostly because of the sudden way he raised himself to walk, ending up in what appeared to have been the inside of the image box which laid now on in pieces. There wasn't any way he could stand on both of his feet any longer. At least, without the proper assistant or another one, he was doomed to have himself killed. Meanwhile, there wasn't any disappearance, no word of anyone missing, not even that report of the disturbance. It was a quiet day in the town, to the point where the sun made more noise than the denizens of the city. At least one of them was clean, while the other city was a slump, a place that was used by the poor, having a stroke of famine and despair embodied in it. From the likes of which, it wasn't as if everything would be well for anyone who entered or even if there was a chance to return. 'Buy a dead child, only a dead child, there's nothing wrong with it, have a dead child.' The words of what appeared to have come from one of the ugliest wenches, a witch of tales might've brought the strongest men fleeing at the sight of her, not to mention the fact that it appeared as if that thing in her hand still moved. A thing laid inside one of the many tradesmen and various shopkeeper, but neither of them was having their businesses inside. No, most of the buildings had been long abandoned by the looks of it. Whatever remained now had been closed, or broken, robbed or uninhabitable because of the tainted smell which came from inside. Darwall Angus had been a student before he decided to step on the other side of the loop and try observing what life had been for the others. It would've been an understatement to say that he was shocked, surprised or grossed by the depravity their humans exhumed from their bodies and in their dealing with the most hellish beings. Dead children, ropes that were ready for hanging, and even in the distance, it was obvious that they had been, if not remotely recent, practitioners of the public execution kind. He decided to approach the woman, nonetheless. 'Isn't that a sick thing, to sell your own dead child?' Darwall asked, without trying to sound in the least pious and as he started glancing, he noticed that there had been plenty of cutlery lying around, some of which freshly used. What could she have placed inside the body of the baby? Something had been, as obvious as it looked, there was a scar on the backside of his head. At first, he thought that might've been the death blow but once he noticed the tools of dismemberment, he had changed his mind. 'Well?' Either she was dumb or hard of hearing, it wouldn't have surprised him by the look of the place. Perhaps it was the manner he had approached or the fact that the sight of a potential buyer surprised her even more than he. But she responded with a pious stare as well. 'But good sir, it isn't my child, oh I wouldn't dare do this to my poor child at home, he's been quite sick for some time. You see, there's nothing much to eat now that business isn't what it used to be.' And what might that be for, what need would I possibly have for a dead child now?' There appeared to be some sort of pondering involved, though not anything of the kind that would justify the taking and why there were some bloody scalpels there. Had she stolen them from a doctor? They looked professional, even the strings attached to the backside of the infant's head, quite something thick and used to hold a deeper kind of wound. Reluctantly though as I were, I asked the poor lady at her stand. 'How much would the infant be?' 'Oh, but as much as you can spare, my child needs to eat now, and we don't accept marks.' The wretch said once she glanced at his wallet. What a terrible thing though, not even being able to pay for his own drawn curiosity. Not that he had already a shared array of grim views from the others. He considered for a moment refusing this mad lady and its mad proposal, but curiosity got the best of him. If she won't accept marks what else?' How about your silver watch then? That marked one on your hand looks as if it could fetch a price on its own, more than this infant that you call would.' Nervously she peered at it, making it seem as if she had glared at it all along. Despite their conversation, no one appeared to be disturbed by the fact that they were having to deal beyond the ordinary. Though even with that he appeared to have wanted it for himself, he'd fit well in his small suitcase which he had brought along. Even the right size, judging by his eye, he took the deal. 'Ma'am, the watch is your and that thing, I trust it'd be fairly packed for the price I've paid.' 'Well, of course, sir, I only offer the greatest of services for my customers and nothing less when it comes to it.' At which she nodded after pulling a brownish bag from her cart. It was a miracle that those wheels didn't work, for her merchandise would have certainly gone away on that road. Nonetheless, she placed the infant and he took it as if it was a bag of potatoes, walking away as far as he could before she managed to change her mind. Beyond anything those people might've thought, it was no silver but a poor imitation, enough to fool only the most common of scum. Not that having to walk around carrying that thing with him was any better. 'Where might I find?' He couldn't finish it but wanted to see for a place where he'd not be disturbed, a rare sight as well as a new sort of concept in this city, but a place had to be found if he looked hard enough. At least, a few streets away from the vendor, with his pocket knife at the ready. With a change of mind and going past the sight, there'd be no way that rotting corpse would enter his suitcase, at least not entirely, not until he saw what was inside and decided whenever or not he would dispose of it. 'Well, it seems it's just you and I in the most peculiar place of this city.' A trash garden, of the most delightful dark exquisite. No one with a fairly working nose would approach it because of the stench, within itself, that brought the thought of the dead even closer than anything else. 'Well, I presume this would be it, infant, I must make sure you will not suffer in the least. I must say though I am fairly sure that this will hurt you even less than what it might do to me.' With a slip of his knife, he cut more than he wanted, starting at the back of the head and going as far as making a line, as deep as almost going to the other side. Nothing inside, nothing in the least, but the skin which was left, the emptiness of which was filled with air, the bones were missing as well as the organs. However she managed to go ahead and make it seem a whole, she was an expert in the matter. But one thing bothered him then, what had she done with the insides after all? Surely, she couldn't have fed her starving child with it? 'No, sleep isn't in my mind, I need to follow her and see for myself.' Darwall's face reddened at the fact and went ahead but found that everyone was gone. It wasn't a sudden disappearance, only that he had spent far too long in the trash garden, messing with the now gelatinous skin he carried in his bag. There weren't any complaints there though since it made it easier for him to carry it without having to give an explanation about the size. 'She can't live that far, could she.' Before he could go on a fool's errand, he was accosted by a man which loomed in the shadows. 'Looking for someone in particular?' The man came out and greeted me, with a queer look on his face and somewhat of a walking problem. 'Well, I was indeed looking for something, someone I mean, she was a woman who was working here, she sold me.' The realisation made him think the man would refuse him any kind of help if he became aware of the sort of dealings they had gotten themselves into. The least of which ended in some sort of bizarre and made trade that only the sort which dwelled in the occult had need of infants, live or dead. 'I know, old granny Sandoval. It's her, the one who stood at that stand right there, right?' He pointed at the right spot which left me not in the least surprised. From the glances I took, it was certain that he was right, it must've been that way. 'Right, can you lead me to her? I can pay you a good price if you keep this between us as well. See, I can't have anyone looking where they don't belong while this matter is between the two of us.' At which request the man nodded, asked for no price and bobbed his head for me to follow. Shockingly, there wasn't any reluctance on my part either as I followed the man through the brush. Now, at least, to be sure of it, there was still the matter of the knife-wielding if something had to happen, which, being the least of my concerns, it didn't. Everything went as planned to the point of having been brought to the point where I had to be, an old decrepit piece of the city only for her, in a courtyard sort of fashion. Surrounded by a pond, a piece of earth on which stood a small house, next to an old dead tree. That mysterious man had left as soon as he had made his appearance, leaving nothing but a trace of whatever path he might've taken before coming there. 'Sir are you sure it's her house, sir?' Not only was there no response but he was also afraid he might wake up the wench. Just a look since I am here, he thought, what else might it happen if I am to glance inside? With a few steps forth, he walked on the bridge and refused to pay any attention whatsoever at the likes of which it was. Let us see now, as he thought of it, a few steps for and he was by the window, brooding upon what laid inside. The dirty thing was laid unwashed for the likes of him to walk upon but he managed to pay the littlest of attention there. What could in the bloody hell be that? As simple as the room appeared to have been, there was something in the cradle. Might've been her child or not, but the creature which was sleeping was standing there, gluttonously fat. Such a devil bore something of a trail of blood upon many of its toes, though its appearance still held something human in it. Worst of which, he had become aware that it was chewing on a piece of a spine as if it didn't matter at all. She had left it there, the wench, the scum. 'Could that be my watch as well?' He asked with an utmost disturbed tone, once he noted the fact that there was something of his tied to that little creature's hand. There was rage, madness, something of a desire to return the skin and take his poor imitation back. Perhaps even do that creature a favour and smother it to death. After calmly thinking it through he went ahead and prepared his knife, rubbing ahead to see if it's sharp. Enough to cut the cattle for when it came to slaughter, as he had previously thought of it. The child wouldn't suffer as long as he was sleeping. 'Now, where have I placed my pick?' He asked himself as if it mattered, over the fact of which he carried it all along with him without ever having it left home. There wasn't any need of it though as he had turned the knob and found out the dreadful thing had left it opened for the night. No one does that, what could it be happening? Alas, it must be the hand of fate which makes me act in his matter. I must deliver the world of this thing, as it doesn't deserve to live.

With a few steps in, as silently as an oak, he had taken the bag and discarded the skin. Already had the bag wrapped itself around the child's mouth and as he pushed it there wasn't any struggle either. Everything went too well for anything of the sort to have itself be made in the way the others wanted. Stopping wouldn't have been a mercy but filled with much of the despair every other man and woman in this city dared continue to torment themselves with. No, what I'm doing here is mercy. 'What are you doing to my child?' The wench yelled and made it through. Before anything could be said or any sort of defence in the matter, I took the watch from the wrist and stepped back. A piece of flaccid infant skin laid on the floor as well as the bag. Before any sort of protest could've come from either of them, he had already fled from the property to hear her shout. Lights were ringing up around the city, reflecting from the old houses as well from the fear he had felt inside. Nothing had frightened him more than this, seeing how he could be hanged for murdering a child. Yes, of that he was sure, that there wasn't any breathing left at all once he was done. In a way, there had been somewhat of a blank expression on that face once there was nothing to be called upon. Death was a mercy, though not one he'd receive in the same manner like the rest of them had planned for him. 'Done anything you shouldn't have, stranger?' There was the same man, laying by the end of the alley, repeating the same circumstance in which they had found themselves in before. 'Yes, I need to hide, please, I've done a terrible thing and if you feel like taking me in, there'd be no resentment between the two of us.' A nod of understanding came from him, yet he dared not go ahead and shout out the fool, instead, he asked of me. 'Have you planned to end the creature's life all along?' 'You knew of that?' I responded, though not as surprised once I realised that there'd be a chance that I'd be closely watched and followed. The second nod sold it in and as he said it, my blood froze and I was ill. Torches were lit in the night, if it weren't for him to be hanged, he'd be burnt alive by the stake. 'Please help me again, I'll reward you in some way, for everything you've done.' As he heard it, he covered his face with a hood and made a sign with his hand. I followed. A need had arisen for me to hear his name, which he had given freely without bearing any sort of resentment of the kind. 'My name is Jacque, but that would be all you'd need to know. These streets will be filled with them and when they come and find out what you've done to that child, there'd be unrest.' No further explanation, as he had seen much of the city light in the darkest of nights. 'Come, is this good, no?' There was apparently a hole in the ground, had he led me to the cemetery now? Nothing was the likes of which he had been aware, not even the way he had believed himself to be. At least, now, he could try saying whenever or not, he could try to listen to the stranger. He had the look in his eyes of a ranger. Someone he could trust him despite the unlikely origin he had displayed so far. 'Well, I guess I don't have a choice, do I? I can see the torches coming but I am afraid, alas. How could I possibly know that at the moment I go in that deep hole you won't cover it with dirt?' 'Do you see a shovel or the dirt laying around? What about the depth of the hole? From what you know, it might be that there might be nothing but the darkest of depths as you go there in the farthest reaches you may find.' The man didn't make much sense of it, even seemed to have avoided the question entirely in a way, though not before proposing the most important part which laid. 'You need to trust me on this.' He said. Ignoring my discomfort and not being much of a runner, I complied with the request and lowered myself into the hole. Lady of luck, oh maiden, how you have smiled upon me for the very first time, it was just deep enough for my body to fit it. No one else had seen me go inside either, and as I lowered myself I had become aware of the wooden board and the blanket he placed upon it. There were some openings for air, as he wasn't as inhumane as my imagination had made him, though they were. Feet ran grasping and the light could be seen through the curtains above. How quaint, it had been, for the likes of me to wake them all, but how peculiar of a situation that they found themselves having a meeting right where he stood hiding. 'What happened? We heard your shouts, I realised it must've been the outsider with his strange ways and curiosity.' Borm was big enough that he might've ripped him apart by himself, which was obvious by the grunts in his voice as well as in the way he spoke. That would've been a man there was no wish to stand against. But as it came, he grasped himself. 'They killed my child, my poor baby, smothered in his sleep. He stole his present and penetrated my home during my most vulnerable hour, oh master, please, he fled away and I don't know what else to say.' No need for that any longer as his hand ran through her pretty little face. Well, to say the least, there wasn't any doubt that the man would have to pay for what was done and there'd be blood and guts flying about. 'No, this man has penetrated our sanctuary and defiled it with his presence and not only that but he had taken the spirit of one of our own. Will we stand here and take that, leaving him free himself from any sort of punishment?' There was a mad cry from the crowd as their voices went away and said no. Pain surged as each voice went, not to mention that he was being paranoid at least. If even one of them were to step on the wood and make the type of noise they knew as a fact to be unnatural to what might've been there, he was doomed to a fate of supreme death. Nothing might've been worse than what he would be set to, fire, hanging, skinned and boiled. His imagination paled in comparison with the voice of that man as he continued. 'We will make many small holes and force our children to eat him alive. They will grow from the pain he had brought to us and to the other he had slain. After which.' The man was interrupted. 'Skin him alive, yes, master, lord of the homes?' Another of which continued by the same length-wave of reasoning when at last he said. 'We could roll him in a bath of salt, from left to right, then burn him with small torches, but keep him alive at all stakes. Or dress him like an infant and force him to be smothered.' Enough of that, there'd be nothing of the sort until I decide what is to be done about that repugnant creature. We will go throughout the city if we must and search every side and every house, every hole and hiding house if he hadn't fled already. He went ahead to make some signs, there wasn't any saying what they planned in whispers. The closest one of those filthy men had gotten to his planks, he became aware of dread. Without thinking it through, he started slowly moving his arms towards the bottom in an attempt to dig himself further away from the place. His nails had become as black as the might've been. If there was even the slightest idea of the fact that he was doing something as absurd as this, it had died out once he realised that more and more of them were walking just above of him. Whilst paying no attention to the sort, he was still not aware of a way to justify this type of behaviours nor the act. There wasn't any way he could tell about what was going on, nor why that thing made him feel so wrong and afraid. But something pulled him deeper in the bowels of the earth until he stopped. For a moment, covered in dirt and misery, he looked over his head to see that someone had pulled the carpet and the plank. It was the same man who had promised rescue and refuge. 'There's something I'll need you one day in exchange for what I've done for you. Don't forget that you have slain an innocent even though the circumstance haven't demanded it, don't say a word either for I have watched you. A favour for a favour, do you agree?' 'Yes, whatever it takes, just take me away from this damn place, I cannot spend another second here, being hunted by those barbarians.' At which, they shook hands as he was being pulled, a pact being made between the two of them. For as long as it had taken he wasn't in the least sure of what was to happen to him if things went on that way. But the man in front of him proved as being his only chance at survival, as he took it and ran with him. 'Well, what's going on?' Darwall looked confused after being led by the stranger to what appeared to be a faceless man, something as disturbing as it might be happening. He stood in a chair waiting, in the middle of the night and without a sign of moving or being alive. 'Wait for a moment now, I need to make sure this goes well before we carry on.' Even he appeared to have some sort of secret, in the way he moved and peeled his face off, to reveal a boneless concoction which bore of the plastic and hay instead of skin and cartilage. With a swift move, he placed himself on the other body before fainting on the ground. 'Now we are safe to go, come on.' They had reached an old abandoned warehouse, seeing how there'd be no safe way to have him out of the town with everyone looking out for him. It was in there that, once the heavy door slapped closed, he realised that there was something of an inhuman strength needed to close or open it. No way anyone looking out for him would be able to get through, nor would they think otherwise. I had to ask, what was exactly happening in this old abandoned warehouse? 'What was here delivered?' 'You may not believe it but this town was once a jewel.' As he said it, he brought some kind of light, faint, only for them to see what was around. I wasn't going to mention the entire exchange of faces, for it wasn't the least of my concern, but at least this was interesting and exciting. But alas, all had to end. 'I believe you know why I have called upon you here, as there's no other way you could escape. There's something in this warehouse which I thought it to be perfect for you in every way.' The size matched, the height, the bulk of the body and it almost seemed real. 'You want to pull out my face and place it on that?' He immediately nodded at that. 'But what about that favour of yours?' At which he smiled, once it was revealed what he was after all along. 'Well, I will be taking your old body for my experiments, that's all, without a constant supply of clean and fresh subject I wouldn't be able to reach my full potential, I'm sure of it.' 'Let me understand, I am to give my body, but won't they recognise my face?' 'No, that will change the moment they connect, you'll be almost like a new person, able to walk freely across the town without having to be bothered by someone seeing you. Yet another stranger which looked as if he stumbled in the wrong place.' 'But the new body, what are the consequences of using it? Will I be a human being no longer? Will I become something of the sort of a doll?' This kind of concern rubbed him the wrong way after realising that he was cornered between torment and this new type of life which was proven to him as a sort of fact. 'You will come here every one year and pull out your face and place it in a new body.' A devilish thing once the word came out of his mouth and as he said it there wasn't any doubt any longer. 'Immortality.' Was the second part of their deal, that of which he appeared to have been reluctant to have told him. Immortality and an inability to change appearance at least once per year, that would be supreme. 'I'll take it.' He said, and with a glance at his hand, there wasn't any pain. Darwall looked below in fear, unable to feel his body at all. He was pulled and unable to think nor understand the entirety of the machination which had taken place nor why his body stood faceless on the floor. From the likes of which there had been a deep cut which left a pool of blood that never reached the bottom floor yet remained in his skull. 'What will happen to that now?' I couldn't help it but stare and approach it. 'Slowly.' He said, showing some kind of concern related to the kinds of me, though having done what I've done would bear no kind of redemption. 'May I? I need one last moment with what I have been before I move on. It's almost as if I spend an entire lifetime with it, just to perish in here.' There were another nod and a grim idea which had taken effect of him. Despite the brilliance of which it sounded, Darwall wasn't the one who had come with it. 'How about we make this ruse, to end things properly between the two of us. I'll bring the body to her for a sort of confirmation to arise and so that there'd be no doubt about the entire idea that you are no longer with the living.'How formal and how quaint that had remained, at least he was sure of the fact that there'd no other way to tell that he could trust the man. He had taken what he wanted yet he made me follow still. With my body in his arms, he asked me to open the door for him, the madman.'You couldn't possibly ask me to do that for you? I could barely even push a normal door, for the likes of me is unable to affect that, I concur that I should be the one carrying my own body. It's only proper that way.' I rested my case and proceeded to have to handle my own body. I felt soft and cold, holding myself in my hands. The blood still held an irregular notice, having not dropped from the bottom to the far ends of the floor, though I was certain of the fact that the man still had a trick up his sleeve. Without a doubt, this entire ruse of switching wasn't going to last, I told him. 'It will if you hold your mouth shut, just let me speak.' He said with the least shimmer of compassion he could've muttered. 'They may not be able to recognise your face but the voice still remains the same and they may suspect that something is off.' That advice I took without having to ask whenever or not it was a well-endowed idea. But I couldn't help myself then, even for the poor imitation, it's what I wanted and I took it back, without having to wait or say anything to him, I placed it back in my pocket after snatching it when he wasn't looking. A crafty thing if I may say, but then and there, the first men appeared. 'What happened, is that?' They were desperately watching the thing and the way it shook when neither of them was moving. As they looked upon it, both of them realised the masterful approach which was used for carving the face off. Though there wasn't any denying the fact that it was the same man they have been looking for, clean clothes and incredibly white skin, the very devilish look even in the hole where his face was. The other man spoke the same. 'Let us call upon the other, we need all to see that it is done.' At which they waited in the square folly for the least of two of three clocks until they were greeted by the likes of them. Hunters, ploughers, men that were dirty and tired from work, who had come for a slaughter, to feed and devour yet they were stopped in their tracks upon the sight. Such as the leader of this feud had arrived, he spoke in tongues and he looked upon this stranger and the other man who accompanied him. 'We weren't sure it was you, we beg for pardon if we may, there wasn't any need to bring you disturbance, please understand.' At the single wave of a hand, he stopped gibbering and looked. 'The body was taken care of by now, and understand that now it belongs to me.' From the looks of which they must've taken the fear, I display like the kind of being claimed by the stranger. It was a long shot, but the idea of pity coming from their eyes hadn't crossed his mind. 'Well, it's taken care off.' Though the wench had come with another claim after the big one had stepped back. 'But master, please, there's no way he could just get away so easily, I say. He's done far too much harm to be forgiven, at least, not in my eyes. He should've been fed alive, he should've suffered, he.' He raised his hand to stop her from talking, obviously having some kind of command or rule over the common populous. 'See that he was punished and tarry not on my time, I've work to be done and this had been more than a disturbance you have caused. Give the order to end it for we may not continue this over the night.' Tension a from both of them, though she gave away just as easily as any other. 'It's all over now, hears me? We can no longer continue with this feud.' Stepping back a few steps, just so that other would hear her, she shouted. 'The feud is over, and I am pleased.' One by one, the lights in the night died and as he looked back upon it, so had their presence. All but the two of them were left there without a mutter, staring at one another until he extended his hands. 'Where are you to take me now?' 'Do you need to know any longer? I mean to take this body as I've said, that wasn't a lie in any other way, but you are to wait until the sun arises unless you want to bring the dark with you back home. Worry not, for I shall take good care of you now, both in the body and in the doll, as long as you remain whole, there's always going to be one standing alone. As far as you're concerned, it will be yours.' After which they shook on it. I've delivered my body to him, seeing how the embrace finally calmed my nerves. Despite not being able to admit it to me, it was a dreadful thing to hold my own body in that manner. Something really disturbing and immoral had me on my knees thinking of a hateful and unfathomable thought where I imagined what he intended to do with me. Now that I was colder and I felt no other need, sleep or hunger, I walked around, holding what appeared to have been my poor imitation of a clock. A lot of time remained to spare until the morning came and there wasn't any way I'd go over his word after everything he did to me. No, there'd be no way I could possibly ruin everything for myself, at least not in the way I thought I would. There was another thing I had to be sure of. When the midnight clock just struck the hour and I realised that I could feel fewer things than before, though more empowered, I decided that a visit would be most decent. In the same house, now that I knew where she lived and what she had planned to do with me, even after seeing my clearly tormented body, I decided to pay her back. With a crack in my belly, I realised that there wasn't any way she could hear me, as I was as light as a feather. After a few steps, already inside, going by and checking door to door, I found her. Sleeping like an infant, quite ironic, that she didn't realise it was I. After all, with this disguise, I only had to open my mouth, but not before I gagged her, tying her as well to the edges of the bed. 'Are you awake now my lady? Does this voice sound familiar to you now? Let me bring our meeting by telling you that I have not forgotten of the entire ordeal which had happened between the two of us, you witch. A pagan thing, I can see everything hidden under your bed.' From the likes of that, he pulled out of it plenty of small dolls and bloodied objects that were of the Sabbath. The blood and the strand of hair were most likely what gave it away, that or the fact that he had found a few teeth and nails, of various sizes that didn't seem to fit her nor her long disposed of child. 'I won't stay long, I am only aware that you tried to have me placed there and I have only come here to pay up the favour, though judging by this place.' He stopped talking once he opened a drawer, from which there appeared to have been falling at least twenty other dolls, different strands of coloured hair, most likely belonging to women. All but one, which was for as far as he was concerned, his, somehow she had taken a piece of his hair and got away with it. Who knows what might've happened if ever she got away with it and managed to have her way with the likes of torturing or scalping the small doll. 'Well, you're coming with me then, don't worry any longer there's be no other thing to deal with. I've no clue whenever or not there's something to be told or done about these things but I say there's only one way to deal with it.' Before the preparation began, he made sure that no one was there at night, no one to see her at least. The entire group which formed and hunted him most likely sapped all the life in them, without having to let go to the most dreadful moment of the night. No one would notice her gagged and luckily for him he had found the perfect thing. 'There, I saw that you have been carrying a car around and I must tell you, my dear, that it's utmost perfect for this plan of mine. See, I am someone with a vision now, granted the likes to live forever, but why do you think I'm telling you all this? Do you know why I'm trying to educate you now?' Without a doubt he nodded from left to right, being as nervous and tired as she had remained. 'Well, for starters this.' At the ends of which, he had his doll in his pocket while the house was burning in front of her. 'They'll all think you died in there, soon enough most will notice and will be awoken, let us go now, there's a long journey and the sun isn't even out yet.' This stride of theirs lasted long enough, to the point of them having gotten to the point where they needed to stand. Needed? That was strange, but it felt as if he was waited for, a group of hooded men, they had to be wearing the likes of suits which dragged down and bore the masks of animals. A boar, a rabbit and one with the mask of a crow, each bearing a distinct mask. In the deadest of nights, he had remembered entering her house and passing a trap of salt which laid on the floor. As one who would remember is now, could it be that this is what she was hiding from? They appeared to have been waiting or to have waited for her to be delivered. 'Are those men friends of yours now? I can't seem to place my hand upon it but something's wrong with them.' Desperately she struggled to get free but failed to do so. Even in her eyes, there was fear and a touch of something which made her take everything back and repent of what she had done. No, it was too late for that, he thought. With a grin, he told her she'd be safer with the likes of them and as he approached, something in the manner of disruption made the sound feel more distinctly sharp. Despite them not saying any word whatsoever, he could feel himself being drowned out when attempting to open his mouth in their presence. Yet they accepted the woman and disappeared in the dead of night. He was certain then that she was never going to be seen again, as well as he had found himself a dead cellar which laid abandoned where he laid for the rest of the night. Their deal had been over that way and whatever happened to her and the house she had lived in, who could say? At least from the likes of this, there wasn't any saying whenever or not they would see one another again, the misery and pain having them forsaken one another. Though in dark, there was a man who walked from town to town, city to city, road to road, until he came abroad there. As grim as it might've been there wasn't any attraction to the putrid appearance that of which it had displayed, the likes of which tainted him to the core. Something clearly wrong with the man as it just happened to have been split into halves which still could walk as they had done in their separate ways. For, as peculiar as it might've been there was something wrong about the world now, which invited the corruption of reality as the people had known it, the likes of which couldn't be corrected. Gardens had been growing flowers, tainted, tall and jungle towers where they shouldn't have been. It was a place where various fantasies got united, even though they had belonged to nowhere else but in the realm of dream. Where the inspector went now, he couldn't tell, there was a case, another murder, of which he wasn't sure. Could it be real, am I seeing this right? One dead woman was standing in front of him, wriggling still with her jaw having been grown and escalated into a horn. Apparently, whatever might've happened to her, it seems as if there was something off, something which had made the husband of the creature shot her in the chest. No signs of a fight, nor was there a struggle, which made the most peculiar thing the growth of the horn. 'Detective, we need you in another place, there's been another case.' 'But I haven't even done going over this one, there's still something I should look after if I'm not wrong about.' 'No, it's been an order from the chief, we'll take care of this.' With nothing but a bad mood, he stormed off the door without the least concern about the case. And as he did so, there wasn't any waiting whatsoever for the creature to be gone, for the blood wasn't the one which belonged to it, rather to the husband. Under the horn and off that jaw, there had been marks as they had both been shot through, at least the evidence of the scene made it seem that way. No, it would've been too easy, but in a moment a room full of cops stood and watched while the dead horned creature walked out the same very door in order to get to that man that left. A more dreadful thing couldn't have been if one wanted to show off what they had imagined in the most disturbing manner. With each second having its body revert back to its truest of forms, a magnificent bipedal creature that almost hovered in the air and as it did so, the skin had become grey and reddened at the sight of the red sun. Something about that managed to make it look even stranger than it might've looked otherwise, not that the bullet holes had done anything to it either. Human weaponry could've done nothing to it anymore, having been using the body of the wife to take all the shots and faking its very death in the eyes of man. This world had taken its home and now it sought only to torment for that was the sole purpose of its race, the designation and the very damnation which had set it apart from others in the vastness of the universe. Nothing and no one dared look at that, for the sheer magnitude of wrongness and peculiarity made it seem as if the creature wasn't real at all. Therefore, men walked around it and seemed to have gotten used to it. Nor had it tried to slay anyone in particular now, not that it might've made any difference whatsoever, but it refused to have anyone suffered until that detective was found. As a petty creature, it felt insulted that the man had given up on it as easily as that. Now that there was a crowd in store, and in the main street, as well as seeing that there wasn't any way for it to fly even higher, it took the previous form, that of the horned wife and walked away. None dared as much as glance at her, being in the ranks of the ugly and having the looks of the poor, oh it wasn't at all related to that deformity but it helped as it walked in the nearest of buildings. It appeared as if the landlord had been caught in a conversation with the least of two women who were discussing the pay. Their conversation hadn't stopped just by the look of the deranged, but it had waited there as if to get ready and ask some sort of blizzard question and have its answer lead it further way. 'Well, as I have said, there'd be no need for you to pay for this that month if we're going through with what I've.' The stop wasn't for her, nor was the roughness in which he cleared his throat. By the likes of that alone, one clever one might've gotten the clue. In a guttural sound that did well to reproduce the speech, the mouth and voice had come from somewhere in the back rather be set where it had pointed itself towards. 'Detective, I need to see him now.' By the looks of them, they hadn't been the type to deal with the likes of the enforcement and the law. Both of which shook their heads in dismissal and returned nothing but some sort of springing distrust as they said it. 'Let us be clear, we don't like you and we can't continue.' Said both the women as the landlord looked just as surprised. In that small opening of time, there would've at least been a hellish strike which would've taken both by surprise, though they'd have to pay later. As it left, there was that mad desire to have him pay, the one who had done wrong above all and dared leave the standing woman there with her small horn. How could that happen to a detective such as himself? Was there no need for help? Where was he if not around? The likes of which, no day off, there laid the casino down the corner, farther away, as one could say, where the rich folk played. The entry was costly, the lights were supreme, and at least there was the smell that reigned, of filthy damn rich. No one made any expenses inside, at least from the likes of greeds which appeared to have brought them well. Expensive drinks at every table, small chips were thrown at each number that's known, cards were played on smaller tables. Poker as well as those dice throwing laces, all but one who looked out of place. It was another member of the cult, bearing a tattoo on his face, red and blue, written all over his body and going at farther up as the far ends of his neck. 'Drinks, sir?' 'No, I'm here on business alone, there's something I've got to take care off.' 'I'm sorry sir, but if you're not here to pay, I'm afraid we'll have to ask you to leave.' Said one of the guards after approaching and taking a look at the strange fellow. 'I hope this would pay then if you don't mind.' The man almost fell apart after seeing that he was carrying gold, pure as it came, in its more purest of forms, heavy as well, an antiquity. From the looks of which almost made it seem as if it was mined by the likes of another and stolen, from the marks of blood which have never been seen, at the bottom of his packet. While making his way, he exchanged a reasonable sum of money for enough chips to last a lesser man through the night, as well as he was asked. 'You name sir if you wouldn't mind.' Christopher Ashmal, it's a foreign name, I prefer being called Chris in the manner. The man nodded and left him to go, for at least the half of hour he continues playing and winning at most of the normal table, though a small hint to the guards around and a couple of strange sings made them understand that there had been intentions which were out of the ordinary. He wanted more than the pleasures everyone else wanted. 'Damn it, the ball dropped on five black again, it's not my lucky night this one.' The man at the far end of the table nodded as he made his way and took every chip back. General consent said that he was a man that might've cheated, though, whenever or not anyone saw him do it was another matter of its own. As long as he kept a clean face, no one suspected a thing, though the house always won at that table. 'What's the story there?' Christopher asked at the bar, having done his best not to look too daring himself. He already came out a stranger, carrying a bag which might've seemed to be heavy enough for two men. Not to mention that there was a look in his eyes which made him want more of what the others had. More than what was seen by them right under the curtains. 'My lady, I am pleased to say that I'm interested in hearing his story if you please. But only after I buy you a drink.' Every slim of attention she had given to the rest of the place had shifted to him, strange tall, dark-haired stranger, carrying a handbag which looked rough enough for leather. 'Is it natural?' She asked, surprised as she placed her hand to reveal how smooth it truly was. By the time she was gone with her hand, ready to make a shift around his body, her drink was there. 'And for the man, a cherry du la chrome.' A heavy drink despite its name, having a small drinking having a thick glass come with it. She was surprised that he was still interested in the man, with neither of them ever thinking of glancing at the detective which both looked out of place and had most likely snicked in. 'Well, they say the table is cursed.' She laughed immediately, making it seem like it was her first drink of the night, it was only that she had waited for someone to share companionship with. As well as she continued, past the glitter and profound distrust. 'They say the souls of every owner who were ever cheated lay in that table, could there be any other thing more ridiculous? Shhh, don't say a word handsome, let me go on. One day where the original owner of the casino had seen.' And the story had continued that way, as he was absorbed by it. And how the man who had founded the place had a stream of pain and bloody ache at the sight of Heiner. He was a local gambler when the times were ill and there wasn't anyone who afforded the likes of what was seen today. A small business for the folk who lived around there and had shared everything else like the rest of the gamblers and the time wasters at the taverns. Nothing to bat an eye at, at least no one who spent more than a lifetime of savings on the first throw or the second view on an ance. But that man was different, reckless, a man who didn't want to lose anything at all, refused to share and became as greedy as he could. What the myth says, if a myth is, is the fact that there was not only greed but jealousy involved in the entire ordeal, to the point of having others planning various way in which they could kill the fellow and get everything he had. As pleasing as that might've sounded, as an end for that rubbish man that kept winning and emptying both the pockets of the staff, he stood away from any drink, he didn't smoke or anything of the sort. There wasn't anything the man he could've been caught with in order to be forced that way, no. Something else laid in the mind, seeing how he was the only one to stay after the hours, people were whispering over the fact that he was gambling with the man who owned the casino himself. In the least order, either they were working together or he was robbed as the rest of them. Though one day, at the end of the shift, when the of them were alone, finally face to face, they stood at that very table, at which everyone seems as to lose, the least being most of the time. Miracles do happen from time to time, even if they're far between. But, that's not the end of him, as he was a lousy man who refused to lose, and the owner of the casino had done something to his own table, just to take care of the bad business he's been bringing ever since. His throws were off and all of the sudden, the man who had won fortunes lost. Time after time, he couldn't let his pride get over and lost everything he had ever won, be pocket money, or his house, the savings and the rest which had once laid in his possession. Everything to one point where he wouldn't be able to take it any longer. 'Please, let me play, I know I've got something else to give, you cannot take this from me. I only know to do one thing, which is to gamble.' The man said in tears, having brought his stained hands while holding on the man as if he had an apron. 'I'd do anything, bet on anything, service, for free, just give me another chance to try and win them all.' 'Would you bet on your body and let me do as I please to it?' That came as a shocking proposal, though the man had an irrationality tied to him at the moment. That was the last chance to do things right and as the ball went and he was ready to defy all odds again, it suddenly flipped on white thirteen. He owned nothing, nor even his body and it turned out that he had been wrong to bet the last thing he owned on it. 'Now that you have lost.' The owner said while opening the bottom grill of the wheel table, which looked closer to the place where the morgue laid and welcomed him inside. As much as most stories might've had any sort of turning point, this hadn't. He complied, always an honest man, even if chances were that he could've accosted and run away. From the looks of which, there was at least a chance, at least until he went inside, where his screams couldn't be heard but his body was no longer seen nor found. 'And that is the reason he's always winning at that tablet? Because the owner had fed it with the body of a man who had won or is it something the owner had tampered with?' 'Oh, not, my dear busy friend, I'm not drunk enough to carry on, if you please.' Of which invitation carried another set of drinks, on the house from the word of the owner himself. The top client hadn't any need to pay for the likeliness of such things, as they had, more importantly, other things in mind. Once she was even more doused off, she continued with the second man, happening ten years later when the power of the table started waning off, the likes of which never carried on more than the span of a few years. It seemed as if there wasn't anyone more interested in the place other than Don Roberto, a rich fool who was seeking the mildest pleasures in which to dwell in. He wasn't a winner nor much of a likeable man, but he had money and lots of it. Not to mention that the casino hadn't been doing well in the least for years, without customers and all. Yet, they dared charge, especially someone with an ego as big as the man who would buy himself a star. 'I want eighty drinks of the highest quality, I've got a clue that I might be standing here for a while.' 'Right away sir.' The look of which, he had given all night to what appeared to be the oldest decrepit table of them all. Though most of them shared the same age of construction, it appeared as if this one was different. Something about it, made it age really bad, the likes of which brought the thought that it might've been alive and kept on a tight leash with nothing to spare too. 'Owner, what of that one over there? Why does it look like that, why are you keeping something so ugly in this place of beauty.' Though it wasn't the richest of places, there was beauty, which was undeniably so, from the likes of which no one could've said a thing. Again, the mere pleasures of the common tables did nothing to satisfy that dark urge which made men come and throw away their money. Case and point, he waited for the hour, hearing the rumours of the owner and what was going on. I must warn you of the consequences in case you want to return, we could do with another man of class into the world. Nothing is worth losing your body or soul against.' Though even with the warning in mind, there wasn't anything undoubtedly going to stop him from going ahead.'Without a doubt, you've held this speech before, but I am not the common gambler, as you may have noticed. My tastes far surpass everything everyone else wants or needs, this is what I have desired, an experience that would grasp hold of my very soul and fortune.'At which mere suggestion, the owner frowned and seemed to have started the wheel.Strangely, it went on as well as it ever had gone, without having to really put much of the effort he usually had to if one came to gamble on it. Somehow there was a feeling that it knew as well that this man was about to lose his soul in this attempt to feel something.Nervously, he shook it harder, placed not chips this time as the thing was closes but diamonds, refined, clean and blocks of diamonds. 'What devilry might that be sir? I know not if I would be able to call such a thing."I know you would say that my dear casino owner, poor man, what you see here is just a small part of the family fortune, as well as my, as you call it, soul.A bet in order, for I desire to purchase your casino for this table alone as well as to know that you'll never come to bother me ever again about it even if you were to change your mind."An interesting proposal, I know I should look in the least surprised by it, but I must, well.Let's not dwell there and bring the rules, shall we?'As you may have known, the rules had changed in some ways since the last time the table operated. Time wasn't as kind and new attractions were hard to come by, henceforth, there it came, a rule of twelves.'We'll go this way, you'll bet on twelve numbers and see whenever or not they'll come on the wheel. Then, when the time comes, I'll bet on twelve as well and note them down.The person who has a higher number of successful matches wins."May the best man or casino owner win.' Said Roberto with the darkest of grins, sometimes making it seem that he had been faking whatever he was playing in the previous nights and games.They started and with each throw of the ball, it seemed as if the ball was getting heavier.As much as he was tired, there wasn't any denying that the red spots on the wheel had become crimson such as blood, as well as the bones which laid in the black spots. Both of which, the men had shaken their eyes to see.'You have lost the first one sir.' As the middle pole in the middle of the wheel got sharper and danger was awry, he knew that something was about to come of their bet.It went smoothly after, noting down each failure but the wins came at last, though tension had made him dry, in the end, he came up with only four successful bets which had been won.'So, I presume it is your turn, should I?"No, my dear sir, I will make sure that fate had the last one for me, as I will make my bet only on the number thirteen, for all of them.'The madman had tried to sound in the least daring and had everything placed inside.'He won in the end, hadn't he? The casino owner, he must've taken the small part of the fortune, right?"Well, does it look as if this would be the result of a small fortune?' She asked while pointing out the various sculpted marble statues as well as columns and higher levels.In truth, he had failed, time after time, all until the last one where, in the mockery of faith, he had managed to land one of the balls on the number thirteen, black.'Well, it looks as if the casino is mine.' And as he said it, from the side of the wheel opened the inner guts pushing the man farther behind, just to lend him some space to end it.The rich younger man looked in shock as the hairs and grass pulled him closer, not forcefully but as to remind him that a deal was a deal and the table had to be paid its due.'But I've done so much for you, I've cleaned your filth and brought you, men, to play until you've become so miserable, why is it my fault then?' To which no answer less than defiance could suffice.He came at last to the terms and lowered himself as into a coffin. 'It is yours now, but you should know, it will demand of you to give it all.' With those last mutterings, he wailed away into the table as-as the lights died out, so had the night. 'Was he the last then?' 'No, dear, there were many more that were given to the table, but unfortunately, there's no time to encompass each and every single one of them. Not with them snooping around here, standing with us.' 'At least the important ones, it should get closer to the closing hours if I even dare to try.' His arm was heavy and the bag he had brought with him was finally placed down as to listen to her. But regardless of who came to the table and dared continue the tradition, he took on the responsibility, to the point when one would be inclined to believe that the man was cursed. At least from the likes of which no one dared check whenever or not he left the casino after. It was a strange thing for him to adapt, but the man hadn't slept at all, disturbed by the fact that he was trapped inside the place. From which point, if he couldn't get away, he'd rather build his own palace inside. 'Everything he ever had inside of this place?' 'Every single piece of his owned assets at least, that's how it just happens that those sculptures and the floor would happen to be made of marble. Old as well if you wouldn't mind checking.' She said with some sort of feigned smile. At least it was obvious that she had a sense of humour at the fact, that no one dared ask about the broken pieces. 'They're real, some of them, the statues that were made in ancient times. I don't know where or how, but he had got his hands on them. Nothing less for the tormented man.' 'Would he be the only owner of the casino then?' Which was quickly answered to, as it happened that the man had taken care to have himself hanged, from top to bottom hanging in his own bathroom. He couldn't live inside as he heard the whispers, regardless of the nights he spends, feeding it men and animals, creatures that dwelled in the night. He thought he could get away so easily, only by giving it the likes that play in the dirt and runs towards biting its own tail, but nothing could be farther from the truth. Nothing was as easy as that. It was then that the whispers began to torture him, during the nights and during the days, and not only human, mind you. The muffled sounds of dogs barking, as well as the shrieks of cats ran through his head, despite being of the highest rank they were still not proper to be fed by the table. 'What do you want from me now? You are being fended and surrounded by a palace. Yet every time I look at you, it reminds me of the fact that you are ugly and decay if you're not fed in time. I cannot spend more time with you, in this place of sickness. Have her now.' Robert as his real name was, had lost his accent in frustration at that point, having to deal with the meagre thing and with his nerves were all taken care off. With a few people hired to take care of the inside of the casino, he made some adjustments which included many chambers not meant to be seen. Nothing hidden from the staff, but most of the doors were locked. And in the most uneven room, which had the likes of which dug into the ground and dirt, there was locked the table, never to be seen again, waiting in a room so dark. It was only after that moment when Robert had taken his own life, with an instant snap which claimed his life. 'Do you wish to know the worst part of it?' Well, it just so happens that his body was never found, other than a few toes and a piece of the rope which was bitten off, they say it claimed him as well as everything else. It works on the greed of man and punishes it, to the extreme of having him eaten to the last ring of gold but stop at the fingers and toes. That had been the faith which was spoken off and which remained for a while with them. The owner came, the owner went, they found out and it was a closed case. 'So, it ate every owner before the current owner, would that be correct?' 'And every man, woman, child or animal which dared be brought to it. You should've seen the man who came with the monkey to throw the dice.' 'At which hour, most of them had already left, leaving nothing but the closing hour, the two of them alone. 'Shouldn't you be leaving them? It's the closing hour after all.' From the nod, she wasn't appearing as if there was any other step she'd take. 'Honey, I own the bar, if that wouldn't be clear enough, there was hope that I would make you change your mind, as each of my predecessors attempted to do in my turn."So what changed your tune all of the sudden?"It may have been the bag of gold you carried, or perhaps the drink or that of which is it in your eyes. Do follow!'He tried at least reasoning with her as well, there wasn't any need for both of them to bet, rather, it would've been easier for them to go by the old rules. As a matter of fact, it could've been more pleasing if they were only betting as a matter of principle or.'Not, in the likes of a haven would I dare not carry on the game it tries to play between the two of us. There nothing I can do if a challenger arrives.Ever since that man dared take part in that bet, it took a taste for it, for everything in which both parties would have something to lose.'At which her life and casino came to mind, compared to which, the cost was nothing to be laughed at. 'But answer me this, if you've fed it as well and partook into the slaughter, how come you are still alive? Shouldn't you have lost at one time or any of the sort?"I have and I had to pay ever since if it weren't for the grace of the other contender. This is what it does to your body if you lose.'For under her robe she held a body of decay, putrid to look at, drooping as well.'It started like this once the realisation came that there'd be no food forever and no man or woman to comply to the high demands. That's when the system of debt had started, having been taken piece by piece and kept alive."This is a mad thing woman, why would I agree to this now? There's no way I would want to end like that as well."Relax my dear sir, for it is only if you lose, and even then you have a chance to live, though the trade is near and repulsing, having to live in this way bring no surprise at all, but misery, eternally or at least for as much as your life goes on.' Sincerely enough there was a hard sharp feeling that made me want to get as far away and not return.Ignoring it, at least until this ordeal was over, there wasn't any way I would cower to some tricks she hid away. There was still the problem of there not being a smell at all, not in the least of the stench that would normally accompany the guts in their way.'We have a deal then, mine against yours, we stand at the wheel, of course.' At which she nodded and without complaint lit the room in which it stood. There was something about the simplicity of it that was the most disturbing aspect it bore, not the promise of death, not in the least the fear he'd end up in a fate worse than it, but what it appeared to be like.A normal gambling table with a short end and a wheel at the other size. The many numbers standing upon red and black never lost their boldness nor the sharpness, leaving only the colour ahead still standing as it had been a few years ago.By the time everything was done, she wasn't paying any sweet attention nor giving her sweet eyes away. She had been trailing off in deep thought ever since I accepted, almost as if she had been inclined to accept her fate.'Alas, are we going to do this or not?"Yes, you know the rules, from what I've been telling you, we each pick ten numbers on the table and.' I had to interrupt here then and there, as something was definitely off with that bet.'Excuse me but there aren't any chips left, nor is there anything of the sort."Yes, about that, I'm afraid that, since you've taken that bet, the tablet had taken care of that as well.'And as it happened, out of his mouth, accompanying a small shimmer of blood there fell on the table enough pieces out of his teeth that would've lasted for eighteen bets or more.'This is sick, this is far too sick to be a joke. It has to be something, something wrong with."No tricks here, only what you've heard and what you've come here for, now if we shall proceed, do place your bets.'As it happened, the numbers had been chosen with a degree of repulsion, having been reminded that by the time there would be food to eat, that's when the pain would come. He couldn't tell but the chipped tooth had been on the far behind of his mouth.Deeply set inside as well, there'd be no repair for that, fifteen. Eight, seven, and other numbers that almost formed crosses on the table.

Without any kind of divine intervention, there'd be no way he could go there and get where he needed to be. That spot where there would be no way for him to be defeated. Though it came. 'I've taken the first one it seems.' 'Beginner's luck I say, I've seen your play before, it's nothing more than a child's own damn guided try.' 'Spin the wheel again then.' 'With it, there came another one, a piece of him which had been lucky, enough for strikes and lucky numbers to come one after another, win after wind, first four and a loss. Two more wins and a break, alas, there had been seven and three more to go.' 'Feeling afraid now? I think if I were to win to this, I'd go ahead and sell the entire casino to a lucky fellow. Perhaps I could even be pursued to sell the table or destroy it.' 'Don't speak of such things yet, fool, there are forces now that won't give you another chance in case you fail the bet. Do not anger it either in case you still wish to survive.' Though the warning waned and the table had been touched by something, as well as those words. Next three were lost, but with six ahead. He wouldn't be dead, no, not with what was done, not that now they changed placed where the tips of his teeth had disappeared. 'Wait, I haven't taken my teeth from the table, I swear it.' 'There's no need for that, as you've been aware by now, the table takes anything it wishes to without having to ask for anything.' At which she seemed to have pushed her hand into her mouth and started pulling out something with the barest of hands. Whenever or not it was a real tooth, there was pain involved, especially after when she broke it into pieces and threw it on the table. 'That would be more than enough, tooth for a tooth as they say, not spin the wheel and make sure you don't fail.' It felt smooth at the tip of his fingers, seeing the sharpness of its highest spire and how a single touch made him bleed away. 'No, not from there, but from the base, were you raised in a barn or something?' 'I'm sorry, I was curious to see if it's sharp.' 'Don't tempt it for more unless you want it to have both of us, as it appears like it's been angered by something in the likes of which I'm sure you'd know.' 'I understood woman, there's no need to continue reminding me of the manner, I know, just have your bets ready and let's see.' As they went ahead and saw to it, despite the anger and the losses, there were wins and many tosses of the luck ahead. 'I can't believe me.' That is what she said at the end of their game, from the likes of which, it did appear, that for the first time there had been a draw. 'What does a draw mean then? Are we both going to die then or what's bound to mean? Perhaps it's time for another game.' 'No, I've got a bad feeling about this, don't make any sudden movement yet, at least until something is decided.' That of which was soon to come, at least when the point came and they had been both almost taped to it. From both ends of it came out the extensions which had been sharpened despite the ends, from the height of which it would've been enough to cut both of them in halves. Though it stopped right at the last second and waited. 'What's going to happen now? I can't seem to be able to take my hands away.' 'Don't you get it already? We're both bound to be cursed now, bound to this earthly place until someone else comes. It's time that something is to be taken from us as a fee.' She said with a curiously gracious voice. Looking down on it, from the insides there came a hand and as it started, there wasn't any way there'd be a stop as the others followed. A sharp piece of wood came from inside, which was to be wielded as a butcher's knife. 'No, I can't do this, it wasn't the deal, don't do this, stop!' The man shouted, trying to fight against his captor, though as they extended outside, in full view of the hands, there came the heavy noise. 'Detective!' He continued after seeing the man break down the door after a single attempt. The sight didn't take long to make him understand what was going on, with those things coming out, he pointed his revolver at them and emptied them. Only to be drowned by the mad cries of the owner who looked at how the table released the man. 'Wait outside, now, and don't make a move after.' From the looks of which, those hands retreated back inside, leaving nothing but her standing, with the meat exposed. 'What have you done, detective? You have ruined me even farther, now it has nothing else to fill the gap.' 'I don't know what's happening here but you're to come with me to the station, immediately.' Despite grabbing her by the arm, there wasn't any way for him to get her off. It felt as if she was nailed to the thing and from the looks of it, those weren't hands which were coming from there. Not any longer, as the small puff of smoke revealed something thicker and more shapely than a pair of fingers. 'Stand back!' With her having been faced the other way, he gave a few shots only to see them deflected off the carapace it held around. There wasn't going to be any stopping to that, at least she thought. With tear she realised now that there wasn't any other way, it wanted to take something out of both of them to even out the bet, but now, since one was taken, she was to be taken and to die. 'You cannot help it any longer, I'm going.' 'No, not yet, wait for me here.' With a striking dash, he was out of her room. What unearthly things she saw under that smoke curtain, only she would know or be able to tell. Else, someone else might've seen the least monstrous but humane, she saw only the most terrible of images which bore through her head. The sudden motion made her shudder. The detective had found out the axe and had come dashing in a rush only to bounce it off after a strike. 'I told you already, there's no way out of it.' 'How much do you want to live then?' It was a curious question and even more confusing that he would ask for it. As a matter of fact, she had wanted nothing more but to live, but looking upon the alternative, she made the motion. Something under her hands held them there, to the point of being no escape. 'It's settled then.' He said it with not any sort of feeling of content whatsoever. As far as he came, it only took two good swings for her shouts of terror to arise. That act he had done left her on the floor, to be comforted by him as she cried and flailed around, seeing how that of which was hungry now had to settle with nothing but a pair of hands. As they walked away, she had passed out, whatever showed underneath wasn't any of his concern either. No fear stayed his hand, but he was certain they'd meet again. But only after she'd be taken care of at the nearest hospital which ran. 'Wait, don't take me outside, for I would most certainly be putrid and die.' He looked shocked despite what he had seen and done and realised that without the proper care she'd die anyway. 'No, take me to my room and bandage my arm away, see how the bleeding stopped? Can you even see any blood left behind any longer?' He saw to it that in the least of sense, she would be safe, now that there wasn't any chance that she would die, sitting on her chair as she usually would. 'Top shelf, there should be an IV and some bandages there.' Rightly so, which were in the least clean. The detective still sat and wondered just how was the woman still able to stand on her own feet after what happened. Regardless, she asked. 'What about the other man that was with me?' 'I'm afraid he ran away while I was busy trying to get you out.' 'Not any kind of acknowledgement came now, especially since she was planning that to happen to either of them only to take care of a damn table.' 'We have to.' She said with a bitterly drunk tone. 'It's what keeps this place afloat, or else what do you think pays for everything? The bills would be enough to make one shudder only at the sight of the power used.' 'Why not sell a statue or something? There must be another way than pulling people in at that.' 'There's no way I could give up on any of the things around there, a woman needs to have her diamonds after all. Come on, detective, would you really take the last pleasure from a woman with no arms and nothing to offer?' She looked at her lowest and felt worse than she looked, that was the main idea of it, at least. He wasn't as concerned about anything else other than that. 'We'll have someone come in the morning and take the table, without any argument. If what I've heard is true about the rumours of sacrifice that go around.' 'Detective.' 'No, there's detective in here, I'm talking to you as a human being. People around talk, everyone knows what's going on behind the bars and what not. The only reason why I'm not taking you or that thing immediately is that I have the courtesy of seeing that you are hurt and in need of assistance, nothing more.'The blanket and the water weren't requested, though he wasn't lying when he said that. A little jab at her, leaving the cup on the table, but it was rectified immediately.'Here, drink and keep your strength up, we'll have a doctor come up to you the first thing in the morning. I can trust you, can I?'You saved my life detective, you can do whatever you want and I wouldn't mind.' Something was wrong, especially with the look of defeat in her, a blankness of her own soul.To be more precise, it was something foul.But he left her there and went to his apartment that night. Through the night he wandered, from, nightmare to nightmare until in the rays of light had come and he almost slammed through the doors.'Wake up, we need to go.'A call was made from the public phone, announcing one of his colleagues and some type of physician.'I can't thank you both enough, let's see.' The doors of the casino were left open and had been left open during the night. How could I have forgotten about this? She was all alone after the accident, with no arms and no way to close it or take care of herself.If something happened.'Something wrong?'No, we should head in and see to her condition.'As the three of them headed in, making up for what appeared to have been the longest short run in the building, they both found the room she had been in empty.'Check for the other door, that's where was attacked.'I found something.' The man replied, but neither he nor the physician were ready for the sight which had to be. A mark left by the feet of a heavy table in four corners so it laid. From end to end a pool of blood, toes and pieces of her hair.'We'll have to call it, any suspects that had been the previous night?'There was that man that accompanied her but he ran away, there must've been witnessed that saw both of them during.'That's enough, we'll take care of it properly, just sit out of this for a while.'Such a sound might've been welcomed, but he swore he heard those whispers coming out of the wall. He's right, this place is getting to me, he thought.Edward shuddered only at the fact that he was forced to stand aside despite being the one set to the case, to begin with.Though that's how it happened and how her body wasn't found, having the casino pass by to the nearest of kin, a young man of the sorts which came from far away, visiting the town. Both a curious happening as well as dumb luck which had found him with such an inheritance which would last. On his way, at least he stumbled on a fat robust man, with what seemed to be a wooden hand.'Take care where you're walking you, dumb kid, I could take your eyes with this if I wanted to.' A bold thing to make a threat in the midst of day and surrounded by men, armed men to be more precise.Some of them had been officers, other soldiers, but they dwelled around, even to the point where he realised.At which moment he thought to himself, better stay my tongue if something were to happen and end up myself sleeping under daylight, walking at night. Don't avoid them either.'Excuse me for that young sir, it was my own fault, now that I think back on it.' Still no response from the young man, who must've aroused some mockery in a stare.They knew him well, the ones that came and went by.Some of which watched his every moved, weighted every action and each turn. Most importantly was the fact that he was alone without his brother, who'd normally be his partner in crime. Caldwell could do nothing else but keep his whining and complains to himself, as they'd most likely fall on deaf ears otherwise.His demise had been at the hands of his dead creatures and now he had no brother any longer, at least not yet. Not for long, just you wait out there, brother, I know I'll see you in one of them and bring you back. That awful man thought, at least from his point of view, this behaviour was somewhat justified.'Well, are you going to stand there silent or move on? I can't remain here and do all the gawking while you're to stand this way and glance. Go on then lad, move on before someone bigger than me comes in your way and blows you off.' With which there had seemed to be a falling between the two of them as strangers. The lad had disappeared like an arrow in the inner bowels, leaving Caldwell alone to wonder how he came to this point in time and into this strange place.' Mysterious Gwakxes.' One peculiar name if even must be spoken out loud from a holy man or the equivalent of such, it was enough to make him feel estranged and afraid even at the sight of what was inside. Small gadgets and many artefacts, some of which were of value, the only problem with it being that there were too many witnesses and the entry was forever open, at least until the closing hours. So much so that the strange thing was that the men had brought their children inside as if they were treasure hunting, good enough for them, but how expensive and what had he owned? Worst of all, he was unsure whenever or not this was a great idea, to go on and attempt something which would bring him harm or set aside this time, especially since he hadn't a brother any longer. Well, I could at least try.' Out of the way.' One was already shoving to get through, though luckily for him he was in a good mood. At least this was certainly so, from the standpoint of being the way he's been. 'I'll wait no longer then.' He said it with pride as he strolled inside. Of course, his pockets were empty and dry but he wasn't a holy man, but a crook, a creature who'd take anything it wanted. There laid one thing after coming inside, which had taken his attention. Out of the cheap imitation and the toys that might've belonged to the children rather than the real stuff men used, one of them laid aside. Farther into the guts of the room there laid what appeared to be a functional looking hand, the right size, of bronze, painted in a pallid disgusting green of some sort. Despite not realising he had entered, there had been ten minutes since he was inside and stared at the thing. More of which would've passed if it weren't for someone to come between them and block the view. 'How may I help such a loyal customer?' 'What's that?' 'I asked you, Mr Ascott, how may I help you today?' Caldwell knew no Mr Ascott, nor had he cared to know, despite having known plenty of names and faces, that of which never matched his look-alike either. He shook himself and went ahead. 'Right, I've been looking for something to cover up for my recent loss, as you may have noticed.' He had to put on his best act, straightening his back, looking somewhat taller and stronger by the second. An aura of refinement almost surrounded him now and there wasn't any joke to be told about the sort of thing. 'I've noticed that sir, a terrible terrible thing, but I'm afraid that's only for the show, between the two of us.' He approached to whisper and went on. 'I believe it might be cursed, trust me on this one when I am to tell you that you don't want anything to deal with. If I were you I'd have one custom made or a hook if that would do you any better.' 'No, I will not have anything lesser than that, of which I've seen. You will either sell it to me or I'll have to find my business elsewhere.' The man begged in return, not wanting to lose what appeared to have been his best customer, having wept over the very idea of him leaving. 'Well, I guess I could be coerced into going ahead and letting you do what you have to do, after all, I'm not the worst kind of creature there is. But I still want and I'm still in desperate need and put it on my tab while you're at it.' Nothing less of that pompous attitude that he left the place free of charge having taken the glove, some jewels, a blue hat, a bunch of small bags which were filled with pebbles, a yellow scarf and the most peculiar belts which had been strapped around him. Neither of them remained useful and as a matter of fact, other than the fake hand, he looked like a jester which had taken way too much time in his quest to look the silliest. Most of which were quickly abandoned at some laughs and banter by the nearest watchers, being in the closest dump box in which he had dragged one of the larger lads and snapped the cord out of his neck. Somewhat the hand appeared to have worked especially well, to the point where it even moved and acted on his impulses, some of the time at least. I could get used to this if this ruse lasts for as long as I think it would. With that of which he grinned at himself, trying to glance at desperation, realising he's bound to supreme damnation. That reason alone made him think that he had become a magnet for the worse of things to happen to a man, such as which a stature of himself wouldn't be affordable by the common thing. 'This is the greatest thing I've come on brooding.' So he thought once he realised what had happened before, this moment when everything dawned and his idea came to life. It was important to know that not only was his issue of being one-handed fixed but also the fact that there were chances of him going ahead and grabbing a hold of a new brother. 'But where might the man be then if not hiding from the sight of the common man?' No one seemed to pay any attention, though the sudden noises coming from the horns made him be sure that standing in the middle of the road wasn't the best of ideas. Again, he moved on and grinned, having to look at every expression and see whenever or not anyone recognised him as a gentleman of class. Bah, the same old view of disgust against my own person, even the disgraceful evil eye threw at me from a passing lady. One would need to find a place with greater class than this, but first, the ale, to wash upon the great mistakes that were. So he went from tavern to tavern, from the most expensive where there laid some recollection, to the oddest of them all, wasting what else he had of his savings while he thought and brooded on it and passed. The abandoned church which laid aside, no one entered, afraid that they would die. Despite the stories, from the outside, it was taken care of, only so it would seem as if there wasn't anything wrong with it, other than the fact that the entrance was forbidden for a reason or another. It pulled on those who came and were afraid, that of which something spoke of ill and fell into the decrepit state which laid inside. Whispers which weren't uncommon, the creaking place where three children entered after the entire ruckus on the mountain street at ten o'clock. Of which there were Charlotte, Myers and Jones, walking down inside the church. There were some steps, first to go before everything from the first floor fell into the pit which laid below. Unable to return not even the slightest attempt to climb, they were stuck in that place. 'What are we going to do?' 'Stop yelling Charlotte, we'll find some way out, or at least some adults have to come and rescue us from this place.' 'Look.' As Jones pointed out, there seemed to have been a door, at least, one which still worked. The only problem was the fact that it seemed to have lead to another level down, which only brought the risk of them being crushed alive. 'Can we risk being crushed by that?' Now, he pointed towards the ceiling and from the looks of it, there was nothing worse than the wind pushing the roof back and forth with such ease. With enough power and now that there wasn't any stability, they were doomed to descend only to find that there had been a set of twisted stairs, a secret room that wasn't meant for the eyes of children or the common man. They had been forked and went into circles than in a mockery of walking back and forth, going down into it. Dirt laid on the floor, tall doors, from which a knock, from a compulsion. revealed one giant hairy creature, that immediately pulled each child inside before there was any chance of a reaction. There wasn't much that they had seen as the darkness of the unlit thing made it even worse, but now that it lit a candle it appeared as if it lived inside a root. Such as the wood had given it away, neither of them could say anything on the matter for they were afraid of the particularity this thing seemed to have emanated from its every pore. First of all, dwarfed had its body become now that there wasn't any supply of height his house had. Most of the body appeared normal if the conditions were right, four legs, four arms, the thing being set aside that they came out of the chest and back. From the front chest, a partially formed goat, counterclockwise of which there laid a thing that resembled a human speaking, the face of a weeping hound and in the back, there wasn't any daring to say what was happening. Most of the extras didn't seem to do anything or to say any sort of word but lay flaccid as their master spoke. 'Come for dinner? Just in time.' The man now spoke for the creature which laid in sight. From the chest of which opened to reveal some sort of amorphous substance that emanated even more light than there was in the room. The likes of which appeared to reflect the matter out of which the entire universe was made of, making it a veil of stars that ran through, from which he stretched and jammed a pair of fingers and pulled out dust. It sprinkled on a pair of well-done meat stakes and placed them at the tables. No forks nor knives, the children were silent but they each sat down while staring at it. 'My companion is soon to return and we are yet to wait no longer, for when you first came and knocked on my door I thought of the worst of time he came to bring upon me the presence of things that I so long desired. There was a knock at the door at last, but they were in no mood to make a move, not try to run. 'Stay right there, I think that's him, ready to surprise me at last with his long-awaited presence.' He said with the least amount of conviction one would have in his own words. At least, it was concluded that it was indeed something unexpected as it turned to reveal from behind. That face that laid there, out of the three of four which laid even lower, engraved in the neck of the creature, this one was the strangest. A crooked nose and what appeared to have been at least multiple pairs of eyes carved and painted on the wooden face it had. From the looks of it, there wasn't anything holding it together but was set there in the strangest fashion known to man. In a way, it seemed as if it had grown and those others carved in the neck were nothing short of the buds which were to grow ahead, pushing forth or pushing in, though nothing might've hurt more than what that promised. 'Well, it seems as if I was right, my dear guest has arrived.' From the many pores and way it floated, and the might, the size and how that body looked, rather rotten, this was to be their fellow guest. 'Charlotte, come, come.' With the woe, they made her sit closer and come before the odd thing even came, for it might've taken more than a few seats as it came inside. 'From that round white body, there came nothing but some sort of device from which it appeared to be pulsating inside of. Most of the many white lumps were pushing back and forth as it waiting to be fed some more despite the fact that the dinner hadn't even started. From behind it, a pink-like fashion of it could be seen, though neither of the children dared approach the lump, nor touch it. For, neither of them had any idea whatsoever from where it had come from or where had it been. The likes of which no one was sure whenever or something could've been done about their own conundrum. 'We have to go on with the dinner, it's the only way he'll let us go.' Whispered Myers to his two adjacent colleagues. He looked forth on escaping, at least to the part when they'd be as far as they were from these strange seated creatures. That of which ended quite instantly once the stew was brought, from a big cauldron he had kept inside some hidden piece of movable wood inside the trunk. No doubt about it, to say that this place had as many secrets as they came was some sort of an understatement. 'What are we eating then?' Charlotte asked with at least some sort of glimpse and a shimmer of the smell. Despite what he looked like, he might've been a great cook. 'Pig stew, only from the finest lot.' The man on the side responded, as the goat-like features in the front contorted into something of a smile, which hadn't lasted as long. 'Why, I would like it for a child to appreciate my work, for I am pleased to call upon myself the title of a great, no, grand chef, a maker of many delights of the sort.' He bowed and curtsied, from every side and every face, though the man was still sullen and the hound still wept, at the end of which the last face showed little to nothing, pure indifference. 'Now, a bowl for you my dead, one for the sir, the last one for a grown man as well and we'd be done.' 'Aren't you eating with the rest of us?' Asked Jones, as suspicious as to wait, as he had in the least of manners to wait for the others to be prepared.

They had brought big bowls, the kind of which were almost as big as the cauldron in which the stew was made in. All of that for the two of them seemed to have been quite enough. Though they each bowed, a motion which was repeated by the still nervous children in the room, which laid closer to that thing there which appeared to have been wrong. One of the small things in which they had been eating had become all wrong, cut in halves, unpure, stricken by something which wasn't supposed to be. It was one of the small bowls which were cut into halves and had become part of the table. 'What have you done you, dumb child?' Shrieked the creature furiously, while the lump remained passive and seemed to have absorbed a lot of the food with the help of the apparatus. Despite the inconvenience, out of the three of them, it looked most content out of all. 'Well, I must say that I am going to have to ask you to leave.' Said one of them, though it wasn't the man. From the sound of it, those words weren't spoken but rather whistled at the children as they tried making their way out. 'No, you stay and you as well. Only one gets to leave now unless one exchanges places. But for what you've done, there's nothing to be undone. You have only a few hours to fix your mistake unless you desire us to devour our friends.' Jones nodded at the creature and appeared as if he had been too fearful to remind himself that there were other people in the room with him. Even worse than that, he dared not say a word or mutter, hadn't dared try making for a run but simply walked out of sight and stumbled into the dark. 'What am I to do, what am I to do?' While he spoke, the door close and their screams ran through. There wasn't any way he could've missed that, not a chance, though he desired to think less and act, as he climbed away from where he came from. Still, he couldn't do the last thing to get farther above and escape, as there weren't any object that would do. 'Help me, someone? Please help me, I'm trapped in here?' So he said, though no one heard the call of distress. If one would have to confess of the likes of hearing the shouts of a child, no one would come into the affairs of which they were dragged inside. That thing wanted something which wasn't there, but what could he do or give instead? While returning down, he realised that there must've been some way for that lump to have arrived inside, and it wasn't through the front door which they've used. Another entrance, another place through which it might've gone through, at least that would've been the easiest way to get to the thought of it. 'Well, let's see.' Jones as he went back in, through the veils, closer to the door at first. Eavesdropping was no way he would treat someone who got them to the dinner, even if it was what it claimed to be and looked as strange as it did. But there was something strange, once he heard his friends still there, laughing at something which was said, perhaps they weren't in the danger he thought them to be. Even if they were like that, he wouldn't just walk away to abandon them, no, rather, he'd go ahead and make the kind of preparations which were needed while they enjoyed themselves on his labour. 'We'll see for some guests to take your places.' He said while going on a wrong turn. To say the least, there was light now, moving into their high floating towers, that of which revealed so much space as he had never seen before. What he now walked upon were the most tremendous of stairs which laid on an uneven path, back and forth going as he ran. Without the least of stability, he watched as if from the towers, the slightly transparent legs moved back and forth trying to hold the balance and interact. Such lights were strong and mighty, coming from above, which made it even worse to think that those might've been their brains if they were really the creatures Jones thought them to be. Well, there's only but a way to find out what they truly are, but I won't risk it until I find someone to replace them. I think. His mind was altered, he wasn't young, his brain confused, no longer blind. It was a mesmerising experience to walk there, even further as he realised that they were chanting there like monks. A strange word he had never thought himself of forming, the various cults and many secret doings which gather in his inner sides. They made him watched as they continued their march. From the sight of which it looked as if they had taken liberty in going too farther with their made hole, as the houses above might've had no stability whatsoever. In the case of an earthquake, there'd be no stop to the endless misery and destruction, for which he wasn't there nor did realise as he came to where he needed. One lonely creature, sympathetically laid where he needed it to be. From the looks on which there wasn't any doubt that something happened to it to stand on this synthetic patch of grass. Much of its body was already formed and looked heavy, solid formation, two-legged with no arms, almost grey if it weren't for the fact that there was a pink contour around. There was something about those who came from here, that of which he couldn't understand, might've been because the lack of sun which decoloured them and made them looked unnatural or from any other source. Most importantly was the fact that it seemed to have a big round body, flat at the top, with many layers strapped upon one another and a mouth which came from both below and above. Many sorts of things came from both the underside and from above, speaking horns mostly which made mostly sounds. At first, coming one by one it appeared as if they were there only for play, but when at last they played the tunes together it finally made him understand. 'Greetings, you were calling?' 'I've come here only to have two guests take the place of my friends at the dinner, nothing more than that. I couldn't say who called you.' 'You have, right now, and I accept.' There was a marvel in that but still, one of them wouldn't have been enough. Not to mention that the sort of friend that had to choose between one of them would be nothing sort of the lowest that came. 'Follow me then, we still need one as well, there's no telling what new rule might come or what he might do if I only bring one.' In mere seconds he retracted all those pinkish horns and got up to follow. There had been some difficulty to regain whatever time it had waisted not stretching nor moving, but it regained in the least composure to follow. Well, at least as much as those things brought the lights, as well as they, were slow. 'What are those things if you don't mind me asking?' There was the least of a shimmer of difficulty in the way it needed to stop to get all the horns out. Most surprisingly was the fact that it knew english, at least that way in which it spoke was fluent and much farther than aware of what he had been saying so far. Without reluctance, it followed deeper through until they finally reach the danger of the flooded bottom. There wasn't water down there but a murky thing of moving dirt that went solid then wet again. Such a thing made them stop at every second, being slowed, it was no wonder why they walked as they did as well, even with their height and the size of their legs. 'This will take forever and I'm not sure they'll have that much. I've got no other choice but to return at once.' With which he went on ahead and made for return, having been turned from time to time to see whenever or not his companion still followed. As he did, he was sure that at least one of him would return with him and help. By the time he arrived there, Jones knew it might've been too late though, something truly made him feel like those creatures couldn't be trusted any longer. Could this thing be trusted either? It was worth the short, at least if it meant saving one of his friends, in the most probable way. After opening the door it was surprising to see them still sitting there, without a glance of fear but rather a shimmer of boredom in mind. 'I've brought you a guest, now release one of my friends.' Jones demanded, with a somewhat taller stature than he actually had. For a child of his age, he held himself rather well, to the point of having been faced with anguish and defeated it. 'One comes in, another goes out, well.' That mud finger pointed at the girl, in hopes she'd go at first, but it was Myers who took the initiative and had already burst through the door. It was a nice fit for the other one, but not all well for her. Knowing they would both have to return they waved at the most preciously sad face that changed, as well as having been remembered. 'If you don't find someone to take her place, I'm certain that she'll make a fine guest here, with the rest of us, forever.' Or to say the least, until there was the realisation that in the stew there were objects which weren't designed for the human digestive system. The door slammed closed and it had already happened for the other boy to go ahead and look for a way out. How quaint, that he found himself up there, hearing him scream in the same manner as he had. 'No one will hear you there and I don't think we'll reach even with the three of us.' Then why'd you take us out of there Jones? We could've spent the rest of our lives being well fed and part of that thing for as long as we wanted. 'With a sign of the hand below, he reminded himself. 'There's another way to go and I think it's large enough for us to find a way through, but we'll need to get her as fast as we can and run for it.' 'We can't run faster than them, have you taken a good look at the big one? His legs are higher than us placed together.' 'Yes Myers, but he has thin legs and they're placed in every direction, does that sound to you like he'd make a great runner or what? We just need to stall enough and be lost in there.' With as much time as they had wasted in, he pulled his friend aside and explained his plan. It was just as one would've expected, a hay-filled doll, put in a sack, filled with a stone and arms of wood. 'This won't work.' 'It will work, just give me some time to, there.' With another bag, Jones had become quick enough to jump and trap a rat in it, placing it inside the guest's head and seeing him as he shook and moved and acted out of place. This one that was set inside was quite a fighter of his race, as the entire doll almost looked as if it would move on its own. 'I think we should go then, we'll be better if we'll try getting outside and find a way to get her through, rather than try tricking them.' 'No, this will work, I'm sure of it.' With as much hope as they could muster, they made their way down, only to find the door open. The room was lit but even in that way, there had been signs of some struggle and a fight. 'It's empty, where have they all been gone?' With the stench and the trail of blood on the table, the worst of thoughts came to mind, unless one of those creatures bled the same way a human had, there wasn't any way she had survived. 'Come on, we need to go.' Jones had dropped the doll, unaware of the fact that his act had snapped the poor creature's head by the time it reached the floor. By the time they were half-way off the bridge, the light was as far as to say that there wasn't anything to see and chances were high as to fall down there. 'Keep walking and don't let go, we have to make it through before they realised what's happened.' There was an echo as well down there, going as far as to grow higher and higher in intensity. From which angle it came, nothing would tell, though it was obvious that those noiseless giants weren't the ones making it. 'Keep jumping. It gets soft then hard like mudd after rain and dirt in the sun.' It was the best explanation he came up with. His friend did understand most of it, as timing was the key to get through. As far as it went, there was a harshness to this that wasn't to be recognised. With each step ahead, one of them would fall behind, while the other had a few steps ahead. 'Don't try leaping there, it seems as if there's a hole.' At the right moment, it appeared as if Jones had his foot stuck inside, forced in what would've been his final torment now. 'Are you well? Should we return and try climbing to an exit again?' 'No, don't you get it already? Our friend is dead and we are lost, that thing might be somewhere out there looking for us and our only hope now is to follow those things and see for an escape.' Even by his voice, there was something which didn't bode. Tall stalks of towering creatures that moved in such a manner, there wasn't any doubt that the few holes that laid in-between were much of a result of their stepping or placing far too much strength where there wasn't any need for. Such and so they ran and glanced, but no one saw them afterwards. Lost in there, following those things, they weren't heard, as their fate remains unheard. At least the glutton, shocked in awe, missing a line and sleeping next to a wall, for this time it appeared he had been listening and founded another house abandoned which had been freshly painted. 'If only every abandoned house was as beautiful on the inside as it were on the outside.' He said, with as wide as a glimmer as there came, there'd be no one out for the night, that was for sure. For, at least most were instinctively afraid to take their chances and go for strolls outside, no one spoke of what they saw, moving during the night. This time, from behind a crooked door, the shaken windows which were clear, he saw them come from places unknown, dripping on the ground, only to stain nothing at all. Such things had to be dealt with one way or another, even though he was sure it wasn't to be him who did it or would be responsible for that. Much of his problems now came from them, as well, seeing how he was ready to go on about the problem. I'll cut them, smash their bodies with my new toy, have them hanged or boiled alive. Even if they're not alive any longer, I'll see to it they're taken care of, shoved and shimmered into a most peculiar form from which they won't be able to do anything at all. 'No, not again, you foul thing, stay back!' Caldwell shouted as he was taken by surprise. Apparently, one of them had the distaste to snick by the window and be such as an apparition to an old man on his deathbed. It shook his poor heart to the point of having been blown out of his guts and right up his neck. At least there'd be a checking for the things which went ahead and had him well. Otherwise, he couldn't tell what it wanted or why it was that there was such a peculiarness happening between the two of them. There wasn't even an effort, as it came closer by an inch or two. Blood dripping on the window turning in a pure white before disintegrating in front of his very own eyes. Well, must I go on like this and stare? Would there be no way for this to go ahead my way? At least the thought of it was rather shocking, to the point of having thought from the rows of thousands of ways he could've killed that body but neither of which had any sort of reality or usefulness involved. With which was being said, he took the nearest thing, seeing how it had already been one head in the door frame. Caldwell threw it with some might at the top of the window, seeing it run down and behead the creature in an instant, without having time to get those chemicals which helped it melt everything it touched. That body fell behind while the head rolled in, without the least of which it had already taken care to spill itself through the cracks which laid in the wood. 'I've told you there'd be much to pay for you dumb thing which lays dead, now I have a supremacy over your body.' With a mockery of a smile, he spat on it before he took his dark corner and covered himself in what appeared to have been burnt trash, perhaps a door of some kind, anything that would help him mask the sight and the smell. Of course, that wasn't the only thing that bore a kind of resentment towards the least kind of which they shamed. For in the middle of the town they ran, making forth one another after they were done, moulding together into a giant loop which drained itself into the ground right at the hour of midnight. Shouts and smokes, ran from the other side as they had been summoned back, to the other city where hopes and dreams died, as well as the places where the bodies of the men lied. Without them, this torment would last for as long as they would be. Cursed forever to come at night and drag others with them, through the most wicked realm through which they went, as a link between the cities and the damned. 'Well, well, one had yet to, return. Never the matter, we shall make do that he comes back once that of which had made him crawl back outside. Damned things getting trapped at times of need. That liquor of which he had in the various bottles had been parts of their bodies that were meant to be shaken and mixed only in a perfect way. One was missing in the shelf, a sign that was in the least a thing of dread, nothing about which was said. Another empty from a previous night, in which the dreaded thing was meant to bring someone back. Now, he looked at the table with nothing else but contempt, as he had at least achieved something of the sorts in having brought at least a hand back with him. To whom it belonged to, he had no clue whatsoever, but in the least sense, there was something intriguing about that, the thing which still moved from time to time, beyond his control. He wasn't the one who reanimated that hand but was rather aware that the thing of which it belonged had to be something not to be played with. Something about the way it was made as for how it interacted with the other objects brought on the table almost made him feel like it would give his location off. 'That wouldn't do.' He said, alas, with a shimmer of wrath which pushed him in the least off the edge, to the point where the slightest twitch of a finger brought to his attention the utmost thought. If it were to move around and feel the dread, at the grass or at my laboratory, I would be nothing short of dead. Dragged to the depths of the abyss, taken by force to be punished, no. With that in mind and well-spoken, he took a knife and shoved it inside the hand, making sure it wouldn't be able to leave any longer, if ever it had the chance to move, at least not without being cut in half. The effect woke up the man on the other side, who looked upon his metal glove and pushed it off the stump he had. 'Cursed indeed, as you might be, I'm yet to find out what's to be done about you.' With which he fell back as the night was still young and his body needed the rest. At last, of which it was obvious enough, he wanted something others did not. 'No, it's not fair to have you cut this way, forgive me for I have been rash in my decision of having punished you for something your master chose to do.' Grabbing the knife back, he remained well content with bringing a chain and a metal wrist grabber. It was the kind that had metal pins which inserted on every side, having no way to get free, unless the entire hand was to be destabilised and the meat around the wrist broken. With which was done, he went ahead to run his errands, leaving it alone. At nights of which it appeared as if he was listened to and the light got up again. Would it be nothing but a curious man or a thief than entered after the doctor? Stumbling in a place where he didn't belong was nothing but a painful way to inflict pain upon his body that of which he did not desire. 'Come, come, it's safe to come inside.' Three more men from every side looked around the entire place and took every kind of medicine and pills they could find. Without being aware of their ancient expiration dates, the place had seemingly nothing of value, at least nothing that wouldn't spoil for them along the way. In a way, this entire operation was redundant as they found but a hand laying there and peered upon it. 'What could this be brothers? I don't think I like the look of this.' That was more of an understatement as he almost came in. It was a servant of the doctor, standing there, tall and headstrong, with the dreaded appearance of a creature that was not a human. No, something worse about it made it seem as if the creature bore a dread which was unlike anything a human was to look upon, and more parts had always been welcomed. By the time the doctor reached his nightstand, near the bed, he had heard the intrusion and the shouts that died away. 'Damn pests keep invading the places in which they do not belong. A reminder of which to have Corvus's pay increased.' Lights out. Nothing was worse than a groggy morning with nothing to look upon but a standing stump and a glove which seemed to have malfunctioned, even worse than that. Perhaps it was the fact that it worked too well and he didn't realise that something didn't belong there. 'Here you come back now, you think of rust, the lack of sun had done you harm enough but you're welcome to stand in the place of my stump at any time.' That was at least a good enough deal for both of them, as they came to the realisation that they weren't alone. 'Damn, they're here, looking for me.' Words were spoken at a fast, after realising what he had left behind, perhaps the evidence of which might've dissolved but the problem remained with the broken window and the likes of which what laid inside. Stuck inside his corner or trash, he retreated even farther to the point of realising that the same trick wouldn't work again. That of which allowed him to fall through the floor and reach places unknown to him didn't work. Not now that there was a solid object holding him back, that of which he abandoned in order to fall until a place was to be found. Fall, at least to the point of having to find a place to stay until they'll left. To his surprise, this fall wasn't to end up now as he felt like floating like a bloated balloon, seeing nothing but feeling the soft ground harden under him. Despite his initial anxiety which would be to be caused by that, he felt free to move again. It felt somewhat strange now that he looked upon it, but he couldn't swear that he fell for ages before reaching any semblance of space. 'Anyone there? This isn't the place I ought to be now, there must've been a mistake.' Which each step, it made him feel as if he was punished for something, at least for what he's done recently. Out of anything, he could remember came to mind, the murder and the fraud he had committed, not to mention the other things he had in mind. At once, after realising just how overwhelmed by the place he was, he needed in the least a shimmer of attention. 'Anyone in here who might be able to help me now might sooner or later be rewarded, I say. I'm a great man of much worth and let me tell you that in the world above I'm treated with a lot more respect than I have met here.' At which there came nothing, or so he thought until initially, a simpleton had arrived. What a small creature, walking on four legs with its small body, bulbous yet white. From its behind there had been an opening which reflected on the other side, out of which came a pair of glowing balls attached to some larger and longer horns. Somehow, they appeared to have been lodged in there, having to force them in only to make it dark again. Yet his need for help was answered, as Caldwell found himself in awe at what the place looked like. A bit annoyed of the fact that the ground acted in the way it did but continued speaking with the strange inhabitant he met. 'Greetings then, my name, my dear would be Caldwell and I must declare myself as the ruler of the world above, just so you know. By now I realise that you must be flattered by the fact as well as see something in me which isn't supposed to alter what you know or expect from such a great being. With that being said, you shall lead me to the nearest exit and have me freed from the emptiness which looms around.' That of which it seemed to have listened and obeyed, even adding a gracious pair of words to it. 'Yes, sir Caldwell.' Rolling over themselves, they went and stopped until he noticed a most peculiar thing, at least for himself, as he managed to hover just a few inches off the changing miasma. It hadn't happened often but there he seemed to have obtained a mastery over the strange ability, as far as he was as well, there wasn't an inch which reached the bottom. 'Here, you'll come with me as well, now have you only provide my sight and guide me where to go.' With an arm wrapped around, it appeared as if it was surprisingly soft and weightless, deformed under his arm but unbroken when it came to it. He was rather unsure if that was to be permanent, though judging by it, he actually didn't care much for anything or anyone else. 'What exactly is this place then? I do need to say that I'm rather impressed by the actual sight of it, not to mention your presence, you being a formation of strange long speakers and the sort.' 'It's the cemetery.' It said as if there wasn't anything else regarding this place, just as casually as it went, empty and forever moving under his feet.' If it is a cemetery, little fellow, for who exactly is it meant to be? Certainly not for us, being as we may, the small creatures we are, most of the time, after death, lay in small boxes or are incinerated on the spot.' There had been a few cases of which he would've refused to go into detail with, not because of personal shame but because he still needed assistance and what he would talk about had to have the most unlikely result. With a short pause, most likely used to thinking, it came to a supreme answer. 'For everything that had once lived, be it, man or god.' That bore some resentment to it, as much as it could alter the sounds coming from there.

Most likely it spoke the language because of it and how it seemed to have its end made by a human, to begin with. 'Well, then, am I to be placed here after I die?' 'Yes, you are, good lord from above.' In the least of which, we spoke of different things during my stay, about the living inhabitants of the place, for an example. Oh and how we spoke of them, for they were plenty and spread at every corner. Some hid into the giant bodies which laid everywhere, that of which I still couldn't see, rather than at times where our walks turned into distant leaps. 'What about the smaller corpses, aren't they supposed to be seen at least?' 'Those are cleaned if they are small enough to lay in the matter below for a long enough period.' 'Isn't it dangerous for those walking there as well?' There hadn't been a need for an answer even if it was given with immediate care. From the looks and explanation it gave, that pinkish hue over the feet didn't come from anywhere else, something had eaten the skin and gave not much of a chance to regenerate. 'Does that mean you will eventually have crooked legs so rotten that you'd fall and die?' 'That is the man reason we die by numbers here.' The only problem with that being that there were giant towering corpses which had the look of ancient and weren't even close to being devoured. 'What about them? Aren't they supposed to have been eaten by now?' 'No, for their bodies are made of materials too hard to break apart.' 'But how could that be then? Don't you see that hole inside of the knee? You said that the material had been far too strong.' After which there weren't spoken words that followed, not until there were answers which came first, that of which he required to know. As for the giant creature with its hallow face, there seemed to have been something wrong, features crushed as if from a dark fight which happened. One hand placed to defend and as he fell, there came nothing more than a fetal position in which he laid during his last hours. 'It must've been a fight to put someone like him down, right?' 'Someone had apparently taken care to make a living inside of it, judging by the size of the hole, the marks of a fire on the floor, the knee of which was fashioned in the shape of a room.' 'Would this place be claimed, my friend?' 'I do not know.' 'Certainly, someone had put way too much effort to abandon everything they had made. There was even the upper floor which had a bunch of stairs that travelled from one muscle to the other. Someone with a bit of knowledge and some time, as those stairs weren't the rustic, primitive things which one was to encounter, no, they were in the likes where they had been carved and polished. Not to mention that, other than the strange decrepitude which could be seen between the two legs, he seemed to have noticed or heard something there. Upon further inspection, done by him and the company, he appeared to have found another one of those four-legged bumps inside, which had been resting for a while but looked surprised upon seeing both of them. Suprised being a strong word since there weren't enough noticeable features to distinguish any kind of emotion. And other than the larger shade of pink which covered more than half of its body, both of them looked as if they came from the same lot.' 'Would that be someone you know?' 'I do not know anyone else.' By which it watched intently, until deciding to open up and reveal its horns, light met by light, speech by speech, if not a bit humble. 'Who dares invade my home?' 'Your home now?' Caldwell looked around and judging by everything inside, one he had the two of them fully show the room in light, it was obvious that the creature couldn't have carved the room, even if it so desired or claimed to have done. 'I claim that you're not the one who made this room, or anything inside of it as a matter of fact.' Suddenly it turned back to him and quick to respond. 'No, but I have come here before you and I have claimed it as my own.' There was spite in those words, but he dared come closer if anything there'd be more than pain to come if he hadn't received what he wanted. A room to sleep and stay in, safety and peace during the night, if the day was ever to come. 'Well, you'll have to share it for a while then, at least until both of us rest. We're here on a journey after all and we need all our strength if we hope to make it. Such an adventurer as yourself, claimer of giants could most likely be one to understand where we're coming from, right? That hope that we could find what we seek, an escape from spite and a way back to the world outside.' For the first time that freckled white face or opening lit up at the sound of which interest was close to being divine? 'The world outside, famed as it is? That of which I need to see.' 'Would you follow us then and come on this perilous journey of wonder and mistifying traps that need be getting us to return at the first sign of fright?' An adventure that was more called for than the peril which laid in itself, but neither of them realised that the farther they headed, the deeper they came to be. 'It's a deal then.' The creature said, heading closer, in reach with a horned tube. A gesture which was recognised regardless of the creature or man, no matter the species, as they spoke they went ahead and slept. Outside, as perilous as the night had been, the window was fixed, a glove apparently laid in rubble leaving signs of a recent entry, but other than that, there was nought. Nothing in store for the pigs who reigned on the streets and kept everything clean. It was such a clean city that not even the young delinquents dared leave trash on the bottom floor, rather going ahead and picking even the slightest shade which ran among them, smiling at the blue dressed men. 'Oh, what a beautiful day.' Said old Okam, with his pipe in store, watching from a most beautiful concoction of wooden pillars which had reigned in his head. It had been happening for a while, to have disturbances in the fantasy of others, now that he had pieces of stone as his ribs and the view that had been his house. No, the man wasn't looking at the sky, he wasn't even aware if there was the sun outside, other than a glimpse at the windows which were barricaded. Other than that, his face had been split, down to the point where his lower jaw was still intact and he could speak. It was something of a problem that had arrived even since he had ordered his servants away and dared make his own meal. Rather, it was something in that stew he had bought, from either a bunch of foreigners or someone who didn't live in the city. Regardless of who they were, this was a disastrous end. The man had cursed that damn vendor ever since it happened, or in the least, he used to remember doing it a while ago. Nowadays, it looked like he'd given up living of much of thinking having been reduced to something that was far below those dumb cretaceous creatures which preceded him. With that, in the least, in the mind, he was aware of the ability to walk again. A worm of a man, his body was split into halves, one of which moved to the left while the other went behind. It wasn't like the kind one would envision a twin bodied creature which would be interconnected by a set of wires or large blocks or would, but rather, it was a psychical connection. That of which forced one side to bash itself into the wall while the other stood and bled alone on the floor. The pain was amusing or might've been if something of a functional brain was left, though judging by the looks of it, every lobe and every region had been split into far too many sides for anything of the sort to happen. It would be a force to reckon with, now that it regained, at least half of the worm raised. From the top, it might've been a half, but at the bottom, there was something of the furniture which connected with him and gave that disturbing roundness and the many layers which made him so alike. Some sort of resentment was bore towards the other half which had failed to climb by itself and stood there on the floor unmoving. It waited for something, in its own way and since this wasn't exactly what was planned, the scenery changed. At least, for the likes of them, inside the room, there were plants from an already distant place. The bodies of wood had become softer and seemed to have moved. It would be more likely that the two of them were now two separate beings, judging by the fact that one was hardly bready, even halved by whichever reason. Those heavy breaths continued but were much dismissed, with the stars at night looking peculiarly square, the dirt around, and the lost remnants of a civilisation that had reigned there, he went ahead and crawled on as many feet as there were spared. He wouldn't be aware of pain, that of which he didn't know about or that he'd even be able to feel until the other side was hurt. 'Aaagh, aaagh.' There came the rousing, with a glance at the rabid fiends. They were made for the kind of scenery that was there, well-formed, bi-predal eaters that broke their jaws and split them into many sides to fit as much good inside a sack which laid inside their mouths. Some sort of contortion laid inside the bodies as well as it appeared that there had been the second pair of arms inside which moved the body back and forth, keeping the neck from overstretching and pushing other orifices out. Hairy devils with no eyes, no they must've had, they saw him and they made a run. Even with his half alike, they wouldn't be any match for this newly found power, though it seemed as if at their first encounter, though most had the chance to get away, one slipped. It appeared like the body it had suddenly stretched in each direction, legs, as well as those limbs inside the body, the neck and the sack which regurgitate what was taken. It tried as well as it might to move on and reconstruct the body but apparently had failed severely in the process. Most likely reason being the fact that he had arrived just next to it, turned its body and lowered his lower half onto the poor beast, crushing in slowly which he looked. There was definitely some sort of morbid satisfaction on his other side's face, being turned to watch now. Either might've been a mere chance or the doing of fate that he accidentally turned him on his stroll. But now that it was dead, he had better plans, that of which he dragged the other side and pushed themselves together. It wasn't a sight to be looked upon as he had known for certain that the two of them had two ways to go about. Though even with this unification, there wasn't any saving of the brain, each side having to think in its occasional different manner. 'Follow, that trail, we go home.' Said one side while the other used to growl and grumble some of the sounds, which corresponded to some sort of direction. It was dry where they crawled, with difficulty as well, as the stone under them was pure blue of hue and the horizon half nothing of fauna any longer. It seemed as if even those things which lived stood away from what laid around for reasons that were unknown for either of them. At a sudden poke from the bottom, there came some sort of burrowing face. One man would be able to look at it through the telescope and frankly tell that it was a man which was buried in there, having no credence whatsoever. It might've come over the span of millennia when people watched with the help of telescopes or other kinds of watching devices that their appearances travelled light years away until reaching the point of giving birth to them. Some of the appearances were held, though borrowing revealed some tall bodies with hundreds of digging legs all around. One sort of failure was evident now, as much as they wanted to gaze at one another, the two of them had some inches in height over the creature. There wasn't any way any of the muscles belong to the top, from all of which they knew, it might've been nothing but a pattern on top of a hump. Seeing how that being did nothing else to interact with them, it suddenly went back into its hole, never to be noticed again. In a matter of minutes, as far as it went he wasn't entirely certain about what they were to do about the entirety of the whole thing. Nothing else was there, at least nothing that could harm them as they went, other than the fact that they had been trapped. In a few moments, as both of them reached one of the small mud holes, the sudden drop had forced them both to fall in what seemed as if it was some kind of abyss which had no end to it. Down, right through it, awareness forced them to see that there had been various meat-like poles that dug themselves out and tried catching what they could with the help of them showing claws. Sharp nails coming out of their feet made them changed, with the help of which they could most likely catch any kind of prey that fell there. 'Let us go from this sick place, I care not to stay here a moment longer.' The man said, though unable to recognise the fact that he wasn't understood, he went ahead and climbed, using this newly found power for as long as he might, without even caring for anything or anyone in the regards. With a shove and a pull, he took one of the more curious beasts that ventured as far to see what was going and pulled in down instead of him. 'Oh how fortunate we were, it seems, another one takes our place to die withing that damned hole that wished upon taking out very soul and body, making us flee for our lives.' He had a bittersweet tone and a voice that rang for as long as they continued. Long claws were most equipped, it seemed for catching and pulling, dragging and taking apart of the cartilage and skin. The poor creature hadn't any time to shout in terror as they went ahead to the supreme act of torture. 'Well, well, we carry on, there must've been a way to see those holes that lay underground.' As that was said and before turning, what was noticed was the fact that despite the size of the whole, it was instantly covered with dirt again, right of the front of his very eyes. Workers, most likely, specially designed for this kind of task, highly efficient even, that wasn't to say that there wasn't a thing that could go wrong with their plans if something bigger or stronger came. Though that abyss that was so close to the ground, it seemed as if it leads to the matter of which the universe was made out of rather than a deeper hole. It was frightening to think that the endless unknown was so close to him at any time, though the world had become a strange place for the newly made, two Barrowsters. Soon, upon their return, people would have to regard them as two, he was aware, not only that but also the fact that there wasn't any way that they'd make clothes for them, not the kind that would fit them in the least. This size and that, a leap from behind as another deeply gorging creature emerged. It was another one of the previous encountered, which made him want to do nothing else but slowly take it into some remote place and crush what's left of its small head. It was a fine thought at least, thinking about what was to be inflicted upon that. 'Now then, let's make a deal, I'm aware you can't understand me but listen closely and obey. If you let us go we won't kill you immediately, for know this, we got the higher ground and lower body strength, in the matter of which you've got nought against the two of us, bloody dumb beast!' That scent and the way both of them shifted into a stance, made it look as if there was some understanding. Eventually, after minutes of staring and short sided turns, it started fleeing without daring to look back, as if there was any power left in those two legs to follow. That of which now stood like a moving bloated separated abomination now appeared to have stumbled upon something stronger, something worse, that of which seemed to have no escape. Despite knowing everything about the strange plane in which he had been cast in ever since his evening had become worse now that he fell. Without the abyss to end him entirely and as fast as it would come, both of them found themselves in some sort of lair, of which there wasn't any escape. Some sort of observation had to be entirely made. 'Look, it wasn't the workers who reformed the ground, it looks as if it moved by itself, closing and opening like some sort of concoction of meat that only looks most disturbingly like dirt. Just where exactly are we and who belongs to this dark place, I say, let us see for ourselves and never return upon our grim and total escape. 'Sweet, sweet as this place might've appeared to have been, there wasn't any saying just how far the two of them went as it came to the point of going ahead to try.' Well, we could closely try to go ahead and take our chance in there. 'With which he pointed towards the deeper side of the gorge. The likes of which was dark and moving, as far as for the size alone, he was nothing but dwarfed by the size alone, that of which would've done nothing other than to reduce their chances of survival together.' Well, it looks like this won't have anything else to offer us but a chance to defend ourselves from the coming fiend that reigns in these moving halls. 'The kind of which both of them could feel the pressure as they touched both sides of the opposite walls and shivered in their spots. Perilous as such a journey might've sounded, that wasn't the least of their concern, what was needed now as it had always been was for both of them to survive and get as far as they could. Without judgement from the other, both of which went on ahead and crawled through the worst of spots, tight and sticky, as the substance moved. One wall would come closer while the others retreated to the point when fear came of being crushed. As a matter of fact, this was totally some sort of lair in which annihilation would be more of a promise that they have ever expected it to be, of which there wasn't any way either of them could deny. With each step and each falling rock from above, it had become obvious to their eyes that something was feeling them crawl inside. Look, brother? Regardless of what we are now, be it one or two, split into halves or what might it be, can you not feel this room stinging?' From the likes alone, it had become apparent that both of them felt some kind of sharpness coming to their sides as well as it got worse. Some acid, most likely, a digestive sort of protection that was meant to take the most feeble ones and have then slain. Neither of which felt anything more than the kind which was needed. Even now that they had seen, a man had walked past them, in the most peculiar fashion, it must've been that both of them had gone mad, seeing people in the most peculiar manner and the most unlikely places. 'We need to feed unless there's another way to avoid starvation, do you see exactly what I do or are my eyes still playing tricks on my vision?' From this angle, there had become obvious some kind of round, thick-skinned and many-layered pulsating breather. From one end of it, there came puffs of cold air which pushed the dust in every direction, as well as that, might be, there wasn't any telling why or what was the cause of it, but for a moment, that painful acid was blown away out of their body. It was the sort of chance that might've come to the luckiest man alive if he ever were to try. But now, as he came closer, there was nothing else but a notice of the size of that hole from which air was pumped. A truly marvellous creature this might've been, having the pleasure of trying to trap them inside of it now. 'We should feel bad for doing this, shouldn't we? In a way, I feel that this could be either an end for us or for it. Regardless of which I must tell you that I had an utmost pleasure in doing what was to be done between the two of use.' Which was truly dangerous indeed, as a matter of fact, this was to be done in a manner of way which neither of them had ever experienced. The slaying of something of this magnitude was to serve as a uniting motion, as both of them shoved themselves inside. Two heads in already and both of them could feel the density of the air crushing them, though not to a point when either of them was feeling worse enough for the taking. No, they were both still strong enough to resist the entire force, even to the point of breaking, where their eyes saw no more meat, an entirely different thing. Two men tied to their heads, apart, as they walked now out of what appeared to have been a giant furnace and an attempt for suicide, it had become apparent that one of them fell to the floor, broken, certainly and supremely dead. Whatever happened to either of them that morning to have themselves caught together didn't matter, nor how they got the foundry, of which memory was still just as worse. 'What have I done this entire time? My goodness, I must've done some terrible things while letting those damn dreams take over me.' Which might've appeared as the closest thing to an explanation as he could've got. Despite the distant presence of workers, he noticed that the furnace was still on, deeming it that he would rather take his chances now. 'I'm terribly sorry for you my dear if there'd be no eulogy for you but I'm not aware of how many people have gotten into contact with either of us but finding out that I left the premise? With a dead body in it as well? That wouldn't do for anything less than something of a capital punishment, in case of the lawyers failed to achieve their given task.' It was something he hadn't seen himself doing now, especially since he was rather fond of living as freely as he could, with the fact in mind that he was no longer a dumb creature, but a man of worth to both society and the other things it had to offer. With that of which it would've been much easier to strike for something less, something worse, something better than what he had known. He would be someone who tried and failed, to live again as a pure man, one that wouldn't kill any longer. That was the premise he had set for himself, as he went on ahead and closed the furnace, twisting the knob ahead. Making it for the back exit, he was sure that no one would see him leave, at least no one from inside, that until later when there'd be time to retrace steps. Speaking of which, he remembered a flatness which now he had seen through the eyes of the common man, no dirt but stone, a beast was there, that of which he crushed. That he remembered but where exactly? Not that it could've been traced exactly to him and his person but the exact damage was a thing of many wonders then he needed to know what had it ended like. Going by the feeling under his toes alone, there wasn't in the least an idea of a clue where he might've gone. By the docks or to the left, to the public library or any other place, well, to say the least, he wasn't looked upon in the most peculiar fashion as of yet. That was in the least some sort of excuse of happening which gave him an idea that no one saw him do the horrible things he had done. With his outwards look in mind, no one appeared to have paid any sort of attention whatsoever to him. Now that I regained a proper place in society, it's time to see where exactly you've been. There's no way someone picked you up as of yet, not unless someone were to hide what had been happening for the last few hours. If time had even passed the way he had expected it to have gone, which was, in all and all wishful thinking, especially now that he found himself going down some stairs into what appeared to be an entrance to a building. For some damning reason, the man who had created the plans thought it'd be a great idea to make this long corridor for people to walk. Not to mention the mere fact that there wasn't a way to jump over it since half-way through it had become some sort of tunnel, which ran up to the eye's edge. Inside, there had been the lights and what he had looked for just revealed itself, one stray dog dead, but why was it here? 'Who's there?' Barrowster was rather startled by the sound but paid no more attention that was needed. With a rather queer look at it, he remembered one of those mutts that had tried jumping at him but failed and fell right through. 'Marvellous, quite so, it looks as if I was meant to go this way, but where would I end up if I were to follow my stoop?' He wasn't sure, nor safe, but there was a way which laid in front of him, luckily of which was open. Revealing the entrance of an old opera house, it seemed that it was quite fitting that he'd drag the corpse of the dead dog with him until they both got inside and he realised one of the most insidious concoctions he never thought it'd be. The creature, this primitive being was still showing in the least one sign that there was still some life left in it, not that there was a chance with two severely broken legs. Judging by the wounds and the bot flies which had planted themselves, that wouldn't do. 'My dear friend, we're but alone in here, let me light a candle.' With both matches, so he lit, enough that there'd be the light to suffer going through until he found the proper thing.

The opera house looked not a day older despite being abandoned, let alone those ruins and the fallen debris that made it seem as if there was a chance for it to fall over. Yet, it still stood there, ready to entertain, judging from which, someone had been coming to it for at least a while, in which he failed to notice that the rows were filled with many small dolls, rocks, left out heads, that of which were either wooden or plastic. He peered ahead but made no mistake, he could still hear the dog breathing hard, which disturbed him, alas. 'Wait no more my dear for I shall put you on a show.' With which he pulled him by a leg, seeing the body bounce against the stairs and shift uneasily as something might've cracked inside while the mutt was still alive. He had planned on putting him out of his misery, not furthering the pain and disturbance it had already been put to. Anything less or anything other would've been some sort of torture in the darkest of feelings. 'Well, it looks as if we'll have to pick you a poison that would bring up some lesser pain, no injury but a quick death.' From the backstage, as he notices, there was a usable chest, some sort of spike which had whatever meaning or uses that anyone could find in one. Well, as long as this was certain to end the poor thing, there wouldn't be any sort of complaint from any of them. That's what he thought with spike and a chisel in hand, though as much as he wanted to do, this one sort of favour and be a kind of saviour, he couldn't make himself go through. 'Blast it be, that I can't go on, I'm sorry you have to suffer through this but I can't appear to be thinking straight at this time. I know exactly what would cheer you up without having to worry about anything.' With this start, he pushed him off the stage and dragged the mutt to one of the seats. There had been an attempt made by the dog for a quick bite, but that was it, only but a quick attempt which had come to no sort of fruition, not in the least of chances. 'Well, well well, I seem to have noticed that there's still some sort of resentment between the two of us, which reminds me exactly of some even which happened between me and one of your distant relatives. That if you are even related at all, it's hard to talk about stray dogs in the manner of which you don't truly belong to a place.' His voice got harder to listen to as he started going farther way, at least in the time of which he appeared to have paid little attention and cared in the least for the suffering of the poor creature, right under the back of his mind. Had there been any other, it didn't matter, as the man was now busy looking and trying on outfits, marvelling at the treasure they have left behind in their fear of destruction. In their need of escape, he lavished himself into the most sombre of the old clothes which have been used in their previous plays. Rather, it was to be quite obvious that this wasn't to last, for each breath the mutt drew, so had its pitiful life. Before long, he had been dressed in dark purple in what seemed to have been some sort of tight clothes, of which there were the soles of dead rat-rabbits which dragged at his feet and rows. He looked ahead, and bow to the audience as he made his entrance, to repay them with some sort of grin. There had been many rows filled since the previous nights, though that would be more or less important, especially for him, since there was nothing but one special guest in him. Upon which, his return was to be silent and he found a bag of bones, there was a need to juggle, but he dropped them on the floor. Would he have picked them up in any other circumstance? Mostly so, but everyone laughed at the performance, none of which could be forced to deny just how entertaining all the stumbling and forcing oneself to fall onto the ground, slipping on a bone while dressed in the way he was. 'Well, my dears, I must say, for this night alone I pray, that at least one special guest has paid attention. You won't be disappointed, for this next trick will require a volunteer I say.' With the open invitation, he looked as if he had finished making his circle of bones and just in time for the guest of honour to be truly entertained. Looking by that alone he wanted nothing less of what the others had. Well, a good show at last, before the door stopped the bang. As he leapt he had already taken the mutt from one side of its legs and jumped back on the stage, having its place right in the middle of the circle he had made. From that alone, it wasn't like he was going to do anything but watch at first, as there was plenty of time. The slow breath turned into something faster as the hunger could be felt. 'I wish you were here with me my brother, to see what's coming next. In my mind, I've grown fond of your silence, and how you used to look over me but If I might say, there'd nothing that would do in this world, to amuse me without you.' They were desperately trying to break the door, luckily of which he blocked it well, though he forgot the most important aspect, perhaps being the damning one of his entire campaign. That was the fact that he forgot a trail of blood which ran from all the way where the mutt was taken. All the way is just a simplification of the dry piece of something longer which seemed to have run through and through, most of the places in which that was to be taken. 'They won't understand the level of perfection in which this has to be done, not that I would like them to see. But only I and my brother can see this world for what it is, what truly lays below there, in the void, that's what makes this all the while more important, being as a note to myself. I'll have to be done with you putrescent beast and carry on, after which I would still have to find my brother who's missing. Certainly, you understand the reason why I couldn't give you the show which had been promised, that of which will have to be taken with someone of a higher position if wouldn't you mind, meet him in private.' That being said, he broke a bone, revealing a sharp set of pointing edges that would softly run through the back of the head. Surprisingly so, they appeared to have easily penetrated whatever thickness was there, to the point of having been instantly killed. One final damning breath when he realised that he would be caught in the act, not merely for the dog but for the body he had left in the furnace. He was seen. With nothing left to lose, he looked ahead, past the mutt, closing in where dust didn't fall on the ground but into the emptiness which rang from one side to the other, which would most likely go on forever. That of which was the abyss he had witnessed and peered into as he leapt before. This life without a brother and without friends to look upon and peer, could it be worth it now that I am to be caught? That of which he asked himself and answered with no words, instead he let go of himself. Falling through he closed his eyes, by the time of which they had been done breaking the door but found no one inside that day, just the many arranged heads on the seats and a dog which looked as if he was to be used as a sacrifice for some kind of ritual that wouldn't do for any of the common folk. It was to be well, for as long as it remained silent, as this was yet another mysterious murderer who disappeared. Past to the other side of the city, far, far away from where the edges of the grim and the bright met, there laid a crooked old lady with legs and hands which rang the bells, though not in the top, instead, they could be heard below where the world had fallen. One man walking with a few creatures that wept at the sound of the bells going. Caldwell looked surprised, having just barely now realised that they had the ability in them, to the point of being dumbfounded by the mere fact and the act alone with bore him as much of their sadness and despair as he had thought they felt. In a way, he almost had brought to himself a small band which would most likely do whatever he wanted, if word came to a little push in the right direction. He appeared to have kept that impression most of the time they were in his presence, as he dared throw more than a command at a time. 'Go and check that piece floating there in the ether. And you, keep the light higher, I like seeing myself in the reflection.' That of which was at least partially true, as a stroke of narcissism not only did him well but it also reminded him of the fact that he had a brother which looked exactly like him. Such a resemblance was rather uncanny, to the point where he almost got deceived by it. If only it weren't for the fact that every few seconds it disappeared, that being worst of all. Never the matter, as he still hovered above it for some reason or another, though his little friends did not. 'Help us, master.' Came to his ear, and Caldwell turned with a shocked expression that did more than change his mind about them. Me their master already? Could it be that they have recognised me already as a being of higher worth than I actually am? Just in what circumstance have I found myself into and what would I have to do to keep them on my side? He asked himself with the grimmest of grins on his face, twisting to the point where it almost looked as if his upper half of head was to be cut in halves. 'Yes my dear, what exactly is there a need for at this moment? Do you want something from me now or must I go ahead and carry on as if I misheard what you've said?' 'No master, but we are in pain, we need to stop going as far, as we need to rest.' By the time he spoke, the third one returned at all of them looked disappointed, if that was even possible to read from their variously strangely faced expressions. 'Well, what do you propose then my small fluffs? You're just so tiny and so light that it seems to me you are to ask for my service as a carriage of some sort.' 'At least until we're safe.' With which it ended saying master, if not a bit reluctant than the others, certainly more to the point of being much more aware than any of the others. More clear was the fact that each and every one of them seemed to have prepared for this, having tied their long horns from one end to another, it seemed like they were ready to be picked up and used as backpacks. 'Well, if this is what you desire, maybe I'll be convinced towards accepting your request, If I may say a word.' They listened in content, just as he picked them and placed them around his body, with their light bodies holding no stray and facing towards each direction their both ends looked at. With no other discomfort, they continued in this manner, which was more than enough to earn their trust. Sooner or later, they will serve me in the world above, let me find just a way out, he thought, at least before he was stopped. 'Wait, did you hear that thing which ran among our ears? Must we not cower at the sound of a creature that's unlike anything other we've encountered?' As he asked, they became alert, going, by the way, to twist in every possible direction until every single corner of the area was at least seen or peered upon, sniffed or looked eye to eye. Such a thing wasn't to be done but pray that they weren't to be attacked as they heard the groan of something big. 'Is there something other which lurks in here?' 'Maybe somewhere deeper.' A thought that could do more harm alone than any other thing in their heads, which individually had already reached their own conclusions. Each of them had formed abstract thoughts of the organism which had emanated that sound. It had to be huge, for starters, one of them having peered too much at Caldwell to the point of imagining the creature as having a similarity to him. Large and toothy, but with his face and body, with the other two as well being moulded inside of him. Another one of them bore some sort of thought that it was the remaining side of a giant which was animated and somehow brought itself to life to carry over and hunt for what they've done. Third of which, that it thought of a serpentine creature, that of which he heard about in stories. The thought stopped as it remembered. 'There had been a man here who used to read to me stories.' The many layers of pink over its body made it stand out from the others as well, though most of Caldwell's attention had already turned towards it. He did much to wonder about the condition of the man who it met. 'He told me great stories and spoke to me in a way everyone else understood."There had been others here?"More than plenty, in the hiding or in pain, those of which managed to avoid near death are not to be found or else.'Death was clear and the most accepted of fates he bore in mind. 'Could there be no other way of escape?'It was a question that in itself bore nothing but hope, which was more than wasted in this commentary, no, more like the crematory without the purging fire but rather that of which made them suffer to no end before they eventually gave in. 'Did he at least make it through or had he fallen to the same fate as the rest of your kind?'He couldn't have lasted long, something about the way you are, it couldn't have been that your skin tastes, which drives that one below mad with the taste, almost drunk.'It must've been a fate worse than death, at least being the way it was, ending us as fast as he had been aware of it, there wasn't any other mention of the man. Now Caldwell was forced to go on ahead and carry extra luggage, being as fair as he'd be, there wasn't anything worse than the wicked sounds that came next.A tormenting section of angled sounds which seemed to follow, before a moment passed, he looked away and seemed to have found the dark source from which it came from.Wide and sharp-angled bolts of blood floated in the air, or at least they appeared to be that way, switching from white to red to pink depending from which angle they came from. Though one might've even come to the conclusion that they were nothing but reflective, it wasn't as important as the fact that they moved fast and in various damning motion. From different angles and in various forms they took, it appeared as if there'd be no stopping whatsoever to them.One thing which appeared to have been the worst aspect of the entire encounter being the fact that there wasn't any stopping to them, regardless how fast he went. Now, being as shocked as his three silent companions, he only thought momentarily to ask something about his pursuers.'Does any of you know what those are? I do not think I'll be able to keep this pace longer.' He said while sweat ran over his forehead, as far as one would seem to look from one side where even the air was much thicker.'Turn towards that point and look back when you are done.'The type of instructions Caldwell had done more than listen, seeing how the farther he went remaining the moment when the reflection had turned towards the outside force and the following bolts actually became invisible until reaching the light. Not only had the air grown harder to breathe but so much more difficulty had started imposing upon him that he wasn't able to hover as easily as he had done before.With one swoon, they appeared, ready to do their mischievous thing, before some of them stopped while the others in their lead appeared to have gone for his neck.It was something unexpected that they suddenly stopped and fell into the devouring thing that tied itself to the ground. He wasn't expecting in the least this kind of result and by the time it came, there wasn't anything which would bore Caldwell any explanation why. Not only did he question the reason but also the disappearance of the others in their invisible world.'Those bolts almost reached us, what were they trying to do?'Taking care of those who stand outside for too long.' One of the three answered, looking as mightily indisposed as one could mimic an emotion.To be sure about it, there wasn't any doubt about the whole intention that laid there, either having to continue in that damning land where he wasn't any air or try ahead in the dangerous plane, being hunted by the reflective bolts. 'You'd better make yourselves useful then and find a place where to hide unless I'd come to the point of having to dread dropping the dead weight.' A thought most pure that bore not a single shimmer or tone of being serious.'We couldn't make it to the towers, they must be resting by now.'Sounds marvellous and well, let's make it to them, but if you wouldn't mind pointing in the right direction.'He was guided towards what seemed to be a thicker side of the region, in the sense that he had to have himself hover father in the air, just so that the thickness of the substance below wouldn't touch either of them. 'It's all well, though I do wonder, where would those bolts be?' 'They're everywhere but don't let themselves be seen, carry on and try not disturbing them even further.' It sounded as if there was an implication that the fact that they were chased was his fault of all the things, not a damn problem that came by itself to torment them together. 'We were hunted and I've done nothing wrong.' 'You've poked one and another on your way, that is the reason they started the chase.' 'But you have told me that they only chase the ones that recklessly went out for too long.' At least that way he managed to find out that one of them was a liar, the problem is with the fact that they all had the same voice and he hadn't been paying attention to whom he had been speaking to. Regardless of which chase, the world hadn't stopped with them, as for pouring the cinders down the neck of the bells made them stop on an instant, now that the ancient song had to stop. It did more than signal when the ones that towered upon the world were asked to pause their walks and rest. Not that there had been any kind of control whatsoever, merely being some kind of suggestion to the manner in which she almost came to the point of having to beg for them to stop if they came too fast or too close to the point where she stood. It was a matter of fact that she had been afraid of screwing it up and placing each of them in the wrong position, which became more clear since she was seeing them in her dream. Old Demeanour, as her given name, a wicked young lass, as so it seemed in her appearance had been brooding for far too long in her small abode. Years ago, perhaps aeons in a dark manner, she had heard what she thought to have been the damned trying to get from under the floor and drag her soul to an eternity of punishment. Being the way she had always been, there wasn't anything less she expected, other than coming with some sort of shovel and breaking it apart, only to reveal that long rope that wouldn't break. No matter how hard she tried, in a muffled sound, she only heard the song of the bell. It was the fate which meant her to come here and find the bell in her silent house, to guide that creature which lay deep in her sleep and guide her to her doing. Compared to which her task was clear, she would have to go ahead, as drearily as she could and force their march to never stop, for as far as they were for either city would constitute a better future than them being freed to roam over the world. They were tall and mighty, apparently made, hungry and thirsty but could never be quenched, worst of all being that they couldn't die nor could they rot. Even their presence there was a supreme mystery which couldn't be placed in anything a poor old hag could come up on her own, in her exploring mind. What she felt was fear, as she saw them again in her dreams, the guardian which remained unseen. Most of them had stopped from walking, apparently stretching their legs and cleaning them, easily with the help of rubbing them across their bodies. Upward and downward in motions that would be repeated through the ages, apparently going as far as to be made as clean as they would be. Had the bell stopped or are they tired? Neither of which would be answered nor would a sign come for ages to signal either fact, would she be right or wrong, that couldn't have been any less clear. Yet something one, in particular, did, while the others stood there resting, being the only creature standing and walking in circles, waiting for a command. It appeared like there had been some affected by the sounds of the bells, that of which would last for many hours, though neither of which went on ahead without the others. Her face was such a mess, as was her mind, looking at it, whence she was forced to realise that she was glancing through the eyes of another. From the likes of which, it might've been an urchin, a bold creation that belongs in a supreme place of solitude and fear like that of which hide above. She knew their kind and seen them go ahead and hide in corpses and other formed structures, seeing how the pain drove them down into that pool of forming guts. Would she have done the same if she was there? It didn't matter as her dream was interrupted during that dreadful night in which there was a quick notice of a man standing at the threshold of the door. An outsider, it must be, she purposed after glancing at his clothes, that of which appeared to have been of an expensive material, not to mention the bright colours that came with them, being of purplish-blue hue. 'What are you doing in my house?' She asked, without trying to seek for a fight and ask for attention, acting as a sad recluse in the mixt of being caught alone. 'I've come here to take you away and you won't be able to say a word against it.' He said, with a dreadful serious tone and a mad expression which signalled that he wasn't to be questioned nor denied. That sort of thing brought only thoughts of the mad and worst kind of criminals that would fill an old woman's mind with hope. 'I'm afraid.' She spoke but forgot herself in a moment, being caught in a moment when there was nothing to her but her vulnerability and the pause from the mad dreams of control. A cowl ran over his head from behind and before she could say a thing he was stopped by a small group of hooded figures, having the same dirt every local had around their clothes and skin. Their hands were the ones that gave it away though, and the thickness and the faked accent. 'You saw nothing happening here, this being nothing but a nightmare, would it be not?' Worst of all was that she nodded and placed her head back on the pillow, hearing the door slapping against the frame. What happened there would be none of her business, at least not in the likes of which she aspired to be or do. To say the least, she met the beast eye to eye, freely looking upon him in contact. Somehow, after minutes of being unable to fall asleep, she noticed that the man had apparently eluded those who had tried apprehending him and looked upon a thing of false virtue and sombre. It bore the smile of a man but acted such as it wasn't to be done. Worst was the fact that he had somehow managed to either get rid of the rope which had been strapped around his hands by force or by punishment. No, this wouldn't have been done, they had cut both of his hands, up to that wrist and continued cutting forth until a line was made on both sides of his arms. He held them as in tribute, trying to force her to look. 'See? Can you take a look at them for a moment now?' This had not the bearing of a choice but the bargaining of life, being let there to watch as apparently the vision of her dreams was reflected in that matter which ran through his wrists and hand stumps. By now, after noticing how absorbed she had finally become as for looking into the man, she had started noticing how much clear it was then in her dreams. It felt as if she was a giant, looking through and forcing itself not to stretch on ahead and crush those little insignificant insects, but wondered not with the reason of his presence there, not why they were looking for him. As for the damning silence, it had ended with a question. 'Are you still afraid of my lady?' 'But I never said I feared you.' She answered, with something in the court of a deaf tone which only brought the feeling of joy into his ears. Her words said a thing but there was a soft betraying of her eyes after long exposure between them. Nothing would be wrong than the coming moments when there laid nothing but a supreme awareness between the two of them now, as for this thing inside his body, there would be nothing of an easier answer to why he was there. 'You are to come down there and see for yourself what your long brooding had done, there's no other way for them to repay you for the long service you provided lady.' With a hint of sarcasm and mad joy, the man appeared to have promised nothing short of a damning thing. Slowly, he started being as inviting as possible as he went away and opened himself to her, in the most enthusiastic way possible, in which he appeared to have slipt himself down the middle, but not his entirety which remained the same. It could easily have been explained in the manner of which there was a soft cut over the skin, which revealed the dark muscle underneath and the reflection of the world below that held under it. For the purpose of which it didn't matter which direction it opened, only that it had managed to do so and had already proven it to be true. Some sort of cold wind appeared to have pulled her blanket inside, seeing it reappear there. Even as she stretched her fingers to the other side, she appeared to have understood the fact that the man had apparently acted as a gateway between the two worlds. 'I don't think I can be a part of that, I am afraid of what would happen to me on the other side.' 'Do not worry about that, you're to head there for a reason, there's no need to wonder or to care any longer for that.' 'What about the bell and who's to guide them if I'm not here to ring it when they're in need?' 'They have already taken care to outgrow the instructions you've been sending, it's all taken care of by now.' For each question she had, there appeared to have come to an answer even quicker than she could come with on. 'Will I be in danger then?' She asked, with something of a deep fright which laid between the two of them, from one side to the other, one that appeared to make it even more clear, that this time she wasn't answered directly but with another question. 'Do you not serve the master as well?' That of which appeared to have been the bottom line which couldn't have been answered by anything less or more precisely fair. She couldn't deny that there was some force which guided her as far as she arrived, though it remained unseen and never made its intentions clear. 'I don't know of any master but I must tell you I can't go there now.' 'You've no choice my lady, not any longer since I've seen to it that you are already trapped in something you can not escape.' The premise of which remained true since she had already been standing with two arms on the other side. Seemingly so, she hadn't remembered when it was that he pulled the rest of her body in and she fell. After an impact, there was some sort of splash which hardened, even in the air, as the drops appeared to have momentarily floated in place of which they weren't supposed to be. 'Why have you sent me here? I don't understand what I can do.' Soon, she thought there could come an answer as a lard of a man, hovering in the air appeared to be approaching. The first thought of seeing him was in the least, one of repulsion and disgust, just how far could a mango, as to dress in niceries while making it seem he's not from where he claims to be. Various microbes there felt at first as soft massages but when they started biting she realised she couldn't stay still for a moment while the liquid ran. 'It tends to do that, doesn't it? At least in the most annoying manner and at times when it's most inopportune.' Seeing both him and those urchins tied together made her humble heart feel some sort of soft repulsion which rang from one ear to the other. This man is nothing short of ridiculous, a madman and a creep which seems to have gotten himself a belt made of those dangling creatures. 'We know, she watches us and from our eyes.' One of the urchins said, to her surprise, the distraction was enough to take her away from the pain in which it swept into. Something about the old meat, the decay made the floor trying to break it apart, seeing how sooner or later they would find the land's guts. 'Keep moving unless you want up to end up here broken apart and into pieces.' Answered another, seeing how there was nothing short of a harshness to her side. 'How do you all know this? What I was doing up there was supposed to be a secret. Neither of you should've been able to know that I was using your eyes to see what was happening around.' 'We were aware and not as kindly as the others seem to take, of the cowardly watcher, for we used you as well. The looking glass which was your eyes, they worked for both of us, while in our sleep. We dreamed of your world and how you spoke, ever since and before you went onto the task.' Some dismay appeared to run between the two of them, at least, to the point where they were aware that plenty of the urchins had been accidentally been crushed by those marching towers. Something which wasn't supposed to happen but was merely a slip of a kind, it wasn't meant to end up that way in the least. Though bearing no expression might've hindered that of which was to remain between the four of them, Caldwell couldn't help but jump in the matter at hand. 'My dear old crooked lady, I see that you have set yourself in quite the problem at hand. It isn't unlike any other place I've seen that such a person of high rank as yourself would find herself in, henceforth

I'd rather be pleased to know you'd join me in my journey as well."What journey? I hope you're not intending on bringing that out there, in the daylight, where they could be seen by other men."But we were already doing a rather pleasant talk about what was to be done about the entire conundrum of ours, for you see, I've grown rather fond of them, as well as I'd rather have them accompany to my home. Seeing how they are quite useful in a rather plentiful arrangement of tasks that I'd judge as being around the jitty.'It took at least a while to see through him, but he was clearly mad, though she looked like a beggar on her knees. Pain ran through her but was thoroughly ignored, especially since she was rather intent on being against him, that of which was quickly noticed.'If you don't intend on helping me, then the rest of us will take our leave, with or without your presence, we had already a plan to have ourselves out of this prison and into the world.'Madman, you'll bring forces you've no regard for if you expose the people to those urchins, not to mention that you'll doom yourself as well as them. Can't you see past your fat and use your head?' Though it was irony now that she had been standing on a hand, unable to see that most of her skin had turned pink throughout the duration of their conversation.For what seemed to have been more like the execution of her kind, she didn't care to listen but look just how, in the last moment of what appeared to have been her life, there wasn't a mistake in it. He was a man who had lost his mind, it was clear in his pale blue eyes, slightly as they may have been, they looked through her, unable to see how low she had been. In moments, he would have forgotten who she was, while still grooming his own desire of vileness and escape.'You must listen to me, I beg of you if you don't care for the sake of the world, think of yours. If the world rejects what lay below you, to whom do you think they'll turn?"I can handle myself rather well.' Caldwell answered, somewhat surprised by what she appeared to have said.

Would he rather have gone through he would've left a long time ago, but something kept him there to listen?"They'll take you back here, such as they have taken me, though I doubt not that there were others as well before me that had to suffer through the same process and the same dismay. Neither of them had the chance to fight back, but I have.'

She was surprised as the liquid turned soft and what she had tried pulling was a piece of her arm and a fraction of her partially exposed ribs. What remained of her legs were covered in some sort of pinkish extension of the skin that appeared to have sealed the wounds to prevent bleeding. It was unlike anything ever felt by her but she turned out more than enough towards the other side as well.Her twisted features and the long face stooped down, it felt like now what remained of her was something primal, long-legged on a side, while walking on the other side of the stump, it was only now that she had a good twisted view of him. The pain had initially stopped as the juicy meat had run over, and seemingly she had received some time as well. 'It appeared as if I'm not going to die yet.' She spoke in a series of hisses that bore through her body, half of which would be open like a maw into the normal opening of a woman, which bore the other pieces of her teeth. This twisted image didn't bother him to look upon, rather, he considered her gone enough to serve. 'Will you listen to me and what I've to say if you would follow?"I cannot promise anything, but I was sent here for a reason, which doesn't appear to be dead.' At which conclusion he nodded.The three of the urchins didn't appear to have any kind of disagreement with this new creature following them, seeing how she wasn't the same creation which peered uninvited through them. Least of which was rather well enough, as a prize of consolation, though there was still one clue of satisfaction which, again, appeared to have an almost indistinguishable motion of twists which weren't to be noticed. At least, the layman wouldn't see, what they could now that they were connected, being at the unaware of the man who carried them and the mad wench which appeared to have taken the form she had been promised to. Withing their journey, what appeared to have been emptiness would reach some sort of an end as the great entrance was merely in sight. The giant gates were partially left open, it appeared, each and every single one of the hundreds which reigned there, through which one laid as a colossal one, waiting for those to arrive. Compared with it, the rest of them were nothing but the short ends of what would have to be promised to someone much lesser than the titanic beings for which the gates had been built. Such it was that this was to be, in this dark place, the five of them ready to enter or to escape, in all fairness, neither of them had expected that to be there. They were enthralling to look upon, almost bring thoughts of supreme desire to be enslaved, which was to be made on its own. 'What do you suppose there is on the other side you wench?' Despite the question, she appeared to have been just as surprised as he was, to the point of wondering whenever or not to answer that at all. 'I would rather wait and see, if I may be, it could be dangerous out there.' Of which shimmering wind signalled something strong, the mist from which ran, the steam and the air, it was definitely the place to go. Suddenly, after miles, they noted. 'Look, there is land on the other side, I can see a forest and the sun above, it must be that we found a way out in the finality of it.' 'You foul cretin, can't you see that it couldn't be that, when has the sun been as low now and how could the heights match with what's above if this place is under our cities?' Her senses varied but she couldn't deny either fact nor wrong of what was to be seen that way, walk after walk, pay after pay. This was a creature which was kept in solidarity and demise for as long as it ran its eyes and now that it was freed it stood behind a bloated man who spoke. 'I will be the one who takes the decisions here and if you don't agree, the path that lays behind you is yours but if you decide to follow us let us proceed and speak no further.' At which shame, provided she heard and apprehended what he said, she curtsies to follow. Well enough, for they walked through one of the many openings, clearly made for something taller than them even if it came to the fact that they were tall enough on their own. With which brought an end to the hovering as he entered and felt the ground. 'Would you not walk on your own for a while?' 'Nay, for we have come to be attached to you in spirit and in awe, we feel a connection as from kin to kin and rather not break it at all.' Caldwell couldn't deny it either, especially since he felt their warmth around his body, as well as the fact that he appeared to have been free of sweat ever since they had been attached around him. Coming to a point, they proceeded that way. Seeing the mad wench stretch around was frightening to look at, a half-developed being that looked at you from below, bearing nothing but resentment for the place. About which, everything was twisted in many directions, there, being no clouds shaped as well as the trees having been forked and moving at times when one wasn't to look upon them. Such was it that they went, upon the damned cliffs, the many stones which bore them from one side to another as they levitated higher than he had ever been. 'Hold still and don't let go of me, this could be dangerous for both of us if we lose out weight and balance on the rock.' There had been wise words spoken, at least to this point alone. Looking down they noticed a tribe having danced at some sort of giant carved man with everything missing from the torso, armless and most likely the symbol of death. From his hole came the smoke and judging from the fact that the human figures suddenly stopped and fell on the ground, everything went beyond grimness and savagery as they limbs and heads just fell off without blood or shouts. Without knowing what that was about they went on to what appeared to have been the sea. In the least and kindest of ideas, there wasn't a way for them to cross aside. 'We feel hunger just as well, and there are corpses there we could be fed with.' 'Unless we are to start with you or the watcher you call wench, bring us to food.' Said the urchins, with much distaste. Not unlikely that Caldwell felt the same, but wanted to say nothing, especially since the sun was to fall in a few hours, if that may be. But he was hungry as well as them, and the idea of eating them was just as good to him as theirs was. 'We could take a break the first minute we find something that looks in the least decent and edible, how does that sound to you?' 'It should at least buy him a few minutes still, just so he wouldn't be bothered by them, unable to find out just how they ate, they must've used some of their multi-purpose head for that, unless he was mistaken and the process was to be worse. 'There, I think I see a way down, at least we should try talking to a level ground before we are to seek a way to cross the sea.' If sea that even be, he wondered, at the sight of which, there wasn't much to be spoken on. Water seemed like water, the she-mad already disappeared towards it to drink and satiate its madness with salt. 'Let her go, she might return even saner after drinking out of that fine gorging thing.' An argument would be wasted, now that they were so much closer to where they needed to be. He felt like the lowest lot now, being forced to steal some unknown berries which might've been of the worst lot or poisoned. 'These ones are well, and while I don't know about how either of you works, I say to you, eat away, before something else better comes.' Which was more than what they've done? Their mouths appeared to act like vacuums in their abortion, as in seconds still, they appeared to have completely overtaken the bush out of every small berry with the help of their horns. Well enough to say the least. 'You gluttons ate it all, what do you suppose I should eat now that you took it from me with the least concern of saving it?' Though the sounds of soft fornication stopped, he was looked upon, as the night came at last. From end to end, above, there seemed to come to a metal panel which covered the sky, as far as it went. Something which was most bizarre, though by now he knew that nothing would go the way he wanted, being haunted by what seemed to have been the dark memories from the past. At once, both him, the urchins and the wench who had been the closest to a willow tree grabbed onto something and held this. Though the other lot had a hard time understanding what was happening, Caldwell had some good idea of how it worked. 'We're being moved to somewhere, but where to?' He asked as he looked at how the dirt and plants remained, though the various body parts tumbled down and the sea still rocked and forth, he remained there to hold himself against a tree, until it stopped and the metal curtain took itself off. What was revealed was a rock of red and various sharp top rocks of red which pointed at one another, twisted, instead of going down? Neither of them knew of this phenomenon, though the presence of stairs in such a feud was quite disturbing. 'Don't make a word, I believe someone's coming.' Before the words were muttered then, he appeared to have been faced by one of the heads from the many sacrifices which happened there. His mouth had been filled with water as a result of having been rocked back and forth, but he blinked as well as watched. Don't lose your calm yet, it shouldn't be worth it, at least not until there's something worth to lose it for. The initial water crossing place appeared to have failed since there was another gate up there, which looked the same but it shouldn't have been. For one, the most obvious detail which the presence of stairs dictated remained the steps which lead there. 'You're coming with us as well, dear one, you may not speak now but I need a witness and something from here which would be able to keep me as sane as possible.' Caldwell had obtained the head as well as he had grabbed a leg from below, the two of which just tied themselves upon contact, without making any sort of noise or give a sign of pain. On his way, he picked the wench which had been gurgling and foaming around her mouth because of the sea water. She followed as she pleased though, going as far as trying to snick their way out, the man said. 'Make sure that at least one of us remembers the fact that there's a constellation of red stones there, in case we've wound up in the wrong place and need to return.' That of which would remain as the least of their concerns. The sight of the sea-wench was disturbing, though neither of them appeared concerned. 'Wait, there's a decrepit thing about that on which you're walking on.' It was the stairs the urchins were talking about, and not only was their form the way it was but everything seemed to have been brighter, unchanging. By the time they were at the top and walking on the same spots which might've been unwalkable upon if they were crossing through the same way, they all noticed that the damn floor wasn't liquefying any longer. 'This is more than well, but neither of you appears to be pleased, can't you see that I no longer have to hover to avoid the pain? Won't you go down there for a moment?' 'Nay, we are to stay tied for when it comes, the land might change the way it was.' Each of them was determined and confused, most of all the one footed-head and the wench. The dark greyish land around had a fuzzy roundness which moved in the far distance, as well as the fact that it might've made every seems to be short-sighted. Not a fair trade, if it came to the fact that they were actually looking for an escape. If everything did indeed remain the same. With the darker city being cleaner, and the other one being on the same, there wasn't a hanging for some time, nor had there been the gallows. Though the sky was dark and sabbath dancing, there had been those ones in the shadows glancing, upon that sharpened thing and giant man. He came at last from his den, which had been hidden somewhere in the town, looked upon in high renown. From behind him yet he carried, busy as the world above, never to marry, never to leave children behind, he took those he used and grabbed the blade from the gallows to use it as a razor. Various wenches, men of wood, those who lived there as well as any other rude creature just went out of their way to stay away, looking at how the gallows had been used for the worst purpose, as a blade of shaving, an insult for what they were made for. Someone had to rise up to him and teach him about manners, at least that went as far. Nothing should've gone the way it did, though he wasn't able to see it coming, how the blade suddenly switched places with the spot where his fingers had been. Suddenly they fell away and the wretch curled and ran away, abandoned those poor women he had kidnapped for his dark liking. There wasn't at least one who hadn't taken the change, looking behind how he was to be driven to the dark waters in the bay and drowned. Now that there wasn't only but a hand left, and the citizens had the upper ground, he looked at the stones and how they had been thrown against him, being shouted and spat upon. They had been taking full advantage of their position and angles in order to get as many cheap shots in as it was possible. In a way, it was even more clear that no one expected him to be that way, with the lowest of the low, there came a pebble. From the angle in which it got thrown and with an unearthly strike, it managed to rip off an entire finger from his one working hand, leaving him a blasphemy of thoughts of rage. With a full turn, he ran through one of the buildings and pushed himself through until the point where the entire structure fell down with everyone inside almost crushed because of the strength and force with which it appeared to have come through. 'Well, follow him your digits, we can't let that thing escape and get a tall foot on us again. He'll take our women and then our lands, and that we cannot abide.' With shovels, they had been armed and already had they been inside that the man had come through the opposite wall, bringing the entire building down on them and crushing them alive. They were dead in seconds or would've been if it weren't for the ones that still made sound from down under. Regardless of which they followed a trail of destruction which was left in the city, going as far as to where the factory was, and whence he hid and listened. There hadn't been any footsteps which were left behind, at least of that he could be certain in a way, most likely since there wasn't a should either to see him enter, he could stand there for as long as he needed. No one in sight, but it was dark and he was shaking. He's suffered far too much for one such as himself to go away from that of which needed to be done, they all should've been killed when he had the chance to do it, even if there was a slight remorse. Death was final, and everything behind wasn't, that's what his momma always told him. With a bit of everything in mind, a voice from the same room called to him and said. 'Do you want a way out, do you want to escape from this city? You've come to the right place if that's your purpose. I can build you something you, something smaller which would let you be free, all of which is needed if this current body and we're all set.' It seemed that the perfect one had arrived, even without his awareness, though he had a mad desire to strike at whatever mad ravaging man thought he'd do or say, he wasn't in sight. Worse, they were approaching and he could hear them from outside. 'What do you want for it?' He asked in a most peculiarly humble voice, with which it had become obvious, even though he had paid little attention to what was the price. 'As I have said, I get to keep your body and you'll get to keep mine, but instead of walking freely now, you'll return once per year at the same date as today to change it before it rots away.' Oh and what a marvellous body that might've been, even the thought of which to own, as for the missing hand and fingers, those of which were replaceable, even by the slightest terms of having them needed. There was something else he wanted as well though as the terms extended. 'Servitude, for one hundred of those days each year, for you have brought them to my doorstep and threatened to ruin my entire operation.' 'No, you cannot force me to do that, I can shout and show you what you'll have to deal with.' Indeed, he raised himself and tried stretching, leaving beads of blood fall off onto the floor as soon as he was done. There wasn't something menacing left, nor could his shouts be heard, even though the angry citizens were only meters away from him, planning and muttering as well. 'As you will do good and listen for my patience grows thin.' 'I won't be your servant, never.' 'Then I will have what's left of your body and take you inside my many pieces of walking toys.' It was to be a long night after all and none of the screams of terror was ever heard. Though his consciousness remained, split into many little pieces of unmoving wood, he saw, through all of their eyes at the same time, hearing the echo through all of their ears but unable to speak, for their mouths were closed. Was servitude that bad compared to this damning torture in which he was set? At worse of times, the wind had stretched over and pushed one of his sides on the floor, splitting what he could see while everything remained still to him. He was unaware of just how far this had to go and exactly when this would've ended, but the riot had never reached the factory and now, during the morning he could look at that thing and how it worked on his body. For one to admire himself was forbidden, now, he looked as if that was the corpse of something which had been, worked upon by a madman and his dream. While promising bodies grew old, he wasn't aware of anything else, but how that thing was to repair it while keeping it alive. Something did, at least, that dumbness was present whence it opened eyes to look in the same spot with nothing going on. His fingers had to be replaced, the bleeding had long stopped as well, unable to say nor to be certain what it was meant for it to accomplish by repairing a body without a mind. Could it be that it had to do with something that? One knock on the door and he responded. 'You may enter.' A young man appeared from the other side of the door, from which demeanour, he was clean but most likely had done something wrong which brought him to this place of misfortune. 'I have come at the date we've set.' 'Good, and I suppose you weren't followed, nor questioned and have spent the year well?' There was a nod from one side to the other, most curiously he couldn't stop staring at the big body on the corpse. It wasn't something he'd get to see often. Most importantly remained as a fact that they weren't supposed to ask one another about either of the things they've done, having their business remain private on both sides. Much of what appeared on the newcomer's body could be described as minor bruises and some cuts, the rest of which means that he was kept in a good condition. So much as to say there wasn't anyone around to look how they would go ahead about the switch, bone to bone and the skin was to dry off, for the giant was to be still worked on. 'I could take a break and change you to a new one, if you don't mind, there's nothing which would go wrong with it as much as I work fast.' The condition was met, and the new body was brought from the machine in the back. No one, other than the stranger who had made the offer saw it work, only that he had the bodies prepared just in time, bringing what appeared to have been a reflection of the current guest. He looked at it but asked for nought. 'Would it be possible for the fact to be changed now? I've run into some trouble my dear sir and I've yet to escape.' The request was fair and from what he remembered, there was one which was long abandoned. 'Do you suppose I could give you the wooden face of a dead man? It shouldn't be much trouble if you were to get a queer look upon you from time to time as long as you bow your head or turn away. Much better than what it would've looked like if I were to carve your face out of my mind.' Such a handsome fellow did he look, as he turned away and saw the fact that the day was shimmeringly approaching, so had he realised that there wasn't a chance either to ask for anything else. They shook on it and got to work immediately, exchanging body to body and face anew, as far as being concerned, there was a pleasure, much of it now, which went on ahead as he was given a mirror. 'You're grand, you're mighty, you're an artist if I may say. I've never seen such a work of you, as for the wood to look even more life-like than it had ever been before.' At which invitation, the stranger bowed and welcomed the man to get away while there was time. 'As an artist I must return to my work, repairing the body that you've to behold. Ask no question but do return one year after as we established.' And with that, the man wasn't to be seen around, he disappeared for another year, without having any longer having to fear. 'Well, to do, well to do, I'll have to care for you too.' With which, he felt pity and continued his motion in order to restore all pieces of wood into being straight. He was aware just how much suffering he'd have to attend to as well as the fact that in this room he wasn't the monster. 'I'll work on your body and when you'll have calmed yourself, I'm sure we could work something out. But that of which you see down there is now mine, as you have entered in my palace benign.' With which there came the work which would've saved him much of what was needed to be done. Ripping away some of his hair, the clothes which weren't needed, covering for the wounds around his body. So many of them had apparently thought that throwing rocks was enough to crush the poor old thing, though they bounced away against the thickness of the skin. He was to be something grand, with a long wooden arm attached to the stump which had been his hand. Some measurements were to be taken but it would do for the time, the body was to survive by means alone, being dead, the thirst being taken care off as well as each need which forced him to be kept alive. Meanwhile, down into that cursed oblivion in which they walked upon, it appeared to have been too quiet for comfort. Worse than that, there had been plenty of columns which lead towards the top of the world. Built by men from the looks of them, not to mention the fact that the number of them almost made it seem as if they hadn't been used for escape. 'These weren't there when last we came into the place, were they?' Caldwell seemed to have been trying to look around for anything, including the giant corpse in which they had spent the night, but nothing laid there. Perfectly abandoned to the point where they took the chance to go on ahead and escape. 'Be careful, for this world is new.' 'It isn't for the likes of us, her or even you.' They spoke as if they knew something, much of what they had been aware even before they stepped in, but this wasn't about to end immediately and right. Not now, since everything was to be seen as wrong. Climbing at least appeared to have been easy, from his perspective, which didn't add too much, to begin with. Neither of them was prepared to be able to go on and be able to come out in one of the houses, during the dinner of a husband and wife. Both of them looked surprised, having sealed the entry for far too long before, only to be greeted by a robust person with some sort of strange bright device around him and a creature of utmost bizarre. There had been no shouts in that regard but neither of them appeared to have said a word in the matter, especially since they had been caught in a most peculiar moment of their meal. Nothing was to be the same around, but at least to be free, lacking manners as well as he could see. Perhaps phantasm might've appeared inside their house, playing tricks as well as fooling around despite having done what needed to be done the previous day. 'Don't look, they mustn't be what they appear to be, my dear, just keep eating until they're gone.' Though by the second he noted what laid on the table, Caldwell snatched a big piece of cooked pork and ate it with less regard for either of them, having grabbed a few vegetables as well as he poured himself a cup of wine. Without a second to see, the table was halved in terms of food, as it just happened that he did inquire of the rest of them. 'Wench, do you need to eat now? We've got a long journey after all.' The answer is as obviously cryptic to the point of being unable to be taken from her eyes, nor from her weird body movements. 'What about you the three of you? Certainly, those fruits you ate couldn't have satisfied you there.' 'We are full, all of us, there's no need for any further attempt to satiate what isn't there.' A grim answer which appeared to have bored through one another, as well as he came to his senses. With which, he went on ahead to walk, sniffing around to the point of having noticed that the look on both the husband and his wife was somewhat more shocked at this point. At least since the table was now empty of food mostly because of him, including the fact that he had even the nerve to take it out of their hands. If chances were, he would've eaten the table, though they had work to do, the world to see. 'We are free now, and we must return to where we have to. Though I am afraid that we might have to momentarily part ways, at least until a better moment comes for us to see one another.' He mainly referred to the wench who might've presented more than enough trouble than it might've stood to have another hand around. 'Must we leave as well?' 'No, you will stay with me and make yourself useful when there's need for it, but I must admit I've grown rather fond of the warmth your bodies provided against mine.' Interestingly enough, she wasn't to be separated from him, there was little desire, through force came at play. 'Leave now before I am forced to go ahead and make you comply with my wish. I've nothing to say to you nor do I have to pay any attention to your wishes to remain. Furthermore, if ever I would require of you to follow, I would know where to find you, since I am aware that this is where you belong.' With a drone of a voice, going as deep and at the same time lighter than that of an animal she only repeated. 'Home.' Two times, at least, until she moved on to the other side of the bushes and the thicket between the alleys. How worse might this town have been that they let it go in such a manner? Despite everything at hand, it appeared as if there were plants which had overgrown their stay and almost impaled the coming buildings. The bloody black rains didn't help either, not that it mattered. 'Let us go now, before the weather changes, I've still got something to find before, before, before something.' His tone was muffled by a surprise far greater than what he had expected, even from the distance, it had looked as if the towering being had escaped, at least one of them, frozen against the tallest building in the lightest of towns. From the looks of which, either it was resting or dead, the legs being spread across the town as the rest of the body was tilted. 'What happened while we were away?' He asked, only to be answered by the likes of the urchins. 'There had been some sort of escape from what it seems. You need to go ahead and look at what happened around the town, it's your responsibility.' Came the other as he said it, looking through the broken bridge, it looked as if he hadn't entered a community any longer, but a war zone. No, at least that would've implied some sort of fight, but this wasn't anything close, from the like of which, it stroke first with its legs, crushing the entrances of the various buildings, with no soul in sight. The furthest ones walked on the streets in the distance, dressed in suits of dark yellow, red, wearing masks that would let them breathe with the help of tubes. At the sight of Caldwell some of which appeared to have exchanged glances before they suddenly ran from sight. It wasn't going the way he planned and as he approached, the more clear it had become that this wasn't the end of the creature, now that there wasn't any tune playing. Speaking of which, in the city, dark, the hidden home, covered in moss and seemingly a giant concoction of grown strewn cones, laid abandoned in her house. The wench arrived immediately and looked upon her home and what was laid, apparently, no one had uncovered that of which guided the ones, and at the time being she was forced to open that trap door off the floor with the help of her teeth alone. Caldwell on the other side gasped at the sight of which, much of him was surrounded by those peculiarly dressed survivors, that they were. 'State your business or return from whence you came from.' There was a coldness in the voice, that of a man which would be forced to do whatever he needed to do in order to survive. Each of them was the same, though he knew how to deal with them. 'I am only trying to return to my home from a long prolonged vacation and it seemed as if there's much that I have missed.' 'Very well, we shall take you to our Lord and see what he thinks of you.' 'Would that be your captain or the one in charge?' With a bunch of laughs, he had become aware that they weren't talking of a human, but instead he was being led towards the towering creature and where it lay. Most of them must've grinned under their mask, at least if they thought that creature to be alive, or even worse, to actually have thoughts tied about them whatsoever. He wasn't even going to pay the least attention if it weren't for the collar around his body which prevented him from falling below. The thought of which, to abandoned them could come at any moment, if chances are not as kindly as he thought them to be. 'Why is your master the way it is and where are the others?' It was a dangerous game he was playing, especially since there was information which he wasn't supposed to know. 'How do you know about the others? No one is supposed to know about them, no one but the trustees. Who exactly are you then if not a man who appears to have come to mess with us in the strangest of manners?' With at least a second glance, one of the leaders, if so could he be called, appeared as if there was some kind of understanding after seeing that the damned man looked as if he had come from the strangest of places, with the urchins appearing only now into the light of their eyes, most of which had realised that there was something wrong about the man. Wrong, being in the least of words something as docile as to think of him less of a threat, but no, in the least of sense, he was to be treated the way he had been taken as. 'On your knees, you're our prisoner now and shall walk like a damn mutt if we want to.' There wasn't much room for argument either, especially since there was the least sense in his mind no to go on ahead and form a mutiny there and then with so many people watching. Caldwell had only seen them from time to time, trying to throw an evil eye or grasp at the strangeness he had. Neither of them appeared to have been close to the extreme worship of the one resting creature which had been the cause of all destruction. 'Do they all share this thought of yours or are they hiding for some reason?' He spoke like a dog and almost acted like one, being pushed from time to time by their rods or small tazing devices. The bottom of the streets was as dark and grim as the dark water which fell from the sky, the likes of which was darkened by the exposure of some grim clouds of gas which had been released into the atmosphere. It wasn't something that would soon fix itself by any means, just a constant reminder of what the future looked like. By the time they reached the dangerous perimeter, they had become aware of something which wasn't supposed to be a part of this whole journey. For, as seemingly small of a fact as it remained, the tilted tower which stood motionless started jerking its legs in plenty of directions, almost coming back to life by itself. With the sleep of death had ended, an eternity having appeared to the point of being no longer thought of to be that long, it was time for their so-called deity to return to life. The fright of which caused some of the adoring ones, most devout of pagans run as the sight of those hairy things going. It wasn't even chance alone that it still worked, as far as it went, and for as long, the damn bell was being shaken by a mouth which appeared to have missed most of its teeth. And as the blood appeared to have run through the rope down to the bottom, from each and every corner of the world where a reflection or a ripple brought the sounds they moved. Something was calling them back and before they knew it, the tilted god stood still, tall and dark, blocking what had remained of the cloud stricken sun. Nothing could've been worse than the image of their destroyer, which had been worshipped as dead coming back to life. There was agony and there was despair, nothing would go on ahead to repair the damage which it had created in its first moment back to reality. From the looks alone, Caldwell shouted. 'Get back to hiding before it crushes us all!' The warning which was taken by all but three or four fools which had been caught in an air of supreme adoration or complete madness. Without the least of thought for their own lives, they had been taken at unawares and forcedly crushed under the legs of the destroyers.

Woe to them, who ended fast as the creature finally went home through the ground. This was the least of expectations, to be as desperate as to come further into destroying the land to be a part of the march below. From the crater which had been left down there, others had been long waiting for the bells to go and guide them, to the march for an eternity, or at least for as long as it would last. There wasn't anything worse than what it came to be in the few moments which had to be seen in the matter. Worse than all, people had died in the inferno which, the air pressure and the heat that went as the fiend forced itself to go one further into the ground, to the point where it couldn't be forced any longer. Somehow it managed to seal the crater, just so others wouldn't be able to follow or see what was truly happening below at all. The men were now caught in a circle of despair chose to blame it on the strangers and his strange belt, who appeared just at the right time when their deity chose to rise and something bring the means of their destruction. More than bloody violence would be brought to action, at least, that was obvious enough. Caldwell was in the throng of which there seemed to have been little to no escape if it weren't for the fact that there were some tricks left under his sleeves, he wouldn't have escape right there and then. 'Turn on the lights at them, and let us make haste.' With which command, he closed his eyes, unlooked for, those which attempted the pursuit had appeared to come upon being blinded by the strong exposure of light coming from those urchins. It was a display of what had appeared to have become a beacon of pure whiteness which went on ahead and escaped their grasp. Such was that both them as well as the other watchers turned their gazes and had managed to lose him from sight. 'Follow him, he couldn't have gone far, he's the one who disturbed our god and threw it back into the abyss!' Furiously they listened with what appeared to have been as close to fanaticism as one could approach. From this point on there wasn't a return. 'Turn off the lights you wretched beings, can't you hear that we're not being hunted any longer?' 'We did not seem to notice, but what is there to be done?' 'We'll go on ahead and try to find a way back, by going as far into this city as we can. If I'm right, there should be another way for us to find down there, from whence we came and if there isn't. Well, in which case there'd be a lot of work to be done to make this place look like home, wouldn't you agree?' Neither of them appeared to comprehend the meaning of what he'd spoken of, nor why he suddenly appeared as happy as he had been. But through the refuge of what appeared to have been constructed around most of which lie around in a state of much decay, he couldn't help but whine. Those around him were in no state to hurt him or even realised that he was there. Much to it, the district was filled with plenty of starving people, if not dead already, or trying to get water for a sink which wasn't working. Though the sight might've been a beauty once at night, it just happened to be this way now, for as far as he could see. Many of the streets were now lowered to a level, to the point of having seen as the result of some natural disaster which occurred beyond his comprehension. 'Could you point me towards some place where I may find weapons or clothing?' Caldwell might've picked on a frail old man which was more scared by his appearance as if he had been approached by some sort of demon which finally came to reap his soul. 'No, don't do it, I'm not ready yet.' 'Stay your mouth, I've only come here to talk. What about the rest of you?' With a sudden change, they appeared to cower no longer, but move away as if a bunch of corpses were rekindled by the voice of a stranger trying to establish contact. Their fright was surreal, to the point of those maws around the urchins looking sharp enough to do so. Even Caldwell was surprised to notice that one of the old fellows had been pulled inside by the head, his frail body being slowly eaten by the urchin. 'What are you doing now? Spit that out, it'll only make you sick.' In truth, there was a bitterness to the meat, that it was immediately abandoned, leaving nothing but some soft bruises and a fear mongering pack of sticks which had once been a man. He cowered and rolled away before finding some sort of bent carriage door behind which he hid and glinted at it. Worse than that, they all noticed the act which made it worse for him as well as his desire to interact with the rest of them, knowing that at any point they could be taken for their meat. 'No, not me sir, my meat is dirty, see? I drink only the dark water from the sky and eat dirt, very bad dirt, worst dirt, as a matter of fact, there's no need for us to reach that. 'Tell me what you know then, would there be a way through the city that you know of?' 'None that isn't taken by either the ones of worship, the gangs, the culprits or the chosen that stay inclined.' The chosen that stay inclined seemed to have been the most peculiar choice of words the frail being appeared to have chosen. 'What would the last one be exactly?' 'Have you not noticed on your way?' Before he turned, he appeared to have looked upon a man which stood tilted against the walls, in the same manner in which the towering abnormality had been. Worse of all, those closed eyes and lack of expression did more to tell of something which was foreboding than the shape of the legs. In a way, it did appear as if it reflected them, if not that it tried being the same creature there. It sprang to life and almost leapt from the spot, in a maddening stray of dances which brought it out of sight. They repeat what the one of worship does, down to the very last.. He stopped once he realised that the creature had sprung to life and what exactly it meant. Even from where they stood, he could hear, vaguely if not, the march which would bring them to return from the confines of the outer world. 'We must follow him to where he's going.' That's what I was planning all along before you interrupted my line of thought.' With what might've been a touch of anger, he seemed content with this plan, going ahead to follow what appeared to be a harmless enough stranger, if it weren't for the threat which loomed around though. He didn't enjoy the sound of the gangs either or the presence of the worshippers around the city. If there was another way, if only he could peer ahead and try to look upon that of which there be to flee, he would've taken it without a shimmer of insight, without even a second thought. There was no easy path which laid ahead, only misery as he looked and heard, but it was clear that there was a certain need to follow that man with its strange walking conundrum and that body which promised to go on ahead. 'We're sure to find a place to there before we're being caught.' Though by the time he managed to catch up with that incredible speed the stiff fellow displayed, he was already taken down by the street by a pair of well-aimed rocks which hadn't given him the least of a chance to get up. It was a fine job, that he looked at it, the rocks even bounced back as they took down a leg and cause the concussion which killed him in the end. 'Damn thugs, trying to ruin our plans.' 'We know you're there hiding behind the ruins, show yourself and we may show mercy as well.' 'Like you've shown that creature over there who wasn't doing anything but trying to flee? Why should I trust you after doing what was done there?' It was a mere misunderstanding as it went on to cross out territory without permission. We know their kind and are aware that they have become such as dumb animals would be, either hibernating or cause more trouble than anyone else would.' Somehow this didn't seem to make Caldwell trust either of them, seemingly so, as multiple voices spoke at once trying to explain themselves or rather distract him from what was at hand. 'Should we trust them? It's your call as well since you're part of my body now, the way I go is the same way you're headed towards.' So it seemed they have agreed upon it. 'Walk with them and see it that we get down well before they arrive. Anything is better than being pushed into the liquid and forced to stay there before we die.' That certainly brought them as far as they have come to and now there wasn't in the least a chance at redemption. He couldn't stop but turn to look, seeing how they were still there, with some sort of primaeval rock weapons and sticks with small iron spikes attached. Was he prepared for something like this? No in the least, but in chance be, he raised his hands and walked slowly, knowing that he was a big enough target that the rock throwers wouldn't have the least of a chance to miss. 'I see you've lost something as well.' That was clear by the time he picked up his helmet. If there was a face behind that, it looked as if the skull was entirely featurelessly covered in skin, and the talking face was left behind the helmet, still speaking as he showed that strange appearance he's been hiding. 'We've all lost something of ourselves here, be it less or higher. And you don't seem the kind to worship out destroyers, would you be?' 'No, I wouldn't dare that, as a matter of fact, I was looking to go forth as far away from them as I could possibly be?' 'Them?' Asked another one of his goons, softly pressing the end of a pipe in stone, rubbing it in as he thought. 'Look behind, you should've felt it by now, they seem as if to be returning to finish the job and bring destruction.' 'Then we are all to die.' Said the leader in dismay with a slight hint of anger, as this entire problem was to come, he didn't think ahead but ask. 'Where are you planning to go? There's no safe place in this world any longer, especially with them marching again. If what you say ends up being true, this would be our end.' 'This doesn't have to be the end if you choose to follow me towards the depths of the earth, from which they came?' It was nothing short of a desperate and meaningless plan, but they seemed to agree that it was something that might be done since neither of them could come up with something better. 'I want to come as well, wait, wait, I come in peace.' From behind, it appeared like a small group of worshippers in their robes brought themselves closer and upon hearing what was said, sent forth one of them, which laid behind the bulk of a man Caldwell had been. 'We don't need to fight, we're all in here for the same thing, a way out of this place.' 'Do you seriously think we're going to trust you after the feud between us?' He was interrupted by the man as he turned between the two of them. 'I'd rather use as many hands as I can, if it means we can all escape this damn desolation, we should get as much of it as we can.' It had already come to an approach as the thugs and the worshippers came closer. Cultists of whatever they might've been, unlike those true fanatics who gave their minds to become such as those hoppers, some were sane enough to come to an understanding and surrender themselves before it came to a bloodshed. 'We've got but a chance to escape, which is to follow one of those creatures that you've stricken down with rocks. They seem to emanate the behaviour of their master, to the point where I think they might lead us below.' 'And after? That's where the one we've believed in went, that's also where the others are heading and you want us to go into the lion's den.' There wasn't any possible explanation that would've sincerely proclaimed this to be anything less than a stupid plan. 'Will you let me do the planning and the mental work then? For once I found out that I am way about keener of mind than people thought of me, henceforth I should be the one in lead.' 'No, I am still to remain the leader of my people.' The man said as he noticed the other cultist making a sign as to bring the attention that they thought the same. 'You'd better find a way out and take us with you before something happens, there's no need to order us around by that time.' 'Very well, then we should go then, you may resolve whatever quarrel lays between your factions if we get to stay alive.' As with that being said, there came the moment where the pounding was harder and the silhouettes started taking shape. Judging by eye alone, it might've been weeks, days or even hours by the time they would arrive to end all their livelihoods and make them suffer. At least, with so many of them in a place, there'd be no city left. 'First, we should make sure that we're as far from them as possible.' 'It won't work.' Came up the leader of the thugs, adjusting his face helmet, with the least of a grin on his mouth. 'When it happened, it seemed like they all marched in the same direction but appeared to bring destruction farther away than where they walked towards.' 'How?' Asked Caldwell, slightly muffling his ears and having his teeth gash as they rubbed themselves in back and forth motions. The answer wasn't to be as satisfying but everyone around was whispering and talking, even between one another, thug and the worshippers alike. It had something to do with the shock the earth received each time they stepped, as obviously as it could be felt now. 'By the time they would arrive here, this would only get worse, buildings falling apart, people being crushed under their own weight, same about carriages, animals and pots. There was nothing to be left alive.' 'How come you survived, all of you appear to be more than well, some at least.' At which there was only a shrug as they weren't certain either. After passing the broken buildings and what appeared to have been a tilted tower, he signalled for them to stop. While they were standing behind rocks and some sort of coverage was to be taken, what they came to be was a fight between gangs. Some shots could be heard, rocks being thrown, as well as some strange object which could only mean that they were running out of weapons to fight one another. 'We could either go through and fight or turn around, either way, I don't suppose they saw us yet.' 'Well, what do you think chief? You and your thugs are up for a fight or what?' 'Leeroy, not the chief, name's Leeroy. I don't suppose we have the means to fight them.' 'They don't seem to have much either.' Seemed to acknowledge one of the rob wearers. Worst of all was the fact that they hadn't seemed to take in the effect the most important factor. 'Shh, I keep hearing the sound of shots being taken. I don't suppose either of you would like the idea, but we could go ahead and split until we find a point to regroup ourselves and be safe.' 'This sounds like a bad idea.' Said Caldwell without having brought to the point of being questioned by the rest of the plan. 'I don't mean to snick, I meant that you'll stay with them here while I and my men snick behind one of the groups and make an alliance with them. The two of us should be more than enough in order to overpower them.' 'It sounds like a mad plan which may just work. But what happens if one of them turns their gun at you the moment they see you?' At which he pointed towards the distance. He had noticed before the rest of us that there were at least one of those bizarre hopping men who hadn't awakened yet, though it wouldn't be long by the likes in which it was shaking. 'We don't have as much of a chance now, do we? We either go with this or hope to find another way.' 'We'll wait for you here then.' At which they seemed to have shaken hands, Leeroy having come even to those four men of which didn't belong to him, which was more than surprising since they came as far. 'Take care not be caught before, if we return.' With which they appeared to have gone away, into the dust. Such a place would've made a battlefield took place. Leeroy hadn't had a fight in at least a week, one which hadn't in the least involved the stabbing or the chocking of a rival gang member who looked at him in the most peculiar manner. This was for the better, since they acted like some sort of debris panther, ready to leap at the throat. 'Wait here for a moment, I think I hear something.' His hand was raised as he said it but the fiery look in his eye didn't give the least of shimmer that had an emotion. It was unlike him to pass on such a good shot, especially with a rock in hand, with the head exposed like that. The boy might've barely been old enough to wear a gun but that was it. With the plan at hand, and seeing how he was entirely distracted, he eventually threw it but not at a spot where the boy would've suffered a head injury, instead of taking the gun out of his hand. He flew before he could be woken from the shock and almost managed to say a word before being tackled to the ground. His men followed as Leeroy pushed the gun with a foot and held the boy's mouth shut. 'Don't make a sound, we're here only to talk to your boss, we've got nothing to do with the feud between the two of you, understood?' Nothing but a slight nod appeared to have changed what the boy attempted, especially since another one of Leeroy's men had taken the weapon. 'I'll remove my hand now, but no sudden movement, okay?' It came fast off and it seemed as if the boy had enough understanding to know that there wasn't anything that might've been done. He looked at the man before speaking but hadn't recognised the gang he was from. 'What do you want then?' Things had gotten comfortable enough that the boy was pushed to his feet and set face to face with him. It came to the point of being taken before the other gang leader and the three of his men which looked more than surprised to see that some armed men managed to snick and disarm the young fellow. 'What is the meaning of this then? Have you no shame or honour now that you'd snick and threaten a child? I suppose I should've expected this sooner or later.' 'I'm afraid I've got nothing to do with them nor are we here to fight, we're only trying to get past your small field of battle and escape the coming end.' There was a slight hint of confusion through their eyes betrayed the fact that they knew what he was talking about. 'Well, it's true, after all, isn't it? They're coming back to end us all in one last strike against the people who they left alive.' 'It doesn't have to be this way.' As close to a reflection that might've been, it appeared as if there was something on the other side which stopped them from fighting. From the likes of which, on the other side, Leeroy glanced at a fat figure and those followers of his in robes. Undoubtedly, something happened before those closed gates as well, making their task immediately more easy than they had expected. 'Well, as you might've guessed, there's.' A shot came as they arrived at the realisation that one of the robed men had been dropped down. Damn fool thinking he could take care of this by himself. 'On that other side lays the only man who knows how to take us from here and onto somewhere safe but he's surrounded by the gang you've been fighting for so long. Are you willing to strike for an alliance and a chance at freedom and life? We won't strike you down if you refuse but this appears to have become a delicate problem now.' The nods came easily, but they weren't to be asked now. 'Help us deal with them and we'll have decided what's to happen after.' It was the closest thing he could've taken and judging by the fact that he had given the lad his gun back there was a shimmer of trust between the two of them, as from gang leader to gang leader. 'What do you suppose we'll do?' 'They're distracted, from what it seems, we could charge them at one and deal with it as it comes.' 'Would this help now?' It was one of Leeroy's men, who came up with a small smoke bomb which had been carried for a long period, though it was fairly small in size, they say that they're supposed to pack some sort of punch to them. At least enough that they'd be distracted. 'As soon as this goes out, we change and make for them.' 'How will we know which one to kill then?' 'Strike for those wearing the human skulls, it shouldn't be as hard, they're also wearing mostly the bones of those they ate, in case you won't have anything else to take from sight.' It was easy enough, though not as it went on, while the smoke bomb blew over their side, a huge blanket of smoke flew in all directions. They went into a flight motion that pushed them forward into a song of shots and rock striking, alas to the point of which they had been cowering into motion that had been unknown to others. It made everything inside of the blanket as a sort of dance of grabs and shots from which men had already been taken down. One particular man with a limp, he bore no bones but was shot in the eyes from the opposite band, being taken as soon as he gushed blood as to be feasted upon. The starting motion was taken down by a man who was carrying a rock with him, as well as he did begin, he hadn't stopped as he had seen nothing but rage after his fellow comrade with his robe had been shot. With him taken down, the numbers of the bone wearers had been dwindling by now, without the least of concern when it came to the lives of those involved in it. Another man had been taken down, as he raised his rifle, his fingers had the unlucky reason to be sawed off with the help of a small knife that got close enough to do the job. He shouted as he attempted to removed some of the stumps which were blocking the trigger on the rifle but failed, as he was stabbed rightly in the heart and fell off the ground. 'Stop, stop now, I surrender, I give up, just don't kill me Eglor.' The gang leader, Frank Eglor had been with his hand at the other man's throat, waiting with a small clubbed nail-spike baton. One thing alone kept him from going on to make that face into a small battered thing, which had been the fact that there was some sort of promise he had made towards the other gang leader. 'Tell what remains of your men to get rid of their weapons and surrender.' 'All right, right, men.' He shouted with what appeared to have been a crackling voice. 'Take down your weapons now and let us have some peace.' Though the remaining gang members, at least those lost in the frail mist raised up and shouted at the traitor before executing their leader themselves after a shot that penetrated both of the skulls. As the realisation came, they all realised that there wasn't any time for celebration, since a barrel was already moving near them, judging by the contents of which there would most likely be some kind of explosion involved, at least from the likes of which they dared not even throw a glance. It felt as if there was nothing to be done as they all ran in their different directions, foe and friend alike, coming to a safe point before the small explosion came and spread the dust and ruin even farther. Flames erupted and engulfed what had remained of the ruins, leaving at least a dead man standing on the pile, blackened by the fire and unable to be recognised. Other corpses had been flung by the force in directions that weren't even worth mentioning. 'Where is he?' Shouted Leeroy once he got to his senses and the buzzing in his ears stopped. Most of his men were picking up the dead by the time they realised that there had been only one desperate man which remained. 'Where the, there.' He contradicted himself with the direction but most importantly was the fact that Caldwell was still alive, with most of the remaining limbs intact. For once, this was a well to do victory, as it went. 'Will you follow us then or let us go through if not? We've done our part of the job so how about it? They're still on their way, regardless of how you look at the problem.' 'I have and I must say, as strange as this small thing you've got here had come to be, I'd rather take my chances with you if it gives me and my men a chance to survive. Especially after seeing how well you've handled them here.' A simple act of self-indulged admiration came from one another as they came to be into their places. With everyone at their respective side, they banished the thought of a lone survivor, as the type hadn't a chance to survive. 'He's not there any longer, he's not there, I know I saw him there resting, but it couldn't be that it went as far as that.' 'We'll find him, there's no way he could've went that far, and we're more than enough to form some sort of searching group.' None of which dared make any sound that would've attracted any kind of attention, at least from the likes of which would've had them caught by others. 'You're not from around, so let me give you a plain word of advice. Don't seek trouble where you don't have to, it's a rare thing to see a fight between gangs like this unless you're searching for it. Most would rather take you out from distance with the least resistance returned. That's what we're mostly looking at here.' With a turn they seemed to have been frozen as the last man, the survivor had been found. Apparently, his weapon cocked and left on the ground left him with nothing short of a small sharp edge that had some metal wires coming from an angle. 'It was exactly like you said it, they know the way out.' Worst of all was the fact that he had wrapped himself around one of those hopping fanatics and prevented its movement, as well as he went ahead to threaten the life it had. Nothing short of a maddening thing remained between the two of them since he threatened the only way out they had. 'Don't do anything yet unless you want to end up with a bullet between your shins and arms and left here for their return.' 'You're the one threatening me now? Would you have something to bargain with you lowlife? They killed my brothers and forced our leader to lower himself down with the scum just to survive, he was unfit for rule, all of them were. None of my brothers had the guts that were needed to carry something to fruition as I am willing to take.' By the tone alone he looked as if he meant it, not unlike the fact that there was a need for a flight demonstration. An utmost terrifying sound came out of the three-legged man as he pressed the sharp metal wires against his skin. It went in repeated motions until some of the skin was flayed, leaving what appeared to have been some sort of in-human grey meat. Something was changing in them, those that appeared to have worshipped their destroyers. It was more than biological in nature, to the point of having been forced into some sort of evolution, regardless of which they still went into one direction. 'No, you won't waste more of our time, henceforth I'm giving you a chance, as I am the one who should've been asked to speak with you in the first place. I know of a place for us to get through and escape, where we'd be free of those destroyers, that's the reason why I chose to talk with you, nothing short of the real truth and truth alone. For a matter, I would rather have you kill the creature so we could stop wasting time and find another, as you slowly decompose and get buried to your death. At least for me, this seems like more than fair of a bargain, that of which would result in most of us getting what was needed and wanted with the least bloodshed included."And my option would be to surrender and be killed like a dog, right? The moment I would leave my guard down you'd take me down like an animal."Oh but that would be a lie, my dear sir, unless we'd be given a reason to put down an animal.'Caldwell couldn't have been fairer than he had shown himself to be to the man destined to die, as he came closer and was given a gun by Leeroy himself who appeared to have agreed upon this. There wasn't any training which he had suffered in the past, henceforth, he was less than unprepared for the fact and more likely to go ahead and miss the first shot, if luck that be.'Are you ready to make your choice now? Or should I shoot through both of you?' It was, after all, important to think about the fact that those things were a lot lighter and softer than the average man, henceforth the reason why the survivor was able to keep the creature still.'I'll, I'll let go of it if you promise to take me with you, those things that are coming from the distance. Our leader promised to take us as soon as we dealt with the rival gang, somewhere far away before he was killed."We can offer you the same and even better, but we need that creature to be alive and show us where their master went, it may be our only hope to get through."Will I be spared them from being taken as you promised?"You have my word, as soon as you lower the knife and go ahead and let that thing go, we'll be set to get off.'The deal went ahead quite smoothly, as soon as the man got the chance though, he a bullet flew just above Caldwell's shoulder and pierced both of the skulls of the survivor. He immediately fell to the ground, in a mad rage that lasted seconds before bleeding out of his eye socket.'What was that for? We promised to get him as well if he didn't kill the creature."We don't have time to argue, especially not for scum, we couldn't have trusted him to begin with, I don't know what makes you as certain as to what was to happen if it came for him to come with us. The first chance he got.. "No, next time I say we spare someone, we do it as I please, don't forget who's taking you away from this wretched world. Let's go now before someone or something kills this hopper again.' He threw his gun away and started following the creature, after all, seeing how it was somehow guided to a sort of pair. The men dreaded to look upon what seemed to be a swarm of hoppers that acted more primal than human, with their three legs as well as weak bodies, the facial complexions being far too gone to be recognisable as human. Moreover, they started digging in various places and looking through it, there were swarms everywhere to look upon, some of which wore some apparel which was easily recognisable by some men from the gang.'This isn't right, they couldn't have been as many as they are here, no one was as insane as the fanatics that gave their lives to the destroyers."What do you suppose it happened then?"I recognise those four in the group, or I think I do know what they look like, it was one of Sharp-Eyed Dead Bulls, something of the sorts if I remember correctly, but I'm certain those were their marks on the clothes. And those one wearing bandanas over their pushed necks, they were the Red Bands, known across every desolate corner as the most savage and repugnant of men.'There was at least a sign from the distance, as luckily for them, they haven't been seen by the hoppers yet. From as little as they knew of messages, it was obvious enough that danger could've turned on them at any moment. It was the perfect spot to hide after all, inside one of the partially crushed buildings, having its huge hole prove a well enough entrance for them.'What are we to do then? If what you've noticed might be true, there might not be a chance for us to get to close them unless that of which affects them jumps on us.' It was clear that their ammo was low, if not inexistent at least.'Is the rifle still working?"We gave you an empty one, in case you thought of doing something rash, as killing the man."Which you ended up doing immediately the first chance you got a clear shot."We have one bullet left, between."The man looked around and seemed to have counted only six of them all together, himself included, with the least to spare. Worst was the fact that they were tired and one of the worshippers had already taken a position for a nap while everyone was arguing about what was to be done about the swarm. Even with various looks then and there, they looked as if they were in the midst of changing and being taller, at least their limbs had become as such, only to help them dig faster and reach the ground before the arrival came.'We can only wait for the time being, so it seems unless we draw attention on us, which would be for the worst.'It wasn't as if they have plenty of options to go around, but it seemed as if they were halfway through the ground and going at a rate which would cause the tunnel they were making to collapse onto them. As deep as it originally went, the sudden fall of the ground above them shocked even the likes of Leeroy.'Damn things, you said they'd find us a way through."That's what I thought, but I wasn't expecting them to be as dumb as to become almost driven by their impulses."Find us a way out then, we're on a ground limit, don't you forget in the least about that.' It wasn't enough that he was under stress, but having to deal with the man made him even more so than he had already been.Nothing could've been worse than, especially since there appeared a problem which neither of them could've handled as they walked. It was surprisingly so, that whatever they found down there as they dug themselves in managed to come out in such a manner. From a small hole from which was due, a song that hurt those with ears and which were alive, the depths were talking and one by one, the men fell to slumber, seeing the same happening to those hoppers before they were done. Nothing was as disturbing as the desire to escape that thing, but the depth of the sleep forced Caldwell to look upon the future pale. Humanity ended and nothing was there and once he had seen the destruction and eternity, he was forced to travel to aeons through the endless space.Those eyes weren't meant to see it through, as a matter of fact, neither were the urchins supposed to be there with him either. But what they saw together would remain, as he came to that ship which lay floating into space. Men and women laid into the most lurid of metal coffins which appeared too dreadful for his sight alone.Their apparatus and devices appeared diabolical in nature, not to mention that there seemed to have been the presence of a caretaker which always came to sight and could be heard while he was around. Worse than all was that he walked, without his notice, in the dark. Room after room, they detected his motion and walked through the hall, looking at the outside of space and the many stars around, in trance. Something about this vision made itself feel right, the way in which it actually felt that he was then and there, in a suit which wasn't his choice, forced out of a coffin to explore.What had happened to them? Looking down, he still felt them tied around his belly but couldn't see either urchin well. There was a damning thing which he feared now, being the sound of some wheels walking, some sort of damning device, which must've been crackling then and there when it suddenly stopped.A metal gate opened at last, from which it was revealed that a machinery of some kind if that's what it could be called, entered the room.With a poor human imitation of a face which appeared to have some sharp ends at each side, there was a screen with some sort of made-out face created moving frames. It was attached to a long and slender body, which would've been worm-like if it weren't for the fact that it was made of metal and quite cubic in nature. For a moment, the poor creature seemed to wail as it walked in the same form as a canine would with its pair of slender arms which on their own evoked dread as he notices that they had muscle attached to them. From who exactly would those things be? Neither seemed bloody nor forced, remaining in a good condition, without having to prolong this examination, it raised itself, the horrid thing is like a giant on its feet. The fact that the hall was also as to fit its height didn't help either, nor was the mesmerising sight which brought some sort of message of the sorts. No one was safe from the sight of Agamemnon, no one would dare defy the caretaker as he approached. For the time being, he took no notice, but approached rather slowly and grabbed Caldwell by the hand. Such gentleness came unexpectedly as if had been used to carrying them around as the sheep came out of their flock. Though going into that machine to sleep appeared like a dreadful choice, I went ahead and told him to stay. 'Show me around as well, I want to see the ship today.' A change in expression, at least that of which it managed to display had come, to see the smile on the thing made him almost look coldly through his damn soul. It wasn't human, it couldn't see through him, at least that might've been his interpretation, though there was the uncertainty which brought him to a knee to say. After looking at the side of him and seeing a name embossed on the model. 'Show me around Agamemnon, I feel like I want to have a walk around the ship.' There was a pause where he stopped, still keeping that smile, remaining in a positive motion. It moved not an inch, and the door at the end of the hall closed. 'There would be no walking around while the others sleep. You may disturb them with your nose.' Said Agamemnon, while for not a moment was the hand taken out. Beyond his comprehension, he looked around and found himself half-dazedly going towards another one of those metal coffins that of which models he had seen before. It was in the likes of a giant morgue which might've had the portion of variously set furnaces that might've incinerated every single body which laid in sight. Such a dreadful thing that was, the thought alone dissuaded him from wanting to return. 'Let go of me at once I say, I've a right to do explore or see something until I return there.' With a flash on the screen, the smile disappeared, leaving nothing but a sight of supreme neutrality. 'They weren't holding hands any longer, but Agamemnon appeared to follow him silently, recording the interaction and seemingly distraught. Nothing would change the expression, not that anything would've appeared anything less than disturbing on a flattened screen. He followed, with each turn that Caldwell made, he saw how he looked at him, how he'd dare try walking through doors he thought himself far beyond being allowed to get. There was that constant following which made him shiver, being looked upon but never talked to, the silence which the raised corpse felt before being returned to the morgue from which he was found. The lack of help and the way it acted made him feel like some sort of child being looked out for so he wouldn't be caught falling over himself like some sort of silly creature. By the time he came to his senses, past the point where they've met, he appeared to see some panels and apparently some doors that had different kinds of codes. Nothing changed from the looks of it alone, especially since the numerals appeared to be universal for most mouthbreathers of the universe. 'May I enter the code then or is it something I am not allowed.' By the looks alone, he was paid no attention to, it looked as if this Agamemnon was caught in his own world as well, though it was quite fascinating even to him, he dared not call or dreaded to trouble him then and there. The code was something of nine different numbers and it seemed like there were some sort of holes below it, mainly for something to be inserted in. That much, he knew, at least after watching the other ones. 'Could you open this for me? I seem to have forgotten the code.' Agamemnon turned and gave a dreadful stare at the implication that I even knew what I was talking about. For someone to wake up from the morgue and claim the codes which were belonging mainly to the living was beyond mundane. 'Fine, I don't know the codes to get in any of these rooms, may I enter then?' There wasn't any change on the monitor, though he appeared to comply to the likes of him, showing through the hand one of the wires which inserted the code into the device. Caldwell was immediately pleased to see a room filled with storage bottles of many kinds, struck in every spot of which they might be set inside, from the smallest to the largest box. There were others, all in tightly packed exteriors of gloomy tight metal which might've seemed rustic if another man was there to look upon them. 'What's inside of them? I mean that in the most quaint way possible.' 'Wouldn't you like to know?' The nerves on that machine made him almost blush and make his way towards those canisters, though to his avail, there wasn't any way for him to actually open them. Most of them were either tightly locked or unable to be moved because of their insane weight. Speaking of which, he dared not try to move the Agamemnon out of the way as it waited, but merely had to ask him to go back. 'I need to see something more pleasant, what would you recommend?' 'Returning to the place from which you came out of.' Responded the strange concoction of steel and cartilage, looking rather amused in its small box where nothing could harm it, if only he had a metal pole or some sort of magnet to teach that devil from inside of him some manners. That way at least there would've been a reason to grin about in his way. No shortage of rooms he checked, the more of which it appeared that they were in the storage area, that of which he had failed to read while he was there. On the reach around, he stopped to look at every door and realised just how many of them would be there to reach while he glanced back at the machine. 'Why haven't you told me that this is the storage area? You've made me look and touch and waste my time on containers that didn't even open.' 'Tired enough to return to resting?' 'How can I get to another level? I looked outside and managed to see that this ship is big, enough that it should holster at least a few levels below.' 'You've looked outside?' For the first time, this thing looked surprised, to the point of having replicated some sort of emotion, which was more or less an illusion that of which he knew about. There was some importance to the fact that it required some information to know about, at least to know what might've been he saw. 'I looked through the opening in the wall when I first met you, that's what I meant.' There was some disregard to that, not to mention the fact that it was something scum would lie about, though there wasn't a moment when he thought that he'd believe what really happened there. 'Now that this interrogation is over, may I go for the lower levels? I desperately want to see the ship, through and through, for as long as I may be awake.' Which wouldn't last by the looks of which he walked and saw everything shake? Whatever it was that drove him to feel that way, he wished it would all end before he was caught in a peculiar state. 'Follow me then.' Answered Agamemnon, as he made his way past the gate from which the storage room said there was. Plenty of repairing tables laid in this room, older models which might've been usable even by him if he was given enough time to find out how they worked. From the looks of the tables with their metal arms and half-built machines, they were failures, unlike the current model which worked. 'Why are they were abandoned like this?' 'The production of the model was stopped, there was the time for the assembly line to be delayed and eventually dropped.' He could see some models which were completed and left on the wall, hanging, most likely they would've patrolled every side of every place which laid inside of this ship. Now, what was left of them might've made for scrap metal, if the eeriness faded and the place was set with the likes of other men such as himself. 'We should take the emergency elevator if you so desire so greatly to look around.' The annoyance at his wake appeared to have somewhat ceased as they walked together. It appeared as if the elevator was slow, or maybe it was the presence of this machine that slowed things down by making them much duller than they appeared to be. Nothing could do against the desire to explore, though he felt that he was restricted with that thing around. For example, the elevator room was tight enough to fit only but a few men, and there were plenty of small roundish clasps that appeared to interact with one another if one were to push them around. It seemed as if the entire elevator depended on how they were set around to work, with little to no exception. 'Don't touch those, it's dangerous.' There wasn't even a slight head turn as those mechanic words were muttered, making it less doubtful of the fact that in case something came to be, there'd be no stopping it. 'Can't I even try to mess around for a bit? I mean what's the worst thing I could possibly do if I were to push some clasps around?' 'Those aren't clasps, they are the remnants of a broken panel and in the case, you do not fall and convulse from shock, the elevator may fall and crush you to death.' Certainly, the thing box was made in a way that there was little to do in order to destroy it. Even from the looks of the monitor, it looked like the glass, if glass it was, showed some signs of being reinforced. The silence grew to a foreboding rarity, now that he started at it. Still, he thought that it may be that Agamemnon lied about the entire situation with regards to the broken panel and the chance of death. Something really bothered him to the point where he tried the clasps and pushed it in. At least a sound was made and it appeared like the elevator stopped and the door opened. 'You lied to me, haven't you?' 'It's time to visit the other level and return.' As coldly as he could, he tried not staring at the sight below. It was at this point that he realised that he was walking on nothing but the endless space, everything around being just an image of what laid outside in the vast eternity. Caldwell's mind could do less to comprehend this world in which he had asked the machine to bring him, to the point where the dead man fainted at the sight. He was carried, to say the least back towards the established spot from which he was taken and placed back to sleep, another dead man in the morgue. By the time this wicked dream ended, he woke up to what had seemed to be a devastated land. It was too late from the likes of it, the urchins were deep in slumber, the men had either left or were dead, every hopper had disappeared or covered themselves under and now, as he dared to look farther than his eyes. Pure chaos reigned, as the sky darkened with blue and red, thunders coming, smoke blackening the upper world. There was something which made him tense, as he looked at the ruins, then saw that the hole which came through the earth such as a spear would be left uncovered. Caldwell slowly made his way through the ruins, only to get to the point where those who couldn't fend for themselves stood at. Somehow, this anomaly or rather, this torment had managed to avoid them, to the point of having them gaze at the sky and how it was pulled farther above but the waves of musky air. 'What happened here?' With a startling jump, two or three jumped from their spots and looked as if they saw some pale ghost. Their sound even disturbed the urchins which looked mightly surprised as well. 'They have taken over and destroyed it seems. They left behind him a black trail which darkens the sky and taints the air, mankind is sure to die.' To which more dire words couldn't have been said, for even the present men around him looked upon him in despair, if what was said was true, whatever they have brought from below and their realm, it would soon kill the remnants who hadn't died from the initial assault. 'How long do we have, oh strange creature which looms around?' 'There might be less than a year before everyone dies, less for those closer.' An approximation leads to at least a few days until the toxin took effect and killed them off, that it if weren't for the thirst and starvation to come first. Most of which laid in sight were long overdue and death was most likely to come in a way or the other. 'We have to return them.' 'Oh take us with you, take us with you.' Tried saying one of the men, but from the frail complexions, whoever came closer was shoved aside by him. If one alone remained to survive, it would have to be him, perhaps his pets as well. 'We'll have to return to the swamp, to the morgue, I mean the dark city that looks like some sort of.' The word for it couldn't have been farther away from his mind, at least to the point of wanting to find some sort of meaningless equivalent, that of which wasn't as important at survival. It was obvious, as he came to the edge of the bridge that they were unaffected by the destruction, even by the effects of the drowsy air. He could even bet on the fact that, if the entire humanity was brought to this city, most of them would most likely survive this cataclysm. Not that it was much of a fair trade, the denizens still looked around at him, or rather behind like some sort of startled petty swamp troglodytes. Nothing would've been more insulting for the layman if that of which he would've been, but something was bound to change now that his presence was known. They appeared to have regained the same position in which those folk always seemed to be, either at a stand, trying to sell whatever scum-ware they found or to try to convince him of one thing or another. 'Hello sir, having felt under the weather lately? Would some warm scarf make you feel better?' The immediate response was to look upon what she had, on her tab, it seemed as if there were mostly clothes that belong to people on the other side. It was preposterous to be sold that of which belong to the poor and those who might've escaped the destruction. It annoyed him utmost supremely for him to look with such distaste. 'Where'd you get these from then? I must know, tell me in this very second for I demand it.' 'I don't know sir, I'm only the ma'am who sells it, nothing more.' Another man near her, who was apparently another one of those fiends which tried making a dirty penny from the likes of him interfered. 'We're all in the same basket here as we take our stuff from the travelling merchant and he sure tells us that he gets his everything from everywhere else. One time, he even seemed to have brought a small infant.' The warning for him to shut his mouth had come a little far too late, at least now that it came out of his mouth Caldwell knew of their deals and decided to stay away. 'You don't know what you're missing sir. Damn you, Brey, he already left, you just couldn't keep your mouth shut, could you? Just had to talk and talk to the only customer in a hundred miles came to see.' 'It wasn't my fault Freck, I merely was trying to take your side, see? I've only the best intentions in mind no matter what you may think of me.' There wasn't any sort of satisfaction whatsoever to be gained from their discussion, henceforth, it seemed to have lead to nothing. Caldwell continued walking, down the steps, past the gate, around the street and right where they thought they heard as well. 'Continue this way, this must be the place from which we came.' It seemed like the folk which lived in the house never bothered to lock it, even if her husband did appear to have cleaned and patched the entry from the floor. There was at least an apprehension of the look he was given, now that his work was to be ruined. Before Caldwell entered, there seemed to have been such a proud look on the man's face, now that he had patched a clean what might've appeared to be a structural destruction of an integral part of the floor. Now the man that of which he thought it his darkest dreams as well as in his nightmares returned and even dare mutter a word this time around. 'This cannot happen, not after I worked so hard on this.' Tears almost came to his face as he dared not speak another word to the creature or set of creatures which presented themselves to him. 'Do we go now, or must we tarry a bit longer to know what's going down there? Where is the one who rings the bells?' 'I don't know but we may be able to listen and guide ourselves to her from below, it's worth the shot from what I might say. Now out of my way you dirt-scum.' With a kick to the shin, Caldwell thrust the man as far from him as possible. The work which was done below was only recent, henceforth, it came off and was shoved against one of the walls with ease. If it weren't for his poor wife to comfort him in this moment, he would've certainly had it worse at his very own heart. 'Monster, why have you come to my house? Only to destroy back and forth with your evil servants and mad speech. You only bring hurt to others and dare turn your back when someone dares confront your side."Don't try me you boob or I might come and tie your knees and teeth to the side of the stove and make it that your wife lives all alone and decrepit for as many days as this world of yours has.'Neither muttered a word in return, at which his sides appeared to have a malformed grin that kept growing somewhat larger. Nothing made him happier now than imagining himself just stomping over them, but this wasn't about to last. Something had happened below, a reaction of some kind which destabilised the ground from solid and made it into a non-hardening liquid.'It's because they were gone for so long.' Noted the urchin after looking at what seemed to be the formation of the gas. Clouds were forming and moving around but he was immediately informed of their ill-conceived potency. A shimmer of light came from above at least, as both concerned hosts looked with the least of fear at what reigned below. They were being paid little to no attention whatsoever as he made his way through. It concerned him a lot to the point of having to stay away, his feet even started pushing him farther above, at mere centimetres from the liquid, signalling that it might've been something worse to stand upon.'We must take that wench and have her brought back to where the bell rings.' Before he could look or pay any attention whatsoever, he looked around to see the guests of honour. Much more than alive, they appeared to walk freely below, stretching, as well and pushing their legs farther apart, darkening the hardness into pools and the pools into gas. They had been the reason for that, but he hadn't been aware at which extent of their power did they cause all of what had happened above. It would've been a lot easier if there weren't so many responsibilities hanging over his shoulder, especially not at this hour. It was a dangerous road ahead and peril laid in every virtual direction which could've possibly been taken. Henceforth it seemed as she was desirable all of the sudden until the time came or unless, the same fate might be happening to their world as well if another world this was.'We'll have to listen, you urchins will help me as well this time, if not, we'll all end up in the gutter, not just I. There's the song of the bell which keeps being shaken, I know she must be close, but I cannot pinpoint the exact location."Listen and be quiet, float slowly where we point towards.' From their guts now, came the light bulbs which pointed whatever artificial ray it could produce in the direction they heard it as well. Everything was way too complicated with so many stairs placed under all of the houses, not to mention the danger which laid on the fact that one could go ahead, misstep and be punished. Men have vanished in worse ways from which they were told to their spouses, not to mention that he had nought to be told about.'You know urchins, I must say that I have grown fond of you, to the point of having outpassed the need to have someone like me to walk around with. I know you're busy trying to find the wretch, but I would truly enjoy it if you did remember this from now, just how much I've become attached to all three of you.' This appeared to be it, judging by the magnitude of the bell, from which it came, the same ordeal as well. They climbed the stairs and forced the door open to find the wretch having grabbed the rope in its mouth, looking much worse than it had looked before. Not only was she not the same way she looked like, but it almost seemed as if there was a dreaded thing about her nature now. Some pheromones, the stench, the lack of light in the eyes coming from the fact that she went on to the most monotone task she could've done. Even Caldwell's presence meant to her that it was time to leave this place, at least from the concoction in her head.'Let's make our way you grotesque creature, we've been through enough and seen what a world without the bell looks like, you've got a task and I've got mine.' Which was fairly so, since she went ahead and started going down the ladder, never taking her eyes from him, even walking backwards with her finely set up stretch and malnourished feet. Something dreaded on the sight of the giant colossi made her dread the way and return to the place. 'That would never do my dear, for the world outside is ending, the hole of which they made, just look.' Farther away, she could look at the waves of gas which had taken the appearance of a streaming river that poured itself through a valve. It was poison and she could smell the stench from where she stood. 'We've got to go through the same way we came from, but the way ahead isn't clear.' 'We do not know, we cannot tell but if they awake, they will walk again.' The thought alone made him shelter his eyes from the eeriness they provoked. An approach in their direction would've been the worse thing he might've done, not to mention the fact that they were close now, they could feel it. With those destroyers out of sight they went, after a while, it seemed like he had found something of a sign to see whenever or not he was heading in the right direction. Buried in the thickness of the anomaly below laid the many corpses of the hoppers which had tried to stretch themselves to breaking points. Slowly, their bodies were in the process of decomposing, as well as he had gone away, he started to feel the gas which made it harder to breathe. 'We cannot stay here for long.'

With a glance at the wench, it appeared as if she was unaffected, some of which could be said about the urchins. Worse of all was that if they decided to abandon him if they could be tied, there wasn't any hope left for their world. 'No that I would care about that by any means possible. As a matter of fact, why should I care about anyone else but myself or rather ourselves now?' There was little to no reward in waiting for an answer, seeing how the wench only followed him now like a listening servant which did anything her master told her to do. Such was it now that she came to her senses and appeared to be truly guided. 'There it is, good girl, you've outdone yourself in the most atrocious way, I'll make sure that you'll be rewarded.' Oh but that dreadful hour which did come, when one of the destroyers came to the circle made out of the bodies of the hoppers which laid in the way. 'Dreaded abomination, why have you come here at last? Must we face one last test before we are left to return home?' There was no echo whatsoever and the creature mindlessly stood there, not seeming to even notice the insignificant insects which appeared to be buzzing at its feet. It might've had something to deal with the fact that they could all be crushed in an instant by another one of them but neither of which came to their senses and appeared to have been caught in their circles. Moving in such manners was worse than looking the fool, but neither did display capabilities of speech interaction, only the obedience and destruction. Nevertheless, he wanted to get through, he needed to do it by any means possible and there was only one of them standing in his way now, the lesser of the gang, the guardian of the gate. Waiting there, he laid humble, trying to think of some plan of some concoction which would last them enough that they'd get right through, but nothing would've come to it. 'Could we walk around then?' It was an unanswerable question since it appeared to be obvious that the legs stretched in both directions, making it almost impossible to get around. That of which left him barely two options, either to climb one of the legs or worse. He chose the latter and walked afraid, pointing towards the wench to follow. It was still so that the giant creature didn't appear to pay any attention to them, making it much easier than he had thought it to be. Since that moment, he went ahead and came face to face to it, from his point of view, it appeared as if he wasn't standing in front of a colossal fiend, but in front of an unbreakable wall, surrounded by unbreakable and unmountable tubes which held it down from hurting others for the time being. 'If this fails, we may stand at the chance of being crushed under the weight of this thing, do you all understand the risk?' As he asked, Caldwell went on grabbing the wench, holding her as stiffly as he could, undoubtedly feeling a shiver of disgust there for the oily skin she had. It was after that that they came close and started floating underneath the creature and through the corpses, at a time going ahead to feel their slithery bodies and glancing to see how they peered at him awakened. No, they weren't dead, they were such as children were, now he understood, under their mother, ready to grow. Many laid mad and malformed, being cosy in the heat, sipping of the dark air which appeared to somehow drug them into supreme submission. It was half-way that he couldn't hold it any longer and found himself tightly set inside an empty space surrounded by the hoppers which did nothing but watch intently so far. Creeping, he desired nought but to get far, or at least for them to stop trying to envelop him with their blanket of skin and loosening of thought. 'I don't think I will be able to stay long in here and keep myself as right as I can. There's nothing I would've desired less than to take you back but I'm afraid that this is exhausting as long as I am to go with the two of us, especially since you're the one dragging us behind.' There was some utterance of words but they paled since Caldwell went away, leaving the poor wretch alone to find itself in thought and solitude. Surrounded by babies it knew that they would eventually come to hunger and come to the only sound realisation which remained for it to be eaten. Such was the reasoning behind the fact that she went ahead and took part in their maddening rave, absorbed by the moment, a sufferer unknown, which started eating through the hoppers, that in hope that it could get through. Like a worm, she started trying to push the others when it found out that the meat was tainted, tasting such as dirt or stone, hardening at the touch, leathery in texture as well. There wasn't any way to keep it in the mouth either since there'd be no way to deal with that taste. It was labour but she knew it well, that one day she'll meet that man again. 'Which brought him to the point of stairs, luckily the arch and the gate have only been momentarily pierced by one of the legs and hadn't had the chance to cause any real damage and destroy the entire gate, crushing his only way out. He was aware she was left behind, but now that he was there, there was only a chance to return.' 'We need to find a way to reverse the ritual which has brought us here. Damned wench, we could've used her in some sort of way to find out what exactly there had to be done. Now we cannot even continue that way, we can't even look upon ourselves and think of something less or something which would bring us back.' 'Fret now, for we are here and we can say there isn't much.' 'Just go ahead and walk.' 'There shouldn't be any trouble unless there's the sea to swim through, which would be hard enough for you.' 'With words of encouragement, he walked ahead, crushing small crabs who found themselves there on the grey sand, something laying in the distance as well, producing the light. At first, he walked around, in what seemed to have been aged from which there came no interaction and no way whatsoever in which he would be taken back. He had gone ahead, and wished for it, alas. 'I need to be taken back from where I came from, just put me back there.' There came little to no consolation, with the air being pure, he couldn't complain about anything other than himself and how far he came to be. Anything less would've been the death of him, speaking of which, as he spent the day and went on to the first berries filled bush he ate from, ahead of him he looked again. From the looks of the wench, it had spent most of its time crawling, dirty from the blood which had come from the leather skin, eyes blotted and almost purple. She seemed to have been covered in some sort of scars coming from trying to drag itself through, but most of all, the creature appeared to have been in some sort of delirium which forced it to appear like an escaped patient coming back to life. With her there, something appeared to have made itself snapped, shaking ahead while the gate and the exit started pushing itself farther away. Some sort of distance laid ahead but it appeared to have been the same entrance from which he had come. The only problem which remained now was the fact that he feared to approach the fiend. There was no fear which could bode well with him, neither could he deny that the creature somehow appeared to bear no resentment towards him, since moments passed and it hadn't come any closer to charging him through the underbrush. He appeared to weight his chances while starting to walk towards it. 'I'm not sure this might be safe, but she's a component to this gateway to our world. Whenever we agree on it, perhaps it would be better if she accompanied us some more.' There were some sounds of agreement, which weren't enough. 'She might bring danger, she might be it, you might not be safe around her yet.' But the warning wasn't to be heeded though her body had taken a turn for the worst. By the time he was in her area, she immediately took a ten feet stroll towards him and stopped, with no resentment and no hatred being shown. 'You know, I was planning on coming back for you once it was safe for me to travel. At least, that's what I truly planned on doing. I do hope you won't come to hate me for trying to escape, if leaving there was my plan, there'd be no way the two of us would be here together talking.' Some grumbling and twisted teeth came into fruition, attached to a coiling bile that pushed itself out of its mouth. Whatever she ate, it appeared to have dissolved some of her bone along pieces of her jaw and teeth, at a point where she seemed to speak of ill. 'Home, bring home.' There couldn't have been more precise words at which there wasn't any other option but to comply and move ahead, with at least a shimmer of curiosity, the same muck below which hardened, but this couldn't have been their home. After glancing around, there appeared to be a giant stairway made from the corpses of the giant destroyers there, which appeared to have been crushed against one another into their pile. From below them, there seemed to have been a battle, which results as they approached, the urchins called it. 'Loner, single destroyer, look at how he's done it. Only one remains at the eves of sight, supreme creature, which glows in the dark.' After his brothers were slain, there seemed to have been this separation in which it waited, with a glowing above its head. At a moment of sudden interest, it seemed as if it raised itself on its feet, having noticed them walk towards the stairway. It couldn't have been that they were seen though, as, from their point of view, he looked to be at the size of a small insect, from which they would appear microscopic from its point of view. At last, it seemed to have noticed and started making for their direction. 'Let's hurry before it reached us, I cannot stand to walk again but we need to get through there!' There came no fruition but as they made their way up to the gate and fell on the first step, it seemed to have stopped in the distance. It felt as if they, no, it felt as if she hadn't existed. It took Caldwell a moment to realise that it could feel the vibrations in the pool from which the wench walked but as soon as he did they were safe at last. 'Be careful and listen to me at all time, this may be different than what we know.' There couldn't have been anything less of a maddening thought, as a simple touch phased the door, which was now left open for as long as the construction lasted. A room which laid twisted that they walked on walls, the door appeared to have been built on the floor, while the other one now laid useless and coveted for the rain. It wasn't that alone which appeared to be twisted, but upon entering the world, he seemed to be appearing at people who were like him, both in appearance, though much-varied insight and weight, though swindlers at heart with somewhat the same desires and tricks to get what they wanted. 'Good day sir, ma'am.' The latter fell off when the man had taken his eye sockets off his real eyes to noticed what she was. He wasn't the only one who appeared at her, under the light of the two stricken moons, the dark willow trees. It looked as if he was gone an entire season, for winter was about to come. The cold guttural wind did something for his mood, in the sense that it made him look rather pale. Or could it have been the fact that he was somewhat ashamed to carry such a creature among people who were like him? 'My luck indeed to stand out in a place where it'd be easy to get yourself lost.' Muttered Caldwell to himself, in somewhat of the spirit of the past. Undoubtedly this place had a warm appearance unless you counted what happened in the other city, where men were rough. In the station, things were empty, all the offices had them stay. For as long as they had their faces pierced by giant holes they couldn't properly work but wait, until something came to solve itself with little to nothing of their assistance since most have been disabled. Poor creatures after dark, some came closer, pushing their hands into one another's hole, creating dark shimmeringly evil concoctions that walked on four but had no mouth, no nostrils and no sight. Blinded by some force which was unexplainable, in their brown uniforms tainted with grey, the mad creatures tried walking in the most peculiar forms, with little to no regard for anything or anyone in sight who might've said anything. There were some pairs of ears but those of which were tied to them couldn't have been entirely called useful either. At least not for them, not any longer since the only sound they could hear was the dry humping of the creatures above. 'It wouldn't do, the body grows weak and the mind will end as soon as the body starts to die off, do you hear? Do you even care?' The wasn't much of light inside, neither were their others at night, since they couldn't all be watching at the same time without the slightest tip of sleep, it seemed as if neither of them did care about the repercussion of what might happen if the next one died if it came on to the table. 'We'll bring another, end of the discussion, there's no need to preserve them as much as we have to since we've already come onto something such as embalming them while still alive. There's no need to bring someone new until they're all consumed, is that clear?' There was a short delay on the communication device, but at least he understood, moments after came the clear and he returns to the eeriness which the mine provided. The foreboding fear that he might end up inside of that giant vessel which laid in front of him if only the bad words were muttered. A funny thing how the dust particles appeared to have survived there while floating. There were days where he thought that even those things disappeared in its presence, leaving it only to beat hunger's edge. 'Feed me.' There came the paranoia, he expected it, hours in this suit while being cooked from the sun above during the day, insomnia which kept him awake at the worst hours. It all leads to this point where he'd lose his mind and start listening to that thing. Without the least of a feasible way, it couldn't have spoken, it wasn't aware. 'This body is done, bring me another.'

Despite covering his ears through the muffled helmet of impassable atoms, he could still hear it speak, knowing, expecting somewhat that it was capable of communicating by other means which weren't humanly possible. 'I must call the chief, he'll be able to bring you, someone.' 'Now.' Came to the voice demanding, without having him know or be aware that he had already traversed the rail system, perhaps somewhat of hundreds of miles, perhaps to the point of a few kilometres. Before he knew it, he was inside the cabin, with John, the guard. 'Rough night, huh? You seem to have almost seen a ghost, have you?' 'Or been one I'd say.' The man appeared to have enjoyed that rhetoric a little too much. 'Say, do you mind If I leave the section for an hour, without being signed for it? Off the record I mean.' 'I don't know what to say about that sir, there are the system and the files which need to be set at all times and I'm not entirely sure that's what.' 'Please, it's just something I need to do and the chief wouldn't let me, it's my daughter, I desperately need to see her and you know how it goes in this line of work.' There couldn't have been any other sort of excuse that might've worked, but he knew that John there had twins while another was on the way. 'Do you suppose you could let me off the record for this one hour, for the sake of my child, or that of yours if I ever were to cover for you?' The man thought a bit, but he knew that this was only some sort of curtain, that he had made his mind ever since he had been brought to the attention of his children. It was a shame that before them there had been a miscarriage but he had said nothing to remind poor John of the thing, at least he thought he did so. No, the man couldn't remember when he had taken off his suit either and dressed in those clothes he has never seen before, neither how he came into the alley, with a few, if not eight people which were taken down. With a lantern in his hand, he checked each and everyone there, from their features to their height. 'Have I taken all of them down by myself?' He wondered as he continued the routine checking, the man has to be the proper height and weight as one which was being drained of his bodily size and fluids, but enough that he'd be taken in and adapt to the previous requirements. This wasn't the first time he'd done it either, ever since it started speaking, orders such as those to regulate its meals had somewhat come to an end. That voice did far too much to take him off his guard and have him go ahead to do its bidding with no question asked whatsoever. In the least, the man would do, middle-aged, slightly fat and easy to be carried along. Of course, he had worn some gloves as well as having to carry, under thirty minutes the bodies back to different places, just so that he wouldn't raise any suspicion. At least four of them had been drunk but he couldn't tell of the others. He was shoulder to shoulder now, with that man being dragged, by the time of which he had this manoeuvre which he had been guilty of in the past. Under the underground railway system there was that small cabin through which everyone came and was noted, a small wooden, if not supported by some bricks, but a box, nonetheless which seemed to have been there since forever. It wasn't huge enough that it wouldn't fit, on the contrary of which, if it wasn't for a small detail, which was the fact that there was a small crawling space through which a man would fit, between the walls of the railway tunnel and the walls of the cabin. From there, the man would be set to be taken through while he had himself ready to put him in. Such as before, there was a rope around the man, just so he'd be dragged through, not to mention that the obvious creature was heavily drugged. There wasn't any confusion as he passed through the checking, not a nerve that was intact, as the guard looked at him and then glanced at the clock. 'Not a minute over, I would say, you kept your promise and haven't been missed either. Was seeing him worth it?' 'You know it was John, I tend to do this every and so, few times often, it means a lot to me letting me go see her.' He nodded and let me through after a suit was taken and the rope, there was little illumination in the tunnel, which was the main thing that really made it well. The door closed immediately behind and I had to make sure that the wouldn't immediately open the door to catch me. Moments such as this one were perhaps the worse ones in the whole entire process, having to deal with the worst to come. At least until half-way when he dragged the man and picked up the rope, carrying him on his back, the heavy fellow was still rather passed. It wasn't even obvious when he arrived, but he found himself standing in front of the vessel and looked at how it suddenly started pulling through it the many biological remains the man had inside of him, even the material in front of his very eyes. With the now shell that remained, it appeared like it was dragged as well inside of it, like a thin sheet of newspaper, seemingly taken away like it'd mean nothing to him, nothing whatsoever. He hadn't seen nor had he looked, how the naked man was placed inside, soon to be covered in the previous clothes or a replica of the material and what he wore. They had been tailored yet to fit, even though he had to get rid of the rest which laid on the ground, the rope as well, there was some sort of stove in the back which was used regularly when there was a need for this sort of thing, with coal and a time, the clothes turned to ashes and he returned blindly to the strange concoction which forced him to do, whatever it had happened. He looked at the man inside and hadn't noticed a change, to the point of even coming to wonder, had it even happened? Even by the looks around and by the time the fire died out, there were no traces, not even the ash, nor any signs that he left his post. Could it be that the man inside had even been replaced? Judging alone by the face, the resemblance was uncanny. Not that it mattered, that would be enough. The extra shift would arrive in at least an hour, he wagered, and everything would be done. Inside of which, the layman still, despite being drunk, it was somehow flushed out of the system as it worked its way in, not that penetrating such a confused old mind mattered in any sort of manner. He was somewhat surprised to find himself at home, eating with his ex-wife, out of a chicken bowl, no bones. 'That's a bit too spicy my dear, you're bound to pull one on me if you keep serving me this.' As usual, she'd give some sort of kind eye, a fake smile as well. 'It only brings out more spirit out of you that way, my dear.' The latter being added rather mockingly, as it was obvious, once he rotated the table and switched the soups that it was only his which had too much pepper, far too much salt. 'Woman, you're bound to kill a man with so much, when you'd rather have nothing on your side.' 'I've only thought that you'd like things to be different, that's all, I wouldn't have expected you to react in such a manner.' There were some stare and before it could evolve into something which might've been preventable, a knock on the door came. He was the first to get at it, since he had already raised himself, seemingly to involve himself into some sort of process of punishment involving her. It would've been nothing short of a brutality in spirit, which came out of a common ruse between spouses when he opened, yet to see. A strange fat man wearing a belt of utmost peculiar appearance which stood out. 'It is you I've been looking for, I knew for sure.' Though when he realised that the man in front of him almost appeared such as a perfect reflection would be, other than the stump, he suddenly woke up in his bed, alone. 'My wife, where? She's gone.' The downside of the dream was also that it ended so abruptly that he forgot what happened next between the two of them. Her presence was still missed, even with the fact that he couldn't have shown it in any other way possible, or at least anything short of tracking her down when the mood was eerie. It might've been better to drop it all down and return to the mundane, his small apartment in the city, the cereals which laid on the table and the dust which became hot milk. Looking back it appeared like some much has changed that he wouldn't even recognise himself that way. Even down the waist, he thought of the dream and the fear that he might end up as fat came into being. 'Don't worry Prince, if ever I decide to become that way, I'll always have you try stealing the food from my plate.' He grew rather fond of his cat, even treated her right in the many ways which had become possible ever since he had been alone. Only the most expensive tuna found as cheap, and the undergarments, which she bore none around her pretty black dress of fur. Though the palace was in no condition to hold her grace, there was still a desire to keep her around, at least until someone else was to be found. She ate well and grew to a size no cat in the wilderness would've come to be, in a way the creature had exceeded the past expectations which were tied to its species, rather looking greater than any of the previous cats he's had. 'I should give myself a pat on the back this day since I feel as if you've grown at least eight inches from what you've eaten.' An unholy thing happened that he left without his breakfast that morning, having to reach the workplace earlier than he had ever dreamed off. In his mind, there was some sort of importance tied, but nothing could've made him forget, nothing whatsoever of who lived at the end of the corridor. Even with tens of doors and friendly neighbours, there was that one which really got on his nerve, a man that couldn't have been called a man, a dark crook, a being of spite which was the last thing he wanted to deal with, especially in the morning. He stood there, smoking, despite the fact that the rule of the apartment and then inner corridors said exactly that you weren't allowed. The man had himself standing at the frame of the door, with half inside and a half outside, managing to add an insult to injury and rather insult every poor soul in the building which wasn't a smoker. With which there was no light, this wasn't the case of wondering if he had been seen, for the small ball of flame which came out of his smoking bulb was pointed directly at him. If it weren't for the dim light of the setting sun and the flicker coming from above, a dying light bulb which never seemed to be changed, though the intervals in which happened varied far too much to wager a change. You'll have to close the door and walk past him, don't say a word and don't let him push you around. That's what I'm going to do, I'm a man and he's got no right to treat me in the way he wants to. This sort continued at least until he reached the middle point of the furnished wall and the flickering stopped, luckily for him, he had been given a rather good look at the man. It might've been awkward to stop and stare but he didn't dare call any attention to the obvious nor on the fact he smoked. His eye, to be precise was of a dark shade of purple, and his cheek remained bloody pink, his lip was split into halves and he dared not say anything about the knuckles. 'Howdy neighbour.' Was at least the thing which came to his mind, though he wasn't in the least prepared to respond, nor to say anything at all. La Croix left the room and muttered to himself nothing less than an anxious set of redeeming things. You've done it old man, dear La Croix, you've really made it out without a word, it did happen as I wished for. The other neighbours he greeted also looked at him like a madly jolly fellow whose done something which no man would've been happy about, not in the least one who's faithful at heart. But Croix could split fingers and sing with his thick accent while rubbing each hair of his goatish beard, he was content with what happened and no one suspected a thing. Such it was that on the way, he met with a strange, right on his track to work in order to pay. 'Here's the rest that I promised and thank you for not pushing it to leave him to the hospital, I wouldn't have born the thought.' 'Walk with a clean consciousness, our deal is done now. If you ever need something else, you know where to find me.' There was a common nod as from a working man to a working man which left them to go their separate ways. In the dark alleys, he avoided going now, since there was something of a chance he'd seen. That flickering of lights happened into the places where there were no lightbulbs whatsoever. It must've been a trick of the mind, but he saw the man at the end of the deep and wide dark tunnels, while was waiting for him. 'No, no, had he seen me talk to the man? Could he had noticed the fact that I paid him to do that?' 'Well, there wasn't any satisfiable answer to his question, nor was there a way to know, in the alleys, between buildings, a bulb where there was no ceiling but a floating tube of light which flickered and went away, enough so it would leave some sort of lasting impressions. He stood away from those, even from the system underground, he had no car but decided to walk. No dark place, nothing tight, nothing of which would've made him give way to what he's done. He realised only then how vague the image and the emptiness could've been if it reflected in some sort of black pool off the ground. A small light and the same beaten man who waited for him to walk by. He couldn't have known, I'm sure of it, I'm growing to be paranoid, that must be it. Croix was losing his grip, stumbling and mumbling as he was almost hit by a passing car on the road. 'Excuse me, it was my fault. Sorry, I didn't want to.' A man smoking in the car, with his hood down in that tight place wouldn't do for the image he had set to himself in his head. At least nothing would do as long as he was alive, being able to find out whose paid for the job to be done about him. In the least of the moment, he took a break on a bench, after getting off the road and hinted at something his mind. Even placing his hands atop his eyes triggered some sort of light behind the eyelids, which brought to him nothing. He was content with letting him know, at least that might've been the reason for his return. It had to be mainly that, why else would he had come to the conclusion, without having to reach the man and stand before him, being embarrassing as it was. The door had a ringer next to it, but Croix dared not ever press it until he was certain enough that he had something to explain to him, at least a way to reach to the man despite being someone untrustworthy, a monster in his eyes, per say. His mind was empty though, as long as he stood there, nothing would come fast enough to be able to explain, or it might've been the repercussions which finally arrived in his mind. Images of him being flattened under his boot, or being stipped and thrown into the street, worst of all, being beaten to a pulp, to say that inflicting at least the same amount of pain to him was an understatement, at least that of which he knew. Henceforth, it was time for him to flee again, and deal with the light of guilt as he could. On the way, there'd be a need to explain why exactly he came as late as he arrived at his workplace, but no one dared notice his absence. Everyone was busy in their small office, and he made his way quite neatly to his little cage while waiting at the sight of Grey. Even before the creation of panned windows, he knew that humans had a way to spot dangers or feel it in a way that expanded the normal sense. It was a mystery why he stood there in the chair where consultants would normally come but there was no denying that he was waiting for him in a most demeaning manner. 'You're late, again, and this time it looks as if there was no slip which dragged itself as far as this went.' 'I'm sorry sir, but I wasn't sure what happened on the way, It's that I've been seeing things that weren't there and.' 'Don't break on me just now, especially not since there are important sales coming.' 'I'll try my best.' There was a whine from the opposition but he didn't appear as if he was going to leave, on the contrary, he actually had his tab of notes with him and papers, and the sun didn't go down either. Hours, they must've been, which were spent with the man. He dared not think the reason why he chose to spend the hours with him, especially lately, not to mention that he was overworked as well. Looking back at the clock, it seemed like the man forced him to recover the entirety of the lost dates every single day. No one was in the building now, other than the two of them and he could yet see one light somewhere in the building, right by his eye. There'd be a long journey home and a lot of figures to be accounted off. 'Think we can make past it? I highly doubt they'd accept something as big as an offer with others being there with him to undercut us.' 'Trust me with this sir, they have nothing that could do, what we have here is a sure deal. It may be that they may put on an act of refusal, just so that they wouldn't be considered weak, but that's about it. As I told you, if they're making an offer which is lower than what we originally planned, refuse it, we got them in our hands, we can't drop them now.' Something clicked there, at least that which he knew or cared, while thinking of this sale, he also dare think about the man of which he was about to confront. It was a mere thing that they said goodbye for the night, he never even knew how he got home either. With a bottle of Der Grenaie in his hand, empty from the likes of which he placed his other hand and pushed his breath out of his mouth, drunk as a soldier, hurt from the war. After at least five attempts, he managed to set the key inside but stood still until the light from above faded. It was a system which didn't seem to work well, especially since one from the other side of it didn't trigger the entire illumination, not that it would've been well for all, but he was just in the perfect spot. Someone was in his house, at least a figure which was bigger than the man he'd seen. There was a smaller figure which he dragged, and from the looks of which, he dared not think who it was, or why was the flaming butt of the cigar shoved in his eye socket. Without the least of a curious glance, he stopped trying to enter the room and made it for the stairs. Whoever it was there, he left the premise and managed to drag a stainless body from inside. One mention had to be made for himself that the door was close but he heard a muffled hit from below. If something had fallen or grabbed his attention, he came to his senses and turned the light into the tunnel through. His key fit just right in and as he made it through, he slammed it shut and closed all his locks in a reverse manner. Whoever it was he would've noticed the fact that the light came as well as the slamming on the floor. Croix stood in silence and in darkness, next to the door, he listened as the clicking noise of the illumination went ahead to alert everyone that the lights were out. Yet something moved there, barely so, but he could hear it move slowly enough and sparse that the lights wouldn't be triggered on. There might be a burglar I say, coming to check whenever or not there'd be a witness to his lawless nature, but what about the body? There wasn't any way to peep through the keyhole though there was enough of a hint when the light turned again outside. He wouldn't complain about the fact that he wasn't to be seen from where he stood, rather than got comfortable enough, avoiding any sight and trying to get through the night. Speaking of which, as soon as the light outside faded, he crawled through his house, all the way up his bed, filled with tears of tiredness, only to be content of touching the softness of the material at hand. The next day he found himself awake, in full might, before making but a single turn. A body laid in a chair right next to him, someone had entered the house while he was sleeping. Slight palpitations came to his heart once he saw the decomposed thing which somehow had a yellow shirt and blue pants, the colour having ran among the melted skin which appeared to have tied the joints together as well as to the chair. 'Anyone there? I don't take kindly to this sort of messed up thing.' Obviously, he was nervous, more so, the body and the chair were both brought to his room, especially since it seemed to be coming from an ancient lot. Now, there appeared to be some sort of problem which remained, he went ahead to call upon them, since the corpse started creeping him, stopping at the right moment from pushing in the numbers. From the mark on the back of his head, he had to deal with some sort of lunatic which wanted to intimidate him, that should've been it. The corpse dragging from last night. It was when it clicked, it couldn't have been the same men from a few steps away, at the far end door. Croix closed his eyes, yet to see a light or smoke, that of which at least was cured, but how would he deal with some sort of corpse which was dragged and brought back. Mostly so, since there was a way that this would be tracked back to him since there he hired someone to beat the man. 'You're overthinking it, my friend, may I see what you're gawking about for a moment?' 'Who are you, what are you doing in my house?' 'Relax, the door was open, I closed it on my way, good call by the way.' The man which had entered wore an ultramarine suit stripped with matching white, from the coat to the pants and even the belt and hat. A clean shaved, barely any other feature than his clean appearance, smoothly moving to say the least but most importantly, past his dark locks, he was calm. Way too calm to be at the scene with what might've been a victim of the electric chair, something which had burnt the poor creature past anything that might've been considered in the limit of human decency. It somehow managed to make him more uncomfortable than the corpse at bay. 'You know what'll happen when they'll discover you're hiding a corpse, right?' 'What do you mean by when? You haven't told anyone now, have you?' 'I'm not saying anything, I've only come here to help and you don't seem to be in any position to decline.' It all appeared sketchy, the moment he woke up with a corpse, the gentle knight came to help, asking for nothing but a kind reward. They must've heard that I paid for the man to get beaten and spoke to him about a plan to make me play along, that must be it. Croix thought of everything ahead, even with a jerking smile, he thought himself clever to have seen through the act. Walking forth the corpse, he felt around it and pulled a limb off the chair, making it appear as if the material wasn't actually holding together with the bottom. Henceforth it seemed that there was some sort of bonding which was there. 'This procedure may need you to get it out with the chair as well, not to be rude or anything but you'd make it worse by leaving evidence behind. It's the smell and all.' Plus, he managed to see just the level of detail as a layer of crisp skin laid out and fell. It wasn't burnt though, those weren't burns, regardless of whatever it was, human or not, those marks were something that he couldn't fathom thinking about. 'I'm afraid I couldn't afford your service.' 'There'd be no need for payment, my dear sir, why I have come here on good heart, only to be able to help you in time of need, there's nothing I would wholeheartedly do but come in need.' Again, there seemed as if that appeal came off as some sort of distraction from their plan, as he had to have a partner help him, especially since what he saw in front of him was a task for two men. 'Where do you plan on taking this, if I were to agree.' Before talking, he went ahead to remove his striped gloves, whilst making a few steps for him to get a really good view on them. This was a man who wasn't afraid to get his hands dirty, as well as he knew that there was a way that the money which was earned to buy that suit wasn't the sort of common people had. He was to be trusted for as long as he cared to stay in his presence, which instead was for him to accept his offer. It wasn't as if he kept money or anything of value inside his house, he was poor enough that raising enough to have his neighbour beaten took a few days of saving. Though the problem got itself known. 'How do you suppose we'll be able to carry this unseen through the daylight?' 'Who said anything about it being unseen.' He clearly planned this all along, ever since he first laid eyes upon him, he was aware of it. What other kinds of man would bring with him in the sort of three hundred candles, perfect for such an occasion which would require melting them over the corpse? 'You'd better start now and help me light them up.' 'Right away, I'll bring the lighter and perhaps we could both do it at the same time.' 'No, I was thinking about something of the sort of raising the heat so they would melt easier than at a normal flame's speed.' 'But I couldn't do that.' Said Croix, seemingly surprised that the man even thought of it in that manner. 'It would do nothing else than spread the entire smell throughout the house, without exception. Not only do I have to deal with a body but with the smell as well? That wouldn't do.' 'In case you have not noticed the room and the house already has a smell to it so I believe you're late on that.' 'Who are you anyway, I haven't even had the pleasure of knowing what you're called or how you appeared at this right time.' 'Well I'm the gravedigger, remember? You're the one who called on me last night.' The revelation seemed a farce, though something of sincerity and remorse about the guy seemed to satisfy him less. It was the fact that he somehow just came to offer the service for nothing, free of charge, after seeing a dead body in full state. 'For disclosure, I'm not the one who's done this, I barely woke up in the morning with the body in my house. Someone else brought it to me in the middle of the night.' 'I believe you've told me that on the phone as well if I'm not wrong, that's why I brought the candles.' 'No, there's no way I could've called you, how would I even know your name or address, let alone number.' To prove himself, he appeared to have come in terms of looking inside his small phone book, most of the numbers inside seemed to have been written by hand, by his own to be precise. Speaking of which, there were no professions listed under it, but he appeared to have a vague recollection of each and every one of them in that book. Claire, Madame Jorie, Jonathan, Tom, another Claire, the list went on for plenty of pages, as many as the thought did go. But, upon reaching a certain page, he somehow had a feeling that this man was called Ross Heredot. 'You wouldn't happen to be Ross, would you?"The same one you've called to help you, now about the heat."I won't turn on the heat to spread the smell, there should be another way to melt those things at a faster rate."We could bring it to the kitchen and close the door behind, the least of which it would smell awful while you'd be cooking.'He scratched his head in dismay, looking for a way until he came to look upon his tools, his father's tool which he may have kept.'I believe I may have some sort of blowtorch laying somewhere, my father used to work as a plant engineer and there was a lot of repairing involved to the metal hulks there.'Ross nodded and continued lighting candles, planting them on various spots across the body of the man. This was a bad idea, to begin with, not to mention that it might be a waste of time since people were a lot more quickly to guess at that. He took the torch, nonetheless coming to check on it to see whenever or not it worked.'Just like its first day after manufacturing.' He took a swing as well and came to see that Ross had been prepared for him to come with the torch, seeing how he had placed the candles everywhere on the body. Some of the top and the bottom, ready to be set upon. After a half an hour, the man seemed to have been transformed in a life-size statue, seemingly closing into the night. He appeared to have lost somewhat the meaning of time since the day was coming to a closure.'It would seem as if we'd have to do it at night, nothing short of a well-endowed coincidence that we found ourselves going forth in this manner, isn't it?"The same thought occurred along the way, he couldn't pass forth, nor would he care about what manner of thought that was. He was getting rid of the body and ready to bring it to the cemetery at night. Empty streets and somewhat secluded passages managed to make this an easier job than he thought of. It seemed, though, something was off with the place, as much as it could be told about the silk road of the dead. Black dirt and yellow stones, bones left outside, it was a matter which required someone to have done his job, and this so-called grave-digger didn't seem to care.After a hard stare from me, he decided to defend himself on the matter, replying by a simple jest. 'Do not worry about those my dear friend, it's only that they're fresh that's all, hardly standing in the ground. It's the type of place where the dead refuse to step in line and stay inside of their dreaded coffins.'What about this fellow? Will he stay dead like the rest of them or come back for some sort of revenge.'There was less of a jest coming from Croix, who never found himself as a believer, but he went ahead to see a smirk, no answer at that of which would've done well to slain his belief in what was right. Nonetheless, he helped the man in digging a remote spot to which people never dared approach, shovels being always upon him. It was a marvel to see them come out of his suit, almost from a secret pocket of some sorts, which was more silly than he thought about, especially since they wouldn't fit. He kept a decent appearance throughout the encounter and did nothing more than smile at him in a pleasant manner. They have succeeded in getting rid of the man.In a blink of an eye, the man wasn't there, which could only mean one of two things.'Ross, where are you? I haven't had the chance to properly thank you for what you've done to me yet.'There wasn't any answer, which meant that either he would join his fellow and rob his house or go straight to the police and lead them straight to the evidence which laid in his apartment. Which in the least included the candles, the stench, perhaps some of the skin flakes which might've fallen. It made Croix go ahead and turn into a demon of flight which lost no second through the passages he had been, the things he had seen would make him no lesser man, he thought. Right by the time he entered the door, empty, no one inside, no robber, nothing appeared to be in disorderly conduct.'Is anyone here? I have the means to defend myself and this house of mine so don't take it as I wouldn't have the thing for it.'No answer, at least not what he'd normally expect from having been there for minutes. This time around, not only did he close the door but managed to go ahead and put a chair and some sort of bag on it, for the counterweight. There'd be a way for his to know when someone came into his house, not to mention that there was a second door which leads through the house adjacent to all the rooms. It was important than before he went to sleep to have a talk with that man since it wasn't the dead of night yet and he had his number, Croix was in the perfect position to call upon him. Five minutes in and the person answered. 'How may I help you?' 'Is this Ross?' The question was immediately answered by a yes, immediately being closed after he realised that the man he had been with wasn't the same man he had called. Who was he then and how had he known about the body? A certainty came to mind, that he might've been the partner of the other man whom he paid to beat his neighbour, though nothing would come to it on an empty stomach and a tireless mouth. After some sort of dinner which might've been demanding for a man of his age, he drank a cup of wine and went to sleep. I would know if someone were to come inside, most of the windows are closed, all the doors lay open, I will know. The night went on as if there was a silent storm going outside. He had done well into doing what he had done with the windows and what not, in the least he'd need the disturbance of a storm. The calm was there and the sleepless dreams came into being, he dreamed that he was there with him, not under a mound of dirt but in a crypt which he knew to have belonged to the deceased man. Apparently, he might've been of some worth if he was to be taken there. 'Professor, we may have to turn on the lamps now, have you brought yours?' 'What was that?' I asked if you have bought yours, I am somehow surprised sometimes about how clueless you can be. 'The light came and it appeared as if the assistant was the same man which helped him get rid of the corpse. He was extremely tired, too much to be able to comprehend what was happening, but this ancient spot appeared to have lead to a deep underground structure, the type that would've been used as a tomb for an entire ancient city. 'Follow me then and here, hold my lamp. I'll carry on with a torch, at least until we've lit the inner chamber.' That bastard even had a fake accent while he was interacting with him, no matter the ruse. 'Why have you brought me here then? What's your end game?' He didn't look but pointed at him to follow. Apparently, there had been cracks where sometimes dirt came off, and just in the right spot, there it was, he knew that it must've been the spot where the wax man had been. Sleep-walking and the ridiculous dress might've explained something but this was damning if he could tell it. And the ridiculous act to make him think he was the professor of some kind of exploratory fashion was beyond the absurd. A lurid dread filled him as he was given a long sharp pole and pointed at the hole above the ceiling. It was a long thin stick of metal with a sharp end. Apparently, he had planned this for a while, for the exact spot and the lack of reluctance did a lot to him rather than to make him turn back. 'Will I be left alone after we're done with this ordeal.' 'Free as a bird Professor, you'll be scott-free of any responsibility related to the likes of which might've been invited by the authorities. Carry on with your task now, I believe you won't have all night to go at it.' A solid gulp came to it as he went on to wander in the dirt. First, through the various layers of worms and roots then he impaled one of the feet. 'I think I got it, the first try as well.' Through as he went on ahead to pull, it turned out that Croix had managed to pull the leg apart from its entirety. 'It wouldn't do pull him to pieces, I need all of him, not to mention that I need him whole. You'll be responsible for sewing him once he's out of that hole.' The warning managed to at least shift his focus to pushing ahead and trying to impale and pull the chair out, being the least of his concern to look around at the ancient crypt. Many of the tombs laid about and started creeping him the least of manners, that might've made him join them if he screwed everything once too many times now. This must've been planned, though it was the least of his concerned, as the body fell with the chair as well as with a lot of dirt which followed from above. 'Should we worry about the empty hole which will remain there? I mean it seems like a lot of dirt had fallen off.' 'Don't worry about that, we have someone else to take care of it.' It was the thought and the look on his face that carried their conversation to an entire level of distrust. Another man, he thought, as he started sewing the body together, he would have to get the needle through a layer of wax as he made his way through. The blasted thing, he thought of it at least in a manner which made him want to run away, but a body was pinned on him and they knew his address. 'Would this do well then? I believe I've sealed all of the pieces which were cult or impaled.' 'Very well now, just as I was expecting, it's a whole new level I tell you. Now do me a favour and pull him out of the chair, regardless of how much of the skin might fall off, I need him out of that thing, especially since it served its purpose.' The hardest part was, of course, left to him, having to peel off, as the decomposed body seemed to have become part of the chair, among the skin and the wax. It was disgusting, the feel of that warmth which laid inside, he hadn't felt that before. At least, in contrast with his wet feet, he felt as if the man was still, somehow alive and had kept most of his body warmth somehow. That was ridiculous, but he looked ahead to see that the other man was too busy to look at him as he did his job. A better moment wouldn't have come as easily as it had now, henceforth, he came closer to the chest and started hearing pound after pound, the dreadful thing was still alive. Croix jerked back a few steps after the revelation, knowing that there'd be something he could do now, especially since he had already freed the back and the hands before thinking of pulling him out of his prison. Would the man walk again? Blindingly so, the deafness of which would turn the man in a creature of undisturbed relentlessness which could bore something of a dark thing related and tied to him. He must've heard me, he must know of my name, I am sure of it, he knows I must be responsible for this. While the other man had turned his back, he came closer to his earshot and whispered. 'A few feet ahead lays the man who did this to you. I'm only telling you this because I believe he's planning on placing you alive in a tomb for your final resting place.' Hope bore him to think about a chance that there might be in case the partially tormented body found a way to move. It hadn't been long before a tormented laugh could be heard from behind the wax. 'Don't make any noise unless you want him to know that you're here. Just remember, he's right in front of you, he should talk to me from time to time, use that to guide yourself.' With the least empathy tied to his plan, he released the legs and watch the creature rise. He hadn't planned on killing the man, rather, stop their quarrel after he passed out. 'Is everything all right there?' 'Everything's going rather well, just a few more spots which are rather tied well.' That was it, the creature was moving as it was told, and the man hadn't turned yet. Who knew that it wasn't as hard of hearing as to find him on the first attempt, and that dreadful look as he finally turned to shriek upon the adversary marvellous. Despair and dread filled the man who had lied and called himself Ross, not to mention that Croix wanted to turn and shout let the man go, he had learned his lesson, we can make amends. It never came, to his surprise, he came as a shocked cat, walking a few steps only to realise that his life was being spilt out of his body. There was little he could do other than to grab the piece of a fallen rock pillar and knock the creature out. Being forced in a dreadful turn of events, both the creature and Ross had fallen and as he made contact with his head against the back of the coffin he had prepared, there was a thump and a dilapidation of his eyes. The man who had entitled himself as Ross the gravedigger was dead, next to the mummified remains of the other. A nightmare to look upon, he made it for the stairs upon a dreadful dark and somehow made it, unknown to him, unto the empty streets. As far away as from the cemetery as he was, he hadn't looked forward to the trip home and what would be expected out of that. Either he was spilt and his house had become a trap or that he'd be taken in by other forces which didn't belong to his world. Everything he knew was beyond contempt, before realising that it might've been three or four in the morning and he hadn't got a blood shut-eye. This was at least the feeling of a tormented soul caught in flight, fitting in the key, making his way to his apartment. Only one thing still stood with him, especially since it was a coincidence of high regard. Another one of his neighbours decided to stand up at night and smoke his cigar, it was the dead man who glanced at him, just as he did in return. Obviously, it wasn't the same since he had thought he saw some sort of ghost as he passed down the corridor towards his apartment. But it was the man himself, there wasn't any mistake, having the same bored expression he always had and even the lack of contempt into his mind. At least he was aware of the fact that there wasn't any way he could guess what happened, there was only a need for him to go to sleep, finally in the midst of the coming day, he'd work tomorrow and escape today. With an alarming image in his mind, his hand shook, he moved his arm, entering his house to see that he was still in the bed sleeping. 'How could this be, why is there a man looking such as I do?' The hands matched as he compared, apparently he had forgotten to change into something more or less heavy on the side, but that was in the least important. A decrepit thought, something he didn't care to explain happened but he finally touched himself but saw the most fantastical thing happen. It was almost as if he was a mould of clay which was being placed inside some sort of figure, as uncomfortable as possible he was twisted just to match the man who laid in his bed, being pulled, through the blanket, his bones flattened and as he entered the other body, nothing happened. Sleeping for far more than it was needed, he woke up immediately to a knock. First, he felt his hands and moaned, remembering most of the recollections of what happened the previous night. The thing was that he wasn't tired in the least, a bit stiffy but he could do better, after which came the next reaction, which accompanied the sniffing. No smell whatsoever in the house, no wax on the floor either, everything was cleaned, just as to hide the mark of the man who had been there. A muffled cry came from the backside of the door, still, someone was desperately trying to knock. 'I'm coming in a minute now.' Hopefully, he didn't hear the other most obscure vulgar evil which came out of his mouth at the end of which he raised himself and pushed the dust out. Apparently, some of the ancient spiders from that tomb had accompanied him and managed to climb on the ceiling. Either some delusion came to his mind or the small arachnid he was staring at had the uneven proportions and bulk to it that belonged to some small rodent. Seemingly, it made the smaller ones, which had laid in its web, caught and ready to be devoured look like long-legged balls of yarn in comparison. 'I said I'll be coming, just give me a minute.' He came at the door, never losing eye contact with the arachnid and its grey cloak of stone which covered it. It seemed like the young man on the other side had never been brought to learn about manners or when to stop. 'How may I help you then? It seems to me like you don't stop as easily from being an annoyance.' That was with the thought in mind of the salesman which went from door to door, he hadn't noticed yet the small bump on his cheek. It was purple, the kind which only came from being repeatedly hit on the face relentlessly by someone much taller and stronger. 'My mother, she's on the eight floor, please.' It seemed to him, looking down the alley that there were four or five other doors open there. Most of his neighbours tried peering out at him but neither of them dared help the poor lad or anything of the sort. It was a common thing never to get yourself with the feuds between families, especially since you could possibly drag yourself into one as well. But with a strong hand and a self-contained partially raised voice he only said. 'Mind your own business!' The slam of the many doors seemed to have been going on for a while, not that either would do anything less than eavesdrop or the sort, but he knew what to expect from the lot. On the other hand, there was the problem which laid in front of him. 'Listen, kid, I don't want to appear like a heartless person or anything of the sort.' Though the little devil was in tears, already trying to get some sort of a reaction out of him, not that it worked as well as he had hoped for. After a long night, just speaking to his parents would be just what he needed. 'Fine, let's go, lead me to your apartment but let me do the talking.' He was already five steps ahead before Croix turned quickly to the bathroom and grabbed a small pipe, hiding it behind his back, it was thin enough but made of hardened copper, with some mark of some acid aside. A weapon which had horrid marks all around, which he hoped that would at least scare the man if he found out that he had hurt his child or his wife. Each step ahead felt heavy, especially when they came to the stairs. Door locked, everything taken care off, none of the windows open, he felt as if he was back in business. At least until he saw a younger couple just pass by and greeted them. They might've smiled if it weren't for the fact that they saw him follow the boy and stopped to nib at his sweat covered linen shirt. 'I don't think it's a good idea if you're heading where I think you're heading.' 'Would you please take your hand off my sleeves? I know perfectly well what I'm doing, I just want to have a talk to the parents and find out why a beaten crying boy turned out at my door the first thing in the morning, that's all.' 'What about that?' She continued after pointing at a form which she clearly recognised as being a weapon. There wasn't any logical denying in that fact, so he might as well come clean. 'That's only in case our talk gets rougher, nothing more, it's not unlike I'd dare do something else to the man.' A slip almost came to the point of hurting him, at least in the way she looked at him there. Her man didn't seem too interested in the fact after all a beaten child was involved, though she wasn't about to give him the time of the day. 'Don't do something you'll regret, whatever their problem is and with their child, it's only theirs to take care off. You're not a violent person, I've known you since I came in here but I can see that something changed in you, as I'm sure that the old Monsieur La Croix would've never done something as rash as you have.' 'I've done nothing as of yet my dear, this is merely going to be used for intimidation, as I cannot stay and do nothing while injustice is at hand.' 'All I'm saying is to care, this change won't do you nor anyone good.' With that, she seemed to have grabbed her friend and pushed on through the rows of stairs. It wasn't her problem either way and the boy still looked rather adjacent to the thought of the man coming to talk to their parents. 'I want you to be brave now, I know this might look wrong but I promise I'll try not hurting your parents, do you understand?' There was a node as he leads the way through the building. There weren't any other sort of encounters, though something still pulled at his sleeve by the time they reached the eight floor. A manner of which made him shiver as the air around him grew thicker and malformed at which he knew that evil was looming around. Such a grim feeling that he was aware of when he asked. 'Would that be the door?' At which the boy nodded, strangely it was placed right at the end of the tunnel, straight ahead in the place where there laid no apartment in any of the previous floors, from seventh to the bottom. It appeared like it was a strange design on their part, not as interesting as seeing a basement filled with pipes which looked like a dungeon though. He still remembered going through it for the first time when his tap water stopped, at the word of the landlord, of course, which prompted him at least to take a step back. He had already reached the door and laid distracted, without realising that the boy had stopped right at the very opposite end, next to the stairs. It looked as if he was going to have to fight this for him, instead of the boy being as brave as anything else. Three knocks on the door, little to nothing happened. A bad habit as he came to it but at first he tried peeping through the keyhole, noticing that at least there was light as well as some sort of movement happening behind the curtains of a closed door. 'Who's there and what do you want?' 'Hello, I don't know if we made ourselves acquainted but I'm a concerned neighbour if that would mean anything at all to you.' A bunch of locks seemed to have been forced in the process of opening, at least at the point of various chains were dragged and the key was turned from side to side. He wanted at least to wait and let the man regain himself, he seemed to have sweated, perhaps worse than that, he was drunk. 'Tell me why have you come, no one's just all of the sudden concerned about someone he had never seen before.' Croix had to hold his ground there, a drunk man, filled with the various scents that accompanied one, sweat as well, behind him laid a disaster of a home but he couldn't stare for too long without the risk of being seen. There was at least a pause for him to breathe in before he was pulled closer by the man and shook. 'Well what are you waiting for, is there something you got to say to me?' 'Indeed I have, your son had just come down knocking on my door, beaten and in tears, care to explain how that happened?' All of the sudden there was a release, as the man had turned and made a strange motion of covering his face around with both of his hands. Looking back at the farther end, it looked as if his son disappeared in the distance from the sight of his father, as much fear as he was able to still in the child. 'He's dead, he's been dead for the past five years.' A tenderness might've come if it weren't for the strange twitch about the man. It almost made a maniacal sound as the crack went and his hands phased through his head. Some of his fingers took the form of his teeth and he continued speaking. 'I've made a mistake from which I can never turn back.' With one gaze, he revealed that he only kept sight from one eye as the other had become a contortion of the wrist, unable to speak properly either, he reminded him that this man, the creature had beaten his child relentlessly to a pulp. 'As much as I would be inclined to believe such a story I cannot believe a word of it.' The sounds coming out of his mouth rubbed him the wrong way, especially since the sudden movements of his hand seemed to shift his brain around the skull at dangerous intervals. Only now, to his surprise did it appear to have been relentlessly strange or decrepit, when he came down to an animalistic manner, to which he pulled the pipe and snapped it around his skull. With one blow he was down, jerking as his hands tried getting out to no avail. He was dragged inside by Croix, who looked behind of him to see that the only witness remained the presumably dead child. The sick joke wouldn't last long now, all of which he had to was making this look like an accident at least. After closing behind, he seemed to have moved around the house to notice what kind of place it had become unless it had always been that way. There were no signs that what laid on the walls and the decay being recent, no, even the windows and the view had something of the outside world. What a hole he had been living in the thought, as for the distant power plants which appeared to blow the dark smoke in the distance, he could say no more. 'Great view from here, I wish I was the first to come here, I might've got it for my own.' No small talk with the man who had passed out, horribly so, he thought. It was enough that he had dealt with his surroundings, though there hadn't been any signs of a woman being here. Could it be that the boy had lived alone with his father in this place for years and decided only now to seek help? Hardly believable, he thought, at least in a way which brought him closer to the being which laid on the ground. Croix started dragging him by the legs but even those appeared to be disjointed at a mere touch. Lately, he felt as if he had that effect on people, especially since the dreaded night, everything he touched went wrong for one reason and another. 'It's what you deserve for lying about your son though. How could he have been a ghost if others saw him? Didn't think you'd be able to answer either way.' On the desk, he also noticed the picture of their family and how they seemed as, from his point of view a further lot happier than before. At least he could look and tell of better times, in the meantime of which, he started going into the secluded area and bashed what had remained there with the pipe. No blood came out and he was aware that what he was doing now had been a supreme breach of trust against the forces which impeded the law in the universe. 'Sick, sick, sick, your son won't have to deal with you any longer. He'll get a new home, a new family and a life that doesn't have to be this.' He hadn't realised that the man had died from the first stroke of the pipe he had achieved, at first when he fell over his head and managed to crack something inside his thin skull. There wasn't any satisfaction, but a body and witnesses which were aware of where he'd been at. 'They'll find me now, they'll know I was going at him with a pipe. Croix you're going to be caught and forced to go to prison, there's no escape for you this way.' At the end of which there came some knocks, the doors were seemingly daring to force themselves, but he closed his. He was aware of two things at least, the presence of three voices outside and the body which laid in the same room with him. This was it, once they would discover the body, there'd be little to no explanation of the act. Self-defence against someone who's been cursed to have his hands grown through his skull would stand against no one in court if he even got there. They'll have to satisfaction as they'll come looking for me, I would rather have it done by my own. With which he opened the window and stood at its edge, looking forth for one last glimpse of the world before he threw himself. An alarming shout for what he had done was mad alarmed the people who were inside and they broke through the door just to find a body sitting on the floor and another on the outside of the building, a neck which had been cracked and a spine shattered. It was this which made him wake, finally to his eyes, no pain. There were facets of rivers that went upstream into some strange cloud formations which had various hues of green and purple. Even being close to them made him somehow sick, but looking around he came to the realisation that he was nowhere near home any longer. This unknown place, this world, if it could be called this way appeared as nothing but a concoction of a maddening hell he had envisioned, seeing how the trees, if so they could be called were twisted in sharp angles starting from the base, forcing themselves to go back and forth into motions of defense. It was apparent that something coming out of him made them realise that they had to fear him. 'Could it be my smell which is the result. Where am I?' 'Follow.' If he hadn't seen with his own eyes he wouldn't have believed the small armoured hound with its jagged limbs and pushing jaw. It spoke to a point where he was indistinguishable from the average man, having the manners of waiting for him to make a certain move or to give some sign for him to wait before they embarked on the journey. 'What happened here?' 'You fell and broke yourself, look at your body.' It was a gaze which he denied himself subconsciously from the start to the very own moment when he appeared to have pushed himself on his hands, looking at a body that bore some regret. 'What happened to my body? Why is it so shallow and why does my skin repel me to look at? I can see no bones and nobody mass to look upon, no folds but something of which I don't belong.' It was partially true for only a half of his body, meaning that there was the other half which made him look as if he had been somewhat in the bearable state. No, it's a curse, it must be a nightmare, a vision, something which must be unreal. The irony hit him there once he thought of the creature in the terms of being canine, after all, he was the one acting like a dog, following and obeying the first which approached him. 'Where are you taking me now? Am I dead, is that the reason why I'm here now?' 'No questions, just follow.' That mouth didn't open properly at times, not to mention that there were those muscled legs which might've been enough to give him a run or worse than that. He was trying to watch his step, at least near the dying verdure on the ground, for once he seemed to have noticed something beyond his senses. It was some sort of insects, tiny, round, long-legged and bearing two ends which had heads, they appeared to be everywhere cleaning everything, closer to being such as microscopic mites though acting in a manner uncommon. They were strangely noted for the fact that they appeared to have crawled and went around his shirt, in an out but freezing under a direct stare. Without having to think much or dwell, he suspected that those near microscopic creatures had some intelligence if such a thing was possible. How else would explain the fact that one of them immediately disappeared the moment he took his eyes away after he decided to test his idea? There shouldn't have been anything of the sort, but he thought they dug themselves inside his skin and waited, many more to come. 'You must crawl first into this hole and follow us to our lair.' It was well for passing the time but he hadn't realised that they reached some sort of opening in the ground, tight enough for a hound but not for a man. This only seemed like a trap to bring on the prey inside and devour it with the pack, is so it could be called. Follow us it said, there could indeed be plenty, as it wasn't uncommon for him to think of some of them acting in the form of tribes. 'What I refuse? What's down there, your brothers? I'm not going to take the chance and be dragged into this trap.' 'Go inside, now.' There was no growl and no violence either, despite what it looked like, it didn't seem as if he was going to force or bite him. Croix thought for a moment, and just as before, the last moment he remembered before coming here was jumping out of the window. The least he could've thought of was brain damage in a way, so this might've not been as it seemed. 'Will I receive protection during my stay or am I to suppose you're only taking me to be served?' 'Just go inside.' At which he nodded and acted under the command of a strange new being he encountered. It was tight enough down there, to the point where he could feel the isolation peering through him. Not like the fact that the breath coming from behind helped either, but he was curious in the least, did they use names? He asked subtly and was immediately answered. 'I am called Gnaard.' With a long stretch of the voice, that seemed to have been more like a sound used to scare other predators around, if there'd be ones. Though in return he apparently gave his name, he seemed to have had some trouble pronouncing it right, from his mouthing, coming out as a different combination of wolves. 'Well Gerard, I'd rather like to know where I'm being taken, it's not like I wouldn't think I could be afraid of something that right now.' Right now he peered through a small hole from his right, most likely a natural occurrence but what he saw through it wasn't. The endless vast emptiness which poured into space did more than distract him, as for being so close to it and having the only thing stopping him from falling through shatter underwater and the sun. What could be the meaning of that? Am I taken to be executed or the slain? I would at least enjoy it if I were to receive an answer, that's all. 'Only after you've spoken to our pack, then you'll be free to leave.' 'Do I have?' There was an interruption, for he understood, and moments later as they walked, it gave him its word. Not that there could be much accounted for that but in the least, he appeared to understand why he was there. Apparently, many of the Gerard's, as he called them, thinking in the means that they were sharing in the names, no that they mattered as other humans would've mattered to him, he peered around. Far too many corpses of their kind spread around, on top of which, he judged to be their pack leader, tribe master, dictator which rules under an iron set of teeth. If only it weren't for the fact that they died of natural causes, no signs of fighting, nothing of which would've seemed to have suddenly happened, not one died of old age. Unless, of course, there was some kind of life-span he wasn't entirely aware of, they were systematically wiped off, he found out as their leader spoke. 'We're the sixth stock to be wiped off by this and times are getting desperate.' 'So you've decided to seek help from my side.' There were the chattering of teeth coming from the dead below, one thing which made him quite uncomfortable was the fact that it somewhat kept some functions alive. 'As you may have noticed, there's something that shouldn't have happened to a well functioning.' Following what it said were a pair of words which didn't sound in the least workable in the language he spoke, at least not until some changed and alterations came to be. 'You were sent here to help us be repaired, fixed, to avoid not dying and becoming like this.' Clearly, whatever happened to them below was happening to it as well. 'But I don't even know where to start, let alone come with a way to help you now.' It was as clear as daylight that there was little to no end for which they had to be through, he couldn't deny them yet, especially since they'd threaten him otherwise. 'Well, could I at least be given a chance to visit the others and look for something that's common between you all?' 'No, the symptoms are different with everyone.' That was precise and appeared to be undoubtedly a statement which was to be given. 'It's evolving.' It said, wiggling the canines back and forth at a damning rate which made him nervous. Something about a diseased type of hybrid showed signs of a sick animal and a sick man, the signs of which, when combined formed an image that was unimaginably wicked. 'Look at them, they grow bigger then float through after weeks of staying fluid.' 'What do you mean by that exactly, I don't understand how exactly they grow bigger.' 'Follow.' Came to the servant as he leads him back outside. It was still a longshot to be looked upon but he appeared to have had a good look at the bleak sky. Some sort of purple lead there with something in the distance, black bloated floating spots which didn't even come close to his sight at all. It took a while for his sight to emerge from which there came the image of the small almost muttering toothed creature in the sky. In the form of a small blimp, now it roamed the sky with others of its kind, as to be called on for a sign of evolution. 'Are you certain this isn't the next step in your making? It may be something less of a disease and more of a natural change.' 'It's been brought, from outside.' Again, from the way it looked with the many pairs of small eyes, he almost gave the impression that he might've been inducted into some sort of gazing event which Croix couldn't stand much against. 'Well, I don't suppose that when you talk about outside you mean me, like people such as I am, coming from the same place as I?' There was a nod and as he understood it since he's the one who came there out of nowhere, he might as well be the one to save them from this disease. In the terms of which he thought it to be partially true, in the case of which he was a carrier for the virus which affected them. 'I need to see the others nonetheless, do you understand me?' Without a doubt, there was a denial of the fact and a desire to stay as far away from infecting others, but as long as this small brute was concerned, the human was the one giving orders. No more pushing around from the four-footed blasphemy in sight. 'Well, let's make way for it.' Through the tall sharp gardens of unnatural growths, they went, slowly as to no attract the attention of bigger inhabitants, it explained. From his standpoint alone, he was abandoned there, send into some unknown place of vision that didn't resemble his idea of an afterlife at all. At least in the means of the thought that his body felt the effort and this place was akin to a place that wasn't to be his. He was denied satisfaction as he was afraid to ask to look around. 'How dangerous would this be, if I were to walk on my own around, with no weapon or any means to defend myself?' 'I do not know, follow.' From a small break, it seemed like those back muscles contracted as it almost stood on a sitting position with them crossed. Those two front paws unbound themselves to make for some sort of movable limbs and sharp claws that acted in the way fingers worked. It a strange way, they were so separated from one another that it might've been some sort of rake, formed to grab and manipulate the substance which formed the ground. Only now did he see the worth of the creatures, for he tried to imitate but hadn't succeeded. Something in their saliva, combined with the thing it grabbed managed to help it create various hardened shapes which wouldn't have been there otherwise. In terms of which the creature was the equivalent of a small forge or blacksmith of old, as it went on to make a small spiked ball. 'Couldn't you perhaps make some sort of armour from that thing as well?' 'Too heavy, slow us down, this is for protection, hold it.' Not that it meant much for him, but he peered around the ball and felt it, hard as steel, but was it just as resistant when it came to it? 'Only one of them? What for exactly?' 'If I run into bigger wrappers, I'll hold him while you come closer and bash the head with that.' Very specific about it, as it came to his mind that throwing the ball wouldn't have been enough. Though he was in the least aware, about the starless night and the mist which was unnaturally coloured and smelt like some wicked body had rotten in a pool of blood, he kept most of his senses sharp. He was set on finding out what exactly happened to those creatures to have gotten to that point. On the other side, it was too late, the body laid cold, broken bones, organ failure, the lungs had stopped taking air long before the medics had arrived to take him. No relatives, no friends left, just a mad delusion from what was said to the officer in charge. 'He was delusional, talking about some beaten child while he was making his way up there with a pipe, I swear it, officer.' Without the least of a concern, he sighed at the conflicting statements, as she and her man were taken separately and gave them written as well. A murder and a suicide, and the shown presence of someone inside, not to mention the forced entry. It had as little and as much to do with the man who fell from the top floor as the others. There was in the least a mention of the fact that there had been some sort of autopsy in the files. 'All well, here, it seems.' Investigator Lt. Mark AJ. seemed to have made a thought of the sort already earlier when the body was taken to the inner morgue and set for the examination. 'A most peculiar thing, sir, it appears as if the body suffered from a stroke and died before he reached the floor. There wasn't any suffering there from the force which dragged him down, nothing from before and from what I could tell, it was somewhat voluntarily from the way he was found.' 'What about the others? Signs show that there were others present at the time there. Do you think this heart attack might've had something to do with them?' 'Possible, sir, it would be possible that the man came in, killed the other and might've had a stroke mid-way. The other intruders come in, find the two dead men and think it's best to throw one of them out so they could make it more likely.' It did appear strange, even with the witnesses in the interrogation room, that something didn't add up, even with what was said in the morgue off record. That the man had a look as he had seen a dead man walking was another thing, but this, this was beyond reasonable. 'I've something else to tell you but it has to remain only between the two of us, sir.' 'What would that be now? Surely it could wait until the case.' 'No, it's about the case, it's about the man sitting on my table and what seems to be coming out of him, the entire body of his to be more precise.' That was relentlessly confusing, to say the least, but along it, there was a pool of blood which almost always accompanied the skin suit, even in the cold morgue, on that big table. 'This blood shouldn't be here, I keep cleaning it but the body produces, he should be dead but sometimes I feel the reflexes coming from him and worse of all would be a thing.' With a sudden pull of the entire blanket, it revealed that his fully naked body had been twisted back into a straight position, with the bones, mostly in the right sides but staring at the bright lamp was pointed towards his open eyes. 'What exactly is going on with him then? If anything, wouldn't this be a sort of coma or exhaustion?' 'That would've been that way if it weren't for the fact that this man's heart doesn't have the ability to beat, thing of which seems to have belonged to every human being that ever existed before him. Can't you see beyond reason that beyond all possibilities, this man shouldn't feasibly be alive at this point in time?' He looked at him as well and grabbed a glove. With the least of sense, he started pushing through his belly and dragging his hand around, seeing how it went deep enough, this body didn't act like the one of a human. Mostly, it was the fact that where his ribs should've been got replaced by his hand, at least for the few seconds they shifted position, lowering down to make way for him. 'You were supposed to open him, how come you haven't done it yet after seeing so many strange occurrences?' 'I have been trying to do so, observe.' After the beginning of a long cut, there seemed to have been some sort of result which didn't beg anything else in term of questions. The skin grew back, as the organs, though that still didn't answer the other problem, on the contrary, it kind of got into the way as well. 'Well, then how is that there's always blood if this man cannot be hurt and keeps growing where his wounds are?' 'That's the part where I was shocked as well, to say that I asked for a proper blood test with a few vials filled every single time I cleaned after him.' 'And the results?' Asked the Lt. indifferently. 'They all came from different sources, other than the one present here, different blood types but no human that ever existed, as a matter of which, they even found some sort of animal blood inside as well as something unrecognisable to the human genome.' 'So let me understand this, someone keeps coming in at night, bringing a lot of blood and pours it around the dead body, would that seem correct?' 'No, it didn't seem to be that way, Croix seemed to have been at it for hours after coming to the small tribe. Once, he had agreed to examine the creatures but he had already started dissecting with the little knowledge he had of the creatures and didn't get to do anything but get some thoughts surrounding some of the organs the creature had. It wasn't even close to the fact that there were a few untouched one, he hadn't a clean specimen to get a good idea of what those clean organs looked like. He wanted to snap and take his new friend as well and clean him swiftly around the guts, he seemed to have been the healthiest specimen so far, resistant to the disease, as well as prime in its manner. 'Bring me another one, this one seems to be spoiled as well.' It had its strange motions sometimes when the human behaviour could be seen, not to mention that he now used a set of tools to open the specimens for him. He didn't know much about medicine, but he thought that the answer had to be in one of them, especially the ones that were healthier, that way he could properly compare the two and see from where exactly it started. His tongue slithered at the thought of asking, though he dreaded to be taken back and bashed. Without a doubt, the one in front of him might've been the healthiest specimen alive which brought him the least concern when it came to the thought of taking its life. Just one cut would be what I need, to look inside the belly and see for myself what's it to be done. The tension between the two of them came to be closer to the thought be a bore, that of which it might've guessed by now, especially since he stared with his bloodshot eyes. 'I need a healthy specimen from you, that's all. It doesn't have to be a living one but if I am to understand what's causing this, I need it for comparison.' A moment passed when the cold staring fiend seemed to dwell on the thought, at least for a while. 'Follow.' At the direction of Gnaard, he appeared to go well ahead and get through the dampness of the hole, still haunted by what he's seen below. Seeing how this road ahead to the healthy specimen was to be long enough, he thought of asking. 'Why is that there's nothing below? Just an abyss going into a fathomless emptiness?' The creature appeared to be unaware but he couldn't stand still without shaking at the thought that there was a thinness between the ground and an endless pit everywhere he went. Passing through the weird conglomerate of fleshy forms that waves and moved, as to strike, he was pushed on the ground to walk like a canine. Despite what he might've thought, the fauna there had shown some sign of sentience, even mockery if the previous act could act as proof. And Croix was very much afraid of doing something that would anger those fleshy plants, since they appeared more than capable to move, strike, bend and push, perhaps to the point where he would suffer nothing less if thought is true. Without a doubt, this was to be the end of them, at the thought of which. 'We will burn it, we have to incinerate this thing.' Said the higher officer in charge, after seeing with his own eyes and there had been pools of blood time after time after being taken away in his presence. At least, to the point where he thought of something worse, he appeared quite well aware that the case was fixed. 'What about the on-going investigation?' 'There is no on-going investigation any longer, they're to pin everything on him, as well as to have this bloody body disposed of.' It did turn out well that he was more of a bother than any of the thought, as he had become a fountain of the sort, where his body produced more than a fair amount. 'Couldn't it be used as a blood donor or for testing? It seems to be a waste to have such a specimen he wasted, especially since this condition might give us a clue about the human body and its extremities.' Asked the mortician, quite surprised at the thought of it. 'We already sent the samples, but what neither of your was informed was the fact that each of them remained contaminated, to the point of it becoming less of blood belonging to a person and more akin to poison. The mere presence of the two of you with the body puts you at risk from what I've been told. It was all so sudden, too rushed to agree upon what was to be done, though his word came first, he was to be left and used the ancient furnace in the back.' 'With that said, you are released from the case.'

With that brief information, the man left and left the two of them to say their due. Nothing short of a handshake which wasn't followed by any word to be important, as the inspector left him to take care of the body. If only there was a better way, he thought, looking at the clock ticking, minute after hour, until at least he'd be sure no one would come looking for him or try checking whenever or not something was done. He was a trustworthy man after all, how could he do any harm? 'We cannot abandon you now, so I can only hope that you won't rot or be eaten by rats down there.' At the sight of one of the body storing tunnels there was a secret trap door which appeared to have been used at least from ancient times, which lead to who knows where, at least from what he was concerned, after all, he'd know where to dig from him. Just as soon as it was opened, he was thrown to a sledge and followed a long bloody way until the body of Croix found itself in a wooden room, having fallen through a closed trapdoor from the side. Certainly, another body was to be burnt and replaced by him, but there were plenty of undocumented people who died and had no families, nor friends, no one that would miss them, most importantly no one would know of that fact. There wasn't any doubt about the fact that they wouldn't even be surprised to find out a different body with the constant changing of his wicked blood. 'I hope you'll be safe there, precious specimen, I've not a doubt that you'll be useful one day when science might evolve past the capabilities of mankind.' He kept a prayer for both of them, as soon as he closed the incinerator and saw the body burn. For a moment he could see the spirit of the dreaded poor soul which replaced the bleeding man and shuddered at the sight as it desperately gnawed at the metal bars. It was enough for the mortician to go away until the smoke cleared inside the room, after all, this furnace was old, the system was flawed, the more he spends inside the room, the oftener he thought he'd end up inside. The corpse at the bottom eventually started bleeding as it had previously done, without the shimmer of realisation that he wouldn't be able to stop any longer. Unless the skin had come into the contact with that dreaded substance, there wasn't any certain way, which to say to worse was mainly impossible since the room stood just above an underwater river. Polluted by the substance's every drop, there seemed to be nothing there. 'Not a single one here either and I believe this is the third of the fourth one I was supposed to be checking. I haven't the time to go back and forth through them without results.' Croix still hesitated but he couldn't deny himself the thought of wanting to ask about the identity of the person in sight. He stood and wondered at him, without having to go ahead and touch the wrong ending, which would make the creature lash at him. Despite having examined so many, he had no clue just how strong those limbs were and just how much had the muscles worked to stray him farther away from the question. 'Do you want to witness me then?' 'Only for a glimpse, then I could be prepared to tie you back if you bring me a needle and something to suture you up. Nothing fancy about a quick glance inside, that's all.' What he proposed was rather mad, even for him, worse of all was the fact that the creature didn't only fear but refused any assistance which came after being cut open. 'It will grow back on its own, open me, cure us.' The way it placed itself seemed to have brought something of a wonder and fear for the first cut. His cold feet stopped him as he grabbed a piece of the fur and managed to feel just how warm the skin was and what would be inside. 'There'll be another way, I'm sure of it, let's just check the other holes.' With that, he wiped the sweat off his face with a piece of his shirt, seeing how the creature was still in that damning position, waiting to see if he'd act or not. 'I said I wouldn't do it, now let's go.' With an immediate springing to its feet, there appeared to be nothing of a strangeness insight, but for a fact, he bore some resentment for himself, to fear that it would involuntarily lash at him if he'd do the wrong thing or cut too deep. Somehow it was different when it came to cutting through a strange pair of being that was already at the bottom and technically dead, reanimated by some force or virus he couldn't point at. Worse was the fact that, looking back at it, he already saw under his very own eyes that they had grown large, like a bubble, not balloons, round, as they welded themselves to one another, coming in moving pairs of four or more. The eyes and extremities were around and from the looks of which, there wasn't any coming back from that point on, as far as he was aware. 'Is this the fate that's bound to happen to us all?' 'I said I would help, haven't I? If so, why is it that you feel like you need to bring it to my attention every moment of our journey?' 'Because I see no results.' It said, with some sense dryness around its jaw.

There wasn't in the least a doubt that failure would've meant. Something worse, worse than what he had experienced, especially now that his body felt weakened by an unknown reason. At least he felt the same as those creatures, in the terms that he fell to his knees, unable to carry or in the least, nor could he see well any longer. 'We need to find a cure before it affects you?' 'Affect me? I am more than well.' The man said incredulously, having been somewhat caught between holding onto the strong Gnaar, Gnat, whatever they were called, into what appeared to have been some sort of dark passage of the stone. 'What's this, who made it?' He had missed the part when he was dragged and obviously he wasn't lead into another hole. Whoever crafted the floor and the rooms inside the cave seemed to have had some skill in doing so. The dark purple, the grey and the spots from which there came the illumination were perfect in their nature, faint, as much as he could see, he was dragged towards something which brought the promise of help. He still wondered whenever or not he'd get the help needed from the beast when at last, they got to the high entrance. 'A few more steps, hang on.' He hadn't realised what was going on, still caught in a stray mode, before long, being placed in a chair which had its long fingers inside of him, draining him of blood. There was pain and he suddenly felt aware for the first time that something beyond his consciousness was wrong. Others talking but no words of which he was aware. A man, a young man standing by his side while he was trapped and all he had to do was to raise a finger. It hadn't come up ever since, especially since this chance would never get to come again. With a sudden burst of air in his lungs, he was released with only a few steps through which he was slightly impaled by the machine, looking as if. His skin was somewhat pale and while standing he realised that something was wrong. 'What's going on with me now?' He looked immediately at the source and noticed that the creature which had attached itself to the second part of the machine was that canine abomination. That immediate realisation not only made him realise that something affects his body but his mind as well. 'What have you done to me? Why am I feeling this change come over?' He felt the rush of nerves and the need to walk on four feet, while his body contorted under his own eyes. It was true enough that he also felt like his thin muscles suddenly grew in density, but could the trade be worth it? He was afraid to speak, in case he would hear his own voice since it was fair enough that he wouldn't be able to get through anywhere else, and worse of all, that now he could be infected as well he worried. 'Is this reversible at least? Why I don't think I could get past through my life has become one of you.'

'Not one of us, different, much different, you'll know.' For one, he was right, they were as different as they came, especially since it was obvious enough that he could force himself on two feet, though he was unaware whenever or not they could do the same. Whatever this place was, he still didn't know the purpose of it, not why he had become somewhat pulled towards it by his own will. 'Who build this place and what about the machine?' 'We do not know.' 'Who's exactly we then? Have you brought others here as well? I mean, someone different than you, perhaps someone else such as I?' 'We bring those who are different and insert it into them. It works both ways as long as there's a specimen to provide the blood.' That was well enough to know, as being stuck in a half-human form was most disturbing than witnessing more than enough cemeteries for the day. All of which was needed remained to find a man, another human to provide him with the blood which he needed to consume. With that, he could be whole again, but until then, he decided to keep this companion, instead of cutting him apart. There wasn't even the least of doubt that with this newfound strength, nothing would've been able to stand against his might. With a leap, he grabbed a bunch of stones and shocked even the Gnaar as he crushed them under his fist. Most of the humanoid appearance was kept, other than the fact that it looked as if there was less skin, more muscles and not to mention the size of the knuckles. It felt as if he was just mashing a tiny slim ball of butter and he enjoyed it for as long as he went on. 'Are you coming o dreadful thing? We still have to find a cure.' And as he said it they ran but stopped at the end of the gate, stooping low at the instinctual sight of the bubbles. For, they seemed to have produced tiny antlers that dragged them down, through while small blasted tubes scourged the ground. Enough time passed that some of the features evolved in something horrid, transparent, enough to reveal that all of their guts have welded together in their eight bodied oversized concoctions of disease. 'Don't do anything yet, I have a bad feeling that popping it from close would only do to infect both of us with the disease.' 'What do you suppose we do then?' 'I need to be a man again, or else we might not stand a chance. I seem to think it's looking for either of us for some reason since I couldn't tell why it's heading towards our direction.' 'We have no knowledge of how to return you to your world.'With bitter words, he was dismissed, knowing that in the least he would be able to remember that the creature known as a man would help them nonetheless.'Fall back until I'll call you, they appear to be slow enough anyway.'At least now that he was alone to his own thoughts he could think as well as to examine the weird expulsion which hovered in front of his eyes.Something still dragged at him nonetheless, even in that dreadful moment when his knees shook. Is this fear that I fear, thinking that I would walk away in case of a confrontation?That being had become seemed irredeemable even within its first sighting, not to mention that he couldn't do anything any longer without exposing himself to it.'I'm over here, you damn soap anomaly!'As he shouted, he managed to perfectly land on a pair of bushes, as well as on a strange pair of mushy chairs of flesh ground protrusions. They appeared to have enjoyed the little action and the constant shake he displayed then. Now, of which he was aware, there was at least something he knew, something he had guessed, of which, aware enough, he was truly followed and despised.The neutral tone of those roundly outstretched faces suddenly turned from neutral to rage. A maddening pair of faces with soft teeth and open mouths which revealed that they had no means of biting.No, they were stuck in that way, without even a manner of going ahead to be able to break through. He was quite aware that there wasn't any way to get through to it any longer. If that creature had even a working heating system, he would've been surprised in the least. They saw him, of that he was aware, as they followed, or attempted, with the damned advantage of full-fledged flight. It refused to enter the small zone of sharply set plants, most likely since they would pop it with the ease which it took him to arrive inside. 'Go away, can't you see that there's no way in? I'm already somewhere which can never be touched by your kind.'It tried lowering those antlers below, but by the time it had reached the safe area, it stopped, enough to realise that one of those ground pulsories which appeared to have had a mind of their own just took off from the ground and started the flight.One of the strangest things he had witnessed remained the many pointed narrow stars of long extremities which now came into flight and started chasing the beast away. It was somewhat of a dark and damp plant, the roots of which moved into strange mesmerising motion which followed, until the very moment when he heard, in the distance, a damning sound. It was only then that he realised that the creature had been slain.What had remained of it from what he saw were a few of the organs which had wrapped themselves around the roots, right as it made its way back into the hole from which it sprang. A strange thing in itself that was, seeing how it wasn't infected like any other disturbing creature in its place.Carefully, he waited and looked at it, just enough that he could see any sort of results, after which he realised that there was a need to wait for a few days if not more. Others were on their way from the distance, though none of them appeared to have noticed him nor the open cave, perhaps enough time would be given for him to know. As he made his way behind, he explained everything to Gnaar, hoping that there'd be some sort of response in this which would explain everything.'Then what would you suppose we do?'Easy, we wait a few days here, as we are the only ones who are not touched. If it turns out that it can't affect plant life it would mean that there's only one thing left to do.'We inject ourselves through the machine.'The thought alone seemed mad, not to mention that there wasn't any clue whenever or not that would work. He needed to think it through, and at the same time find a way to delay the exposure to this world.Both of them ate whatever they could find in the cave, be it cave bulbs, which the Gnaar had testified as being edible for the system and drinking the swelling dark water of the lower sides. He didn't dare to go deeper than he needed to, especially since the transformation had given him a pair of instincts which appeared to have twisted his senses in what appeared to be a concoction of feelings and despair. Feeling the threat which came from below, his skin shivered, hairs raised, there wasn't any way of which he'd get through. Yet the calling from below wanted to make him change himself into what appeared to be a new type of man. He realised then, that this was the way out, the gate which would lead him back to his world, the only problem is that he had become a strange abomination, no longer a man belonging to the human world. 'Would he notice if I were gone for a few hours?' It seemed like his friend was resting as he was told to wait, unable to say a word which would make him rise, he took the change and went through the slide. Smoothly so, he appeared to have reached a point where sliding was no longer necessary and he could freely walk around. There wasn't any certainty of where he'd arrive, but somehow, through a miracle, he found himself walking at night. It was obvious enough that the spot from which he had popped out managed to bring him some sort of thought which for a reason or another distracted him. The alienation made, most likely being the reason for his so-called fear of being seen in the state he had come to be. At least, from the point of view where there were the so-called others he had cherished might've done less than enough to satisfy his carving. 'Control yourself Croix and don't let yourself be seen.' It would've been enough for him to be heard, especially since his voice had become much deeper than he himself expected, going by the way of having to bite himself twice around the ankles. He was shocked himself to find out that he couldn't even penetrate his own leathery skin, and he was quite aware that his teeth were almost diamond sharp. Only now, it was time to put everything to the test, to know and to be aware of what would happen if he went ahead to bring his plans to fruition. He could forgive much but not this, as he reached around one of the buildings and saw a small window pane which crept at his inner eyes. From that, he could tell that the parents responsible for the image which he witnessed appeared might've neglected their child as he was cradled by the wind alone while they were upstairs doing the unimaginable. A bleak image bore into his mind, what other things would do if not the purest of them all? He couldn't think properly any longer, and as he opened, or rather forced it open, he came on the floor and made his way towards the baby. It was a damning thing that happened when he only wanted to hold it in his arms, taking the baby into a flight, rightly so as he made it around the building, to be certain of everything, he was silent. Far too silent, but that couldn't have bothered him less. It took the longest while to realise that such silence was supremely unnatural to the point where he realised that he had smothered the child under the guise of his own unknown strength. While dropping the body of the poor creature below, he heard the guttural sounds of a watcher. There wasn't any time to think, nowhere he could lose the small body without being seen. Without thinking any longer, given to the instinct of having a child which passed with him around, he placed it in his mouth and ate it, bit by bit, in front of tired on-lookers from above, the dread of which never stood a chance to leave their simple minds. Rather unsure of this strange turn of events, he made it to the secret entrance and found himself back into the world from which he had fled from. Unaware of the consequences of what he had done, he wiped himself and went to sleeping, seeing how his companion hadn't awoken yet. Sleeping was much easier than he had originally thought, more so with a clean consciousness, the night carried on. The next day both of them appeared to have woken up at exactly the same time, without a doubt with a desire to check the world outside. At the first glance, the horizon was clear, from as far as they could check and see. 'It's your turn to get around to the small thicket over there and check for yourself whenever or not anything was infested. Don't worry about it though, if everything's how I told you, there shouldn't be any trouble, to begin with.'He slurred and watched Gnaar go by himself, slowly, just in case he told him to go slowly and wait for as long as it was safe to go. Everything was planned just so he could buy himself enough time to get back to the other world.'This time, don't worry and look for someone older.' It was clever enough of a plan that in case something broke about the body, there was enough of a chance that the specimen would survive. With that in mind, he went on ahead and started hurrying towards the place, this time appearing somewhere else, in some sort of anti-chamber filled with strange concoctions of glass.Liquids were dripping, lightning was flashing and it had become obvious that someone had used the equipment which laid ahead of him before. He dared not touch anything but loathed to get out. There must be someone here I could use, a human who stumbled in the wrong place at the wrong time, something in those phials.Upon realising that there was none, he opened the next door, looking at the floor of stone, knowing that the slabs of stone were shattering his hope, moment by moment. What this might've appeared as being might've been sealed from above in a way, judging from the size and from the fact that the stairs which lead further above lead to a door which was sealed away by bricks, it left him with little hope.'Anyone here? I'm in a desperate need.' He stopped as he almost pushed a sound which would've been inhuman.'In need of help.' He continued, somewhat surprised at the fact that there wasn't an echo going there. The time had come to open what might've been the last room he'd witness of this strange machination.What laid on the other side didn't have him prepared, as silent as he stood there. A man laid with his back turned, that of which he was sure, he was working on some sort of docile tubes and what not, seemingly too caught up in by his work to be able to notice anything going on. He hadn't remembered ever dying, at least in the farthest corners in his mind, he knew that he fell from the top floor and that he couldn't have survived the fall. But somehow, he appeared to have blocked that moment in his memory and pushed it as far as it went. What laid now in front of him was his very own human body, tied to the floor, bleeding.At once, the body opened its eyes and started in confusion as well, the sight of which hadn't done either of them any good whatsoever, especially since the man turned.Whenever or not he was a doctor, he appeared to wear some kind of robe and have acquired some utensils that might've made him resemble one.It wasn't the time to think but to act, since he had maintained most of what he had through his body, he stood there fully stretched, like some sort of humanoid wolf, with his overperformed jaw pushing forth, this time no longer holding back. A dreadful shout roar came which left the doctor pale, at the sight of which he was deemed enough of a threat that he took out a small gun. That wasn't the type to carry more than one shat and they were both aware of it.'Give me the body and I shall spare you.'Perhaps that was the point which broke the man, which forced him to this of Croix as more or of a phantasm that a beast or a monster. It was dreadful enough to hear him roar, but speaking in english was terrifying.Enough was said and done, as he took hold of himself and finally shot Croix, only to peer at the fact that he stood unaffected. The bullet hadn't even penetrated his thick skin, layered with as much as he had.With a leap, the man fainted, the sight and the smell finally had done what Croix couldn't do by intimidation alone.'My dear old body, how fitting that you'll be the tool of my saving.' He pulled his own body out of the prison and made it back. Though nothing could've gone worse this time around as on the other side he realised that he never made it back into the real world, to begin with.'What is this abomination I see around?'He glanced everywhere seeing how the pool had spat not one but three bodies out, two which resembled his current form and the humanoid bleeding one. It was hard to realise that the pool worked as some sort of reflection rather than a gateway and the fact of the manner remained that now he could stare inside of it. He had left two bodies in the human world, the human and the dreaded hybrid, in what appeared to have been a scene of dread. Just another body to experiment upon. 'What have I missed?' That came too sudden for him to realise what happened, at least not in the terms which laid ahead. For once, the fact that he had prepared two bodies which looked at him did nothing more than the obvious confusion. 'I need to perform some tests first, that is why I have brought a couple of specimens here. Yes, that's right, it's why I have them now.' Croix was never the best of liars but with enough help, it might've worked. There was indeed a wonder at the specimens, though he at least tried to hide it until; he was properly classified of what happened outside. 'Nothing, they didn't seem able to affect them in the least.' 'Good enough, just for the sake of it, we should wait a few days and they attempt to either cut a branch or one of the roots, just so that we could get one for testing.' It nodded and seemed to have gone out on patrol. 'Don't go too far, will you? We can't risk being seen by them, especially at a moment such as this when we need to make the preparations.' The Gnaar nodded without looking behind, clearly bored of repeating the same type of language between the two of them. As a matter of fact, for a translator, he was only noticed now, rather than a clean creature of service. 'Now, if only I knew how this machine works, I could be a human yet again, no longer in the pain of bearing this shell that isn't mine.' His words did echo but stopped short, as the pool made ripples and he was lost from the reflection. He had both of my bodies and knows who I am, who was the man? In there, he woke up with a head which was almost in the position of getting smashed by a falling set of metal circles hanging right above his head. 'Liliya, Liliya, come on for a second, I need your assistance, hurry!' The shout ran through, half-way there and she opened the door, looking at her father, eyes locked. She had been busy taking care of herself already but seeing how something had happened, she rushed to him, looking closely only to despair. 'What happened father? Are you hurt or anything?' 'Help me get up my dear, there's been an incident here which must be taken care off, the likes of which make shake our entire knowledge of what we know about the human mind itself.' He made little sense, but so had the body he had brought. 'If it's about that cursed thing that kept bleeding, forget about it, there's nothing but trouble tied to it, nothing more. Have you no sense of the hours I have spent trying to get rid of the blood?' 'Not now my dear and stay back, what lays on the other side of the closed doors might be far too dangerous for your poorly tempered eyes to witness. I am afraid that it may leap at me and take me with it in whatever refuge it had built for itself. Do you smell that as well? It's the decomposing stench which filled the room, there's no other way it could've gone.' 'Just wait a minute now, or more, starve it out, whatever animal it may be, it's pointless to endanger yourself for a poor body.' 'Nonsense.' Her brother answered, quite composed for a man who was about to confront a creature which was in the least going to hurt him if not do worse if it were to escape. With a small prodding hammer, he decided to open it at last. 'Stay as close as you can to the stairs, I don't know what's going to happen once I open up the doors. This might be more than perilous for both of us, and in case anything happens to me, I want you to close the door and never return here. Do you understand me, my dear?' 'Father, I cannot.' Though at the mere command, she was silenced as he went on, looking as to see that she was doing as she was told. Good enough, in case it'd be, but now behind closed doors let's see. 'Who's there?' As the light came inside the room, he had finally witnessed what was for so long hidden inside, nothing but the body he had presumably lost and an additional thing which stood beside him. At once, he went and grabbed the bleeding thing and placed it unproperly in its original position on the floor. The drain was still under it, seemingly going far below.'Is that the thing which attacked your father?'Indeed it, though it would seem that whatever it did.' He stopped to examine, kneeling down slowly to a dangerous degree, close enough that he could place his ears against its chest. A few more attempts followed through, after all, he couldn't know whenever or not the heart was in the right stop, as much as he looked in part human. With a bang against it, he slammed the hammer but found himself shaking as if he had it the bottom stone floor, unaware that there wasn't a way to determine its death.'Lily, be a dear will you and bring your father a pair of chains, I believe I might have received something even better."Damn them, I've lost the images from the pool.' Said Croix, with a tone that seemed to dwindle between himself and the creature.'They have returned and still seeking for us, though something changed, follow.'He did as he was asked to, having to witness the change under his own eyes. Apparently, whatever those shrubs held some sort of memory if they popped out of the ground on their own, in groups as well, following those small bubbling abominations and taking care of them. With at least a mental note he made, there'd be something that would bear him down if he was recognised by the smell and sight if it came to ripping something out of it.'Wait, if they recognise me, after all. Help me Gnaar, place this body into position and get ready to prepare it for the procedure.'It was apparent that he was going to force the body of the hybrid onto himself, having no means of knowing what the effect might've been once the procedure was done.Even the other being appeared to have some fear of what might be the results after it was done, though if everything was to be done in the way he wanted, sacrificed were to be made. Croix placed himself onto the seat and saw the concoctions wrap themselves around him softly. It wasn't as if he couldn't get out, it was easy enough to push himself out of the way, though he didn't wish it.Gnaar grew more reluctant, seeing how the body was somewhat too close to the original in an unexplainable way. At least the way he saw it, there was a doubt that it would work.'Are you certain this might do? We've never tried replicating two of the same on the body."I think I know what I'm doing, this way there's a chance I might have enough strength to rip off one of the roots and get away with it.'There wasn't any way back from that and he was quite aware of that, with one final gulp, he went on to ask the creature to insert the needles and the pointers, concoctions as well. Immediately there was a reaction which was more than unexpected, for once his sight widened to the side, as well as his second pair of hands appeared from the same stump, which grew as well.Body masses grew all over his limbs, though the mere sight of two feet popping out of the same end seemed to have been a problem, not as much as being stuck into the chair. He was forced out, a new thing that had neither something of Gnaar nor or human the was he saw it.For once, the primal features, the claws were stronger, longer, and he could feel the control and jow how wide he had kept the four pair of claws in check. He wanted to feel the brutality which ran through his veins, without being able to hear or see anything yet. Was the Gnaar always so silent or had he silenced himself as he hid in the dark corner?His fear was a sign to be remembered if there was to be a way back.'We can now harvest the root without fear or be taken. I will rip it off at the base just to be sure that it won't get the idea to follow me.'The poor thing could only nod from its corner, still unable to look at him, nor trust that it wouldn't come after it. He found out that now he could fully get into a flight with his scraping mandibles, his jaws opening at once revealed much more than a pair of teeth, rather the fact that they both ended up leading to the same hole. Though his face was nothing which was bone-like, though rather full of soft meat, the cold touches revealing that he had kept some of the soft features he had as a human. Mainly what looked peculiar were the spotless hairless spots among the body which crept him even more than he had thought of.It was a sign of disease and degeneration, they were soft instead of his leathery unpenetrable armour, his weak spot, as he willed. If he continued taking from the same source, there'd be nothing short of supreme self-inbreeding which would only leave him as a shell. Never matter that, as I will have that root and earn my freedom that way. Seeing how there was nought outside, he came to the small thicket, finally facing it. Without a doubt, there was some sort of fear which could be felt between the different creatures around. He had to show some sort of power and might if it came to blows. 'I've only come for a root of yours, that's all, there's no way I could understand whenever or not I might be able to see whenever or not you'll know me but I will have to take it from you.' He shook himself and much prepared for some sort of retaliation, finally lunged and ripped off a giant root out of the small body, pulling it out entirely, revealing a small network of smaller brambles which were attached. More so, it was obvious that the rage hadn't subsided, as a matter of fact, it suddenly turned into flight again, never surrendering nor being able to give up a part of itself yet. He was in minority around them and he knew it couldn't end up well, though at it saw it lift off, Croix dropped the piece of the root and leapt at it, holding tight while digging in as hard as he could. 'Don't do anything now, or I might rip you off entirely.' Without a second warning, he started ripping out pieces of its top, fleshing it out and seeing it finally bleed and shriek through the various spots he ripped out. It might've been something unrelated that he heard the sounds, but the flight was done, it fell away, though, in an unknown turn of events, it fell and broke his arm between the hole from which it sprang and its weight. Bone cracked, his arm whacked, he couldn't stop the pain but feel anger at it as well. The fit of rage forced him to chew through skin and bone until he released himself from the torment, leaving it behind to bleed into the hole he had created. 'I need to be freed from this place, I need to take you back.' Slightly defeated, he claimed the root and appeared to have had some defensive position once he noticed. One or two of the other plant-concoctions were levitating through the air but made no move towards him whatsoever. Though he had kept only an arm, it was obvious enough that he had taken one of them out, without even breaking a sweat, grinning with blood dripping out from both of his mouths. Just slow movements followed as he tired his best to get as far away from them as long as they were stuck in their mad staring. If the roles were reversed, if a man had been killed, there would've been fire, an inferno, but this gave him enough time to flee from sight with the root in hand. 'I've done it, Gnaar, I've grabbed it at once.' 'Something happened, you're hurt.' Noticed his tiny friend, after being done staring and being afraid of this new appearance he bore. 'It doesn't matter any longer, as well as we may test this through. We have the root, now what we're missing is some specimen that's been infected in order to test it.' 'Then why have you returned if you were planning on taking one of us?' 'Because I need you force that human body of mine back onto myself, now, before it gets late.' 'Far too dangerous as to be placed against what you've become.' 'Listen to me and do it well, you will do as you are told and I'll have nothing less of that. I was the one who agreed to help you in the first place, hadn't I? I won't be able to do it any longer unless I'm being turned to my normal human self again.' He had a strong case for himself and wasn't afraid to put it in action. At least, as long as he was aware of it, there wouldn't be a turning back, the Gnaar complied. Such a marvellous thing was the machine that he couldn't help but wonder at the fact that even now it appeared to have wrapped around his body, even after he had been thrown out. Certainly, it wasn't as if he was some sort of abomination, that the thought of and the sight caught the scent of inbreeding, but there hadn't been another choice. 'Push it in, now!' As he did it, he looked at his body on the floor and managed to notice that the blood was being pulled into the machine as well. One of the strangest things happened then and over there, as, in the room of the doctor, right in front of his eyes and the one of his daughter, the primal hairy thing started shaking disturbingly from side to side. It wasn't the only one, he noticed, as it was immediately followed by the bloody corpse on the ground. Something was disturbing both of them in an unimaginable way which had to be recorded. 'Bring the camera, my dear, I believe something might come to this.' Though he was caught on one side, Croix pushed the transformation on the other, having the skin patches grow, no longer having the hair grow in the many inaccessible places. Worst of all remained that the stump had grown in an unfathomable form that resembled a sharp horn, from where he had lost it. He was human again, or rather humanoid, keeping the two split face but attaining another blind one which seemed to emulate his humanity more. Worst of all was the fact that it had been on one side, making him a three-headed freak which couldn't anything for his certain position. A lot, if not most of his body mass and muscles were kept, and he could feel that in a way or another that he'd be well, more than enough. 'How do I look?' Croix's voice had turned now in an unison of voice which appeared to have bred some kind of sharpness to it if it weren't for the fact that it dropped low at unexpected times. Something was terribly wrong with what he liked to call his own voice box and there was little to no denying to it. Both were taken by this new form of his, as it had taken so much time to adjust to, especially on the way to the nearest burrow, where they'd taken one of the most effective and brought him to the cave. On the way, the long-long way, the Gnaar asked. 'Think it might be able to work? That it might save it?' 'We won't know unless we try, but do not worry, there shouldn't be any pain.' At least the thought mattered, but being placed in the chair alone made the poor creature finally have some reaction. Something of the virus or the reason it crept inside of it made some noise. Nonetheless, there wasn't any stopping once the plant was attached, suddenly it added a form and a bulk to the animalistic thing, though there wasn't in the least the expectation that this revival would've gone as wrong. 'What happened there?' There was a second where the thought of it being saved crept to his mind. That was before he had realised that the poor other Gnaar had become more like the rooted creature than what it had been, levitating right past the two of them. 'Follow it, let's see what's supposed to happen.' It was quite obvious, as all the previous secret expectations were somewhat met. The Gnaar placed itself inside the ground and waited for the sun to come. It was nothing more but a failure as the plant had taken control over it rather than the opposite. 'Is this the way you're planning on saving the others?' 'I'm working on it, don't start anything yet, we just need, we need, something else that would hold to it. Are there other creatures among you or in the wilderness?' There it was, the reluctance to speak, that of which he was aware that there might've been trouble around this place. At least he knew of the fact that despite their evolved minds, they chose to hide in burrows where it was the most dangerous place to be. 'Bring me to the others, if there's any sort of creature around, I want you to take me to them, it might be important, more so than you realise.' With a nod, he was taken by surprise as went away, looking behind and stopping in its tracks, enough that he would follow. No word between the two of them along the way, though there had been enough said in the acts than during their short conversations. 'Look, I'm terribly sorry for what happened there but I was quite sure that something might've happened if I were to give them something to avoid this sudden transformation. You must believe me when I say that I had only the best intentions in my mind when I was working on it.' A subtle change in his expression came, he was quite afraid, more so than what Croix felt around himself. To say that he was aware of something which would've taken them both out wasn't the best of ideas, but there had to be another way. Something still bothered him, to say the least, being the cold shoulder the Gnaar gave him. 'I've given an arm for you and the others, I do not know what I'm being treated this way. There's no one out there waiting or searching for a way to cure this disease and look around, father in the sky.' They were still there, floating after so long, as a matter of fact, there wasn't any denying of the fact that he was unsure of anything which would work if it were for him to be caught now. Unaware of how much it might've evolved or whenever or not he was truly human and henceforth immune, he strayed away from sight, walking low as well at times. 'We need to get higher, they should be over there.' After which, they climbed with difficulty and went off a slope, managing to find the entrance, a round hole, from which came smoke.

Only now did he understand why he feared whoever was down there, mainly for the fact that there was fire involved. 'Afraid of a little flame with your level of intelligence?' 'We prefer to eat our meat raw, fires don't work well under burrows.' He could imagine it happening there, the smoke bending, blowing pushing to suffocate them one by one. In a time such as this he wondered whenever or not would it be a worse fate than what was happening. One more thing seemed to do before they entered the lair. 'What am I to expect as I lower myself there?' There was a silence which brooded in both, he couldn't find the proper words, that of which would've been able to describe the best ideas and what not. He couldn't do anything else but try to hold he breathe at the end of the stench which appeared to be ravaging there. The sudden slope ended, as they came on the stairs, primaeval type, as it appeared that the lair was ancient. It wasn't even smoke that came from below, but steam from a black pool of coal and dark stones, surrounded by a frame of bricks, as if it were as well of sorts. 'They appeared as if they have built.' His thoughts stopped once he saw the open door suddenly close in both of their faces. 'What do you require?' Came a strange voice, fractioned in a few tones, hard to swallow, easy to hear, at least for his ear. He saw nothing of it until there appeared to be a visual insight of sorts. Each of the creatures behind had the ability to see through the walls. 'I know this might sound strange or that it might be all of the sudden but we need your help.' There was a shock in the Gnaar's voice as he growled and groaned at just the infancy of the question at hand. He couldn't truly mean to ask them that. 'With what might come to the scum accompanied by you stranger?' 'There's a disease that's taken hold of them and it may not be stopped without outside help.' 'Oh we are aware of it, quite so, who do you think to have contorted it?' 'Bastards.' Gnarled on, closer to the door, he would've smashed the door apart if it weren't for Croix to be around. He appeared to have stayed his aggression for as long as he was close. Closely enough to that, he apparently came to the point of wanting to be caught and placed to the ground and smashed. Those thoughts of pain were the only things which kept the rage inside, especially since he knew it well. 'You're a liar, I know it to be true, your kind's just as effective as ours and there's no way you'll cure it alone.' 'How do you know that, wretch?' There was some sort of understanding between them before the mechanism behind was heard. Apparently, this explanation was enough for them to earn themselves the entry. What a peculiar thing it was, at a rubbery fattened blob with long legs that served as both the hands, legs and mouths. At least he noticed it lift one of the limbs to talk, revealing quite a sharp tongue exiting the appendage. 'Both of you are welcome as long as neither of you stirs any trouble whatsoever, understood?' A mutual agreement came as usual, and he was aware that there'd be nothing said and done as long as they both agreed on it. Farther into the lair, he noticed just how clean it was, polished in the way that it went down into a long spiral, carved with many tiny stones in their form. 'Is that the history of your people?' 'Quite observant of you, indeed it is. We keep most of our documents tied to our place of birth, from which we carved and pave our path into the world.'For some unknown creature there, what he saw fell as nothing short of beauty, at least the forms and the wars he saw. Could there be others threatening them there? Trying to take their lives before anything would be said or be done? Certainly, such a question might've never been told to a stranger of the sorts even if they were to work together.'Since when has this infection or disease happened? The way I understand it, there's close to no stopping to it.'As he was brought to be aware of the many cases of the infected which laid at the bottom floor inside the lair. They had been stacked as corpses, just as the habit he had noticed at the Gnaar, a desperate attempt, though he had caught something so. 'Have you placed the steam well outside only to get rid of the ones that become inflated?'The dreaded realisation that the human knew what he was talking about came fast before fading from existence. At least he knew enough that it wouldn't have mattered in the least whenever or not they'd speak again of the subject.'Regardless of which, we are dealing with it as harshly as we can and in case you've not realised, there's nothing which turned out as to work so far.'"Then how is that you're still healthy despite sitting around all of them now? Why does it happen that against all odds, you're the one still standing here?'He wondered in the most peculiar way why, it might've been that there wasn't in the least a regard for his life, though answers hadn't come for either of them. Despite both of their exposures, they remained somewhat clean.'You have to follow me, immediately, this may be able to turn both of our events against each other.'Without the least of doubt that came as well, he knew that there was at least a chance that he'd be willing to take care off this problem before it got out of control. That thing followed and spoke less, doing nothing to lock the door behind, and seeing itself in a somewhat docile position compared with how the Gnaar acted. It was useful enough to stand and think, that it wouldn't have been enough to act on his feelings now. Though he was followed, rightly before the cave, the Gnaar was forced to bring another breathing corpse from the burrow with them.'What is this machine and why have you brought me here?'The question did seem to arise some peculiar questions, at least in the field he'd be aware of going. With the least of thoughts, the fallen Gnaar was placed in the chair, prepared in its entirety. Just so that it'd be settled, the other creature asked no more questions and appeared to have placed itself into position.'I don't know whenever or not this might work, though hopefully, it might prove to be a cure. The two of you are the only ones which are still healthy, so it's only a fact that both of you should be the saviours of your races if this might prove working.'In the least of facts, this procedure should avoid inbreeding if it did turn out to work. The pain the poor being felt was dreadful, at least that of which came from the shriek it left out, it had to be gotten through. What popped out of the chair was a stump with long teeth and many mouths attached to its feet which emulated the faces of the Gnaars. In truth, it was much shorter than the other tribe, though it seemed as if it appeared to function in a somewhat proper manner.'Could it be that he was healed?'The three of them started and waited for it to get out of the stoop which might've done a lot to confuse it. In a manner of speaking, he was very much afraid of what was about to happen then.'I want back home.' The most proper words which could've been spoken, right out of multiple mouths as well. It was nothing short of the human concept of miracle, that of which he couldn't have thought off until recently anyway.'With this.' Said Croix. 'My debt is being paid and I should hold nothing against either your or the other way around from this point on. Should we agree on this?'They nodded at the peculiar creature which appeared to have called himself a man in the past. One problem still remained, though the two of them spoke of what was to be done next, entirely absorbed by one another and while the new one seemed to have been such as a new-born out of a coma, Croix was still caught there. Stuck without a way to return, but to stare into a shallow pool. He remembered it and before they'd been gone, he offered himself to stand and watch for the cave before their return. 'This might be one of my only chances to stand and see what the world there looks like.' He saw his own reflection first. That was no human, but wicked being, some mongrel which had taken or attempted to take his form. The stump stood out but not only that, if it were so, at least as far as he was concerned, there'd be nothing less of wanting to look away. 'It couldn't be, I need another man to bring here and take away from him what's rightfully mine. If anyone could hear if this pool could feel, bring me back to the place of virtue, bring me back to the city I grew up in.' The pool appeared to have changed, he was aware that there'd be less than a few hours until the sun went down. Nonetheless, he couldn't and wasn't going to wait for a second more, there wasn't in the least a chance for that. 'Well, I should say that there isn't any chance for me any longer, I'm just as gone as everyone else.' He said on the streets, the closest door, through which he had to force open with his working arm. It was as if he had the strength of a bull, ripping the mechanism off with one pull. Hopefully, no one heard that motion, or else he might've lost whatever element of surprise he thought he had. In the least now, there had to be a young man of the sorts, which had the physique but most importantly was healthy enough to give him the strength. Luckily so far, there wasn't anyone around to provide any distraction or to bring his presence to all of their attention. He was rather fond of this technique of extraction, standing by the doors and knocking, waiting like a salesman to see and feel any sort of movement, always ducking under the visor. 'Who's there?' The first victim spoke, judging by the fact, it was a young man, no, there appeared to have been shuffling in the house that he heard, they were definitely more. The first impression had to be the very best between the two of them, it would certainly make it easier for him to proceed. 'May I be let in? I seemed to have been hurt and I've got no one else to help me.' He had put on the best act he could, rather sounding such as a limped man who couldn't see past his own self. Time seemed to pass between the two of them in silence. 'Step a few backs behind, I want to see what you look like.' It was that when he knew that there was the danger of being seen or recognised. He had been around on multiple occasions and Croix had little to no idea how deformed he'd be in their eyes. It was a chance to play his act well, enough that he had a chance to lure the man outside, hoping he wouldn't see past his appearance. After a few steps, the door suddenly closed, the man looking at him rather surprised at the level in which he had become, slightly taller, scarred at the face, that wicked in-human arm being the worst addition to his case. He looked at least as if he would've belonged into a phreak show with others such as himself to go around and ran the errands. 'Tell me exactly what happened.' Tricked by the saddened act and subtle change of expressions, he appeared to have been caught by the scruff of the neck and kept in a lock which appeared to last for as long as he could breathe. In and out, the man passed out in moments before being kidnapped from his house. A healthy specimen indeed, this one would most certainly last me for as long as it would do, my return to humanity will no longer be prolonged by the means it brought. Others saw him and shrieked, finally revealed with his unholy appearance, the sight of the grave made most shudder in the halls and dormitories. He fled with the man before the authorities would have the chance to come it and rather made his way through. What they'll find after searching the area shouldn't shock them, since the man would be set free and the other will be nothing more than a decaying body. Croix looked at himself right there, just how smoothly were the features, how long would it be until they returned back? Those damned creatures would use the chair relentlessly now that they found a cure for the disease and there might not be a second chance. But one thing seemed to bother him there, mainly the fact that he had placed his hands over the body and felt the warmth. 'It could be that you're here in flesh and bones.' He looked on the other side and wondered whenever or not the reflection which laid on the ground was just as warm or if it was that both of them were dead. It hadn't done much to change the fact that there was a beating heart into the man's chest and that he was forced to act rather than to wait for something to happen. Plugged into the man, right onto the chair, he felt himself changing again, though the stump grew further, almost growing fingers and thumbs, and his body changed, there seemed to have happened something irreversible, the second face included. His arms wouldn't grow back alone without proper help or rather anything else which might help it. At least he was much aware of the fact that there'd be nothing to do about the fact that he was running out of ideas and there was a man there just as well. 'What would they say of you? What will they do with me if they find out what happened here?' It was a hard choice to make but he was aware that whatever was to happen, it would all lead back to him. Since he wasn't going to go ahead and bother for another alternative, he started dragging the man again. He would rather feel his body strength give and shudder, but at least there was a way to dispose of the body. 'There's no one around to stop us any longer.' He spoke to the unconscious man, unable to know what he might've thought off if he wasn't dead cold. Though what saddened him was that he was brought, back to the thicket where the same old scene laid by the side. He appeared to have been rather attached or fond of the scene which had gone away there while he was off. At least he knew of the fact that there wouldn't be another chance like this before going away. The place where he had lost his arm, in the spot of which laid a hole, with many sharp roots below. 'This is it for you, my lad, I'm afraid there's nothing which would stop me from doing this.' With a push and little remorse, death came suddenly for the man, impaled by many roots, far too quick for him to be able to react. 'It will finally end after doing it so.' Though what La Croix hadn't expected was for him to be recognised at last by two alone set in flight, he was forced below to fall on top of the man, looking at another one planting itself above. He had barely missed the roots which would've taken his heart but another set came from the one which had disliked the fact that he was alive. Now it came to be at last, that La Croix had died, all alone until he reached, his humanity like a leech. It was a sad thing to watch in the laboratory as well, as the specimens were suddenly losing their state again. The bleeding corpse was bleeding no longer, the intruder had started shedding its hair cloak until there'd be nothing left on it but a weak hairless body that wouldn't do to be covered in any scientific paper whatsoever. Most of the muscle mass appeared to have been pulled inside, the torso was shaking and he was sure something dreadful would happen to it if he decided to leave it to the natural order of things. 'My daughter, bring me something, a coat or some sort of soft blanket from my bed chambers.' At which she nodded and as he grabbed the key, unchained, the beast couldn't help but shake, instead of doing anything else. A thing that was unexpected, for as long as it came, the sooner he grabbed one end, the other one fell apart, like a guillotine aimed at the belly button. It released the poor thing from the dreadful life it had, leaving nothing but a dying breed sort of thing, from both sides. Decay filled them both as soon as the air went inside and he could feel it crawling away from his fingers like worms trying to wriggle away until it returned to some sort of moist-like dirt, the type of which it had previously appeared to be. 'What sort of abomination might have you been? To come in secret and to escape this mad world before my eyes. I cannot believe that you might've done this to bring me to a state of fright.' But the doctor couldn't help but see his daughter, stopped in her tracks, he yelled at her. 'Bring me the jars, a funnel and a cable. We'll need to preserve as much as we can of this, hurry up, there's no certainty that it might pass well.'She nodded and appeared to have promptly dismissed the notion of the blanket, seeing how there wasn't any corpse to cover. As for the substance which laid on the ground, he dared not make a move before realising that he had been distraught, distracted, caught in a small circle and surrounded by it.'You dreadful thing, let me go, release me from my hold if you can hear or else I'll have you all caught in a place which may be your tomb.'Of course, it couldn't have answered, there wasn't any doubt of that, but he was sure that something was wrong when the other corpse started melting away in the most dreadful way. What might've been the reason for it?He couldn't be sure but made no step unless they decided to advance ahead, so far being as passive as to look as if it was a pool. Whenever or not it was so, doctor Faustus appeared to be mocked by the fact that the pool had stopped from advancing and formed a perfectly geometrical circle around him, without a doubt, the most crucial thing when it came to the fact.His daughter had arrived with a funnel, a small machine, a pair of tubes and plenty of jars, all of which were carried in a small basket. She avoided stepping much further and placed everything on the table, prepared as she was, there wasn't any stopping as she started right away.'Careful now my dear, don't be shy either, whenever or not it might wish to retaliate I cannot be certain of, the manner of which I may say myself that I cannot stand any longer in this spot. At least not unless I were to let my knees give in.'A curious nod followed some sort of knowledge between the two of them as she returned to grab another jar. She had filled eight already on the table before the professor was given his freedom at last.'You've done great my dear, you're sure to be rewarded as soon as I find a way to process what happened.'He had immediately started checking each jar while she kept pulling them in, ready to examine what exactly was going on with that of which didn't work.'I'm certain that this would do well, I cannot tell you just how hard it was for me stand there surrounded by the dreadful bile which spawned from the corpse of our invader.'"What are you planning to do with all of those jars? They look as if they have a strike of necrosis to it father, it may be getting too dangerous for you now."Nonsense my dear, I know very well what I am doing. As a matter of fact, once I find out what made that creature from the very substance it had come to be, I may even come close to replicate its body.'A sad shallow nod came from her, as she was aware that her father would endanger his own life again, only in the name of his research.The shallow night was just as ill, they were both done and closed their feelings deep inside, after all, they had to act normal for the days to come. It was a rough one, to sleep knowing that under them, deep, through a few hundred feet below, the bile just waited, yet to grow. Or something might've happened in the meantime, which would've brought his every plan to a point of total destruction or even worse, his time be for the worse.Morning came, the end of the night, both aware that there was some fright. Faustus had his hands shaking, Leah couldn't help herself when it came to the fact, at least if she was to be asked around.'Tell only that you were helped by your father, in case someone seems to ask.'Again with that dreadful thing he saw, it couldn't have been that old age got hold of him as of yet. But he could swear that every now and again, a spoon would phase through the table or water would fall off his cup without it even being touched.He wasn't able to tell the reason for it, but it wasn't as if Leah said anything whatsoever about the incidents which co commonly occurred in the current times.'I am to meet someone today father, may I have leave to go?'Of course, you may, my dear, as long as you return as soon as you may, we've got work to do already.'He snickered with some sort of dismay. There were errands for him to do and she couldn't keep her locked forever until people started talking and spreading rumours about them. None of that would matter, nor would they do, he was aware of the consequences of a well-spread lie, and what it could do to tarnish his reputation and subsequently his life. 'Goodbye my daughter, I know you cannot hear me but I know you will return, your place is with me now and I couldn't fathom if it were.' Of the most importance wasn't the fact that where he stood there appeared to be some kind of distraught, but what was happening outside. 'Five perfect specimens that exceed the ones before, both in physical status and physically, utmostly so. A doctor, a physician, an athlete, at least one engineer and the latest we found, a professor which had made a previous discovery on what might've been the newly found lifeform, if his research would've reached the commission, to begin with.' 'Anything which would've dragged them back to us? From the list, I've no doubt that they had families, friends and that some of them might've been brought to public knowledge.' 'No sir, everything's been taken care of, it was a matter settled by the ones above us.' There was some sort of pleasure just to notice it grow under their eyes. By now, after so many people which had been given for it to starve upon had managed in the least to make the union between the three vessels a success. It had become a new formation, rather than a triple vessel, a new step into what might've been their understanding of the creatures which have plagued mankind ever since the dawn of ancient myths. Would they not be bloody if they were pushed to it, at least to those inside? Somehow he knew that he was in control, despite the fact that he was the one feeding and merely observing the strange concoction it bore to itself. More of them had to be tracked and brought to this place and since he was to be the judge of it, he had finally witnessed them arrive. 'I will need a signature from you, sir.' He would sign humanity away if he was given the chance, standing in his boring office, just farther away into the stone, watching over the cameras and thinking that there wasn't anything they could do to him from this side of the wall. 'Here you go son, have a nice trip on your return.' There was some sort of sadness there, with that much space being used, men being afraid, for they did have plenty of reason for that. Men held guns pointed at the main attraction as well as the others, in comparison of which it appeared like those vessels have been their baby, especially since the size certainly didn't match. Either of them, being placed equally from side to side, farther away from the main vessel, as they laid, the very moment they reached the ground, the men who dropped them felt something unexpected. It was the type of shake which couldn't have been felt before, at least not at the time of their extraction and not before. Their bodies had been fresh, mostly the scholarly types in each case, somehow it proved to be good enough of a choice to employ the help of men who studied letters and words. Pushing them aside and trying to get through was easy in each case, until the rabid desperation came, the problem in their brain which forced them to get violent once their so-called mind-engineer was attacked. In the case of which, they had to be put down, every single damned time. And not even after being taken, did they show any remorse, any sign that they were alive, not until now. 'Sir, everything's ready, what now?' One of the soldiers employed asked through his headset, there was some waiting time but they were dismissed. In supreme unison, there could be heard the echo which came after they shouted and made their way out. 'Now it's your move, what will you do? What might they do?' He had noticed the way they were visibly shaking even through a set of cameras and for good reason alone. For once, he had not been aware, nor could he know whenever or not they could move on their own or if they had used those men they had charmed and control to bring them where they needed to be. At least from his point of view there laid little to nothing in his mind, less than that when it came to the act. But nothing happened, not for days, weeks and more. Though there was still the world

created in their minds as they were slowly and gluttonously devoured. It seemed like the morgue of the town had them both side by side, a fat man missing a hand and the other one who snapped his neck. They'd be there for months and years, as long as it was expected, not even a mention of who or what they were, how they died or why. New arrivals came to both towns, as both decrepit and the gowns. It was the festival of Blue Moon, a celebration of the fact that every once in a few years, the moon turned to a hue of blue, which was pleasurable to look at night, since it cast its rays of blue aside, leaving but a pale ray of light. 'Marvellous, look, mama, papa, it came again, the man with a weird sign.' He bore a sign of the crescent moon at his belt, kneepads, even one across his shoulders and bandana at his head. She yelled at him but waved away, they never saw him but knew his name. Or to say the least what she had called him, this imaginary friend of hers which was always out of sight. 'It's the servant of the mad moon, the servant of the mad moon!' He came only at night, and only when the moon was pale, opposing everything which had to do with it, dismissing it as if to be true. He hid whenever her parents came, without a doubt, making rude gestures and saying no word to her until she was alone in her chambers. There was a balcony almost at every turn of the door, making it appear as if it was a rather good choice to live in there, for no one would've thought of a servant which would climb. Laying by the door, transparent as it was, the child watched now all alone how he waited to be brought to her home. At least he waited and said no word, waiting for an invitation for which there couldn't be any other way to get through. 'Will you let me in?' He asked, with his pale green and another yellow eye, shining through like a pair of cat glasses, trying his best not to scratch the ground. She had known him for the longest while, known them to be sure. Often she'd get out of the room, and watch the other balconies to find out whenever or not it was true. Even now she came alone, brushing past the window and the bed, right into the balcony to watch them from as far as she could be helped on his shoulder. 'There are so many of you out there.' 'And many children that are in need of guidance.' 'Could I be a servant of the mad moon as you've become when you were older?' There was a nod which brought her joy, without realising that the face contortion was rather the lack of expression he could've shown rather than the general thing. 'What are they doing there then? I see so many of them every night, even when my parents tell me those are only dreams.' 'They're only recruiting and preparing for the mad moon to arrive. It's to take all of us and the recruits away for a long while.' It saddened poor Dehlaila to her that her friend was to be gone one day. 'For how long do you think it would last?' 'Until a new generation of servants are raised, right into the dimension of the Mad Moon, where those like us are walking forth, and worshipping together in its moon-like forts. We built great altars there and stay to ourselves.' 'You used to be a child as I?' The interruption caused a nod at the surprise, as it was hard to envision what he had looked like a kid. At least the man he had become was rather pale of skin, not that it was the case, as she saw in the distance, they have visited all kinds of kids, all other hues as well. 'What must I do to join you? And to be with other such as yourself?' 'Dehlaila, what's with all that noise?' 'Nothing mother, I was just talking.' The girl was struck by the realisation that the servant had gone away and her mother was waiting at the doorstep with the light turned on as to wait for an explanation. A sweet whispering sound came as it turned out that the servant was on the roof, peering like a brooding cat, eyes no longer glowing at to be seen. He made a motion around his mouth as to be silent and brooded away. 'I'm sorry mother, I felt like I needed a mouth a fresh air.' 'Well, it's cold outside, dear, you don't want to catch a fever or anything while you're out there. Come on, I'll tug you in.' All the while, she was looked at by that form which seemed to twist itself at her mother's side. She turned as if suspicious, thinking she had found something there. With a pair of rubbing eyes, that was enough even for her, she knew more than well that there was no one out there looking for her daughter. 'Good night my dear, sleep well.' 'Good night mother.' With which, she had put off the best actor she could've shown before the lights closed when she finally opened her eyes. The servant wasn't there any longer, trying to peer inside, he was right inside the room, moving on his own accord, finally lighting his eyes. 'Would you be prepared to join me for the coming days? Only a sweet answer or yes or no and you may be able to be with me forever. Decline and we'll part off and never see one another for as long as there is a moon in the sky.' Dehlaila didn't want to give up on that poor creature despite the fact that she had thought she wouldn't see her parents, at least unless her baby sister grew up. Lately, she wasn't paid enough attention either, to the point where she had seriously thought of leaving with him. 'Yes, I want to leave with you towards that place you've spoken of.' 'Very well, then it's all settled, I shall make it forth with you when the time comes for us to depart. Be ready for there may be yet no other chance for you in at least a generation. That's when you'll have forgotten and thought me as a legend.' It was a hard choice, but lately, she felt that every day felt as if she wasn't their daughter any longer. The nights were cold, the days were worse, seeing her young sibling being taken care of and paid more attention than she was. Dinners were rather mechanical in nature and worse of all was the fact that neither of them appeared to have any care whatsoever that she remained sad all the time. 'I'll leave, that's what I'll do, they won't even feel that I am gone, it must be so. Why else would they ignore me and my needs for this long?' Her small number of friends had already either become bored or had enough of her sadness that she was left alone. And worst of all was that the servant of the mad moon came only at night, with no refuge during the day. That's when it was all the saddest. 'Dehlaila, are you paying any attention to the class?' 'Yes, Ms Vivian.' Though there was nothing else going on in her notebook but the desperate sketch she had drawn of the servant sitting at night, watching the moon with her. She was fairly far in the class and none of the other children felt like selling her out to her teacher. It only got worse from that point on as the drawings started being taken in the lunch area and the bathroom, she was trying her very best to reproduce the servant, to its every detail. The drawings carried to the point where she had a small group of other children standing around her and looking how she's doing it. 'I've seen him before, he's been visiting me and my younger sister Jenny.' The right type of attention was reached at least since neither were able to deny the influence and the suits they wore between one another. Dehlaila was never good at drawing faces either and the colouring was left somewhat ambiguous. Nonetheless, it was something which most of them had recognised to the point of having her brought to her demise. Later in the day, returned to her home, right through another day she thought to have become lame, the time was approaching, no one to stop her in the least. 'My parents won't even care, even some of my friends know that they are coming.' With the door locked, the night had come, her parents hadn't even visited her to say goodnight. It was her sister now who made all the noise and kept them busy, enough that they would cover him as he descended from above. It looked as if he had come down from the very moon, falling softly until he arrived at the window pane, which opened. 'Are you ready to follow me, my young lady? Must we wait longer in this realm where you're underappreciated?' 'I'm ready to come.' She said and smiled, expecting some sort of adventure for the times around. 'There'd be no return, at least not until you've become such as I when a new generation is to be made. I trust that it was made clear and that you understand.' 'I do understand, I truly do, I cannot sit here with my parents any longer, just take me away from them, oh please take me as far as you can!' With the words spoken, she had been taken by the hand and in a moment her body started floating. A small crescent moon started growing out of her belt and knees, right from her clothes, they laughed and sickened as they felt wicked and alive. 'This isn't what I was expecting.' And from the reaction her mother had as she opened the door, that wasn't what she was expecting either.

A man was holding her daughter, floating above the edge of the small balcony, ready to kidnap her child. The screech hadn't covered it and it was already too late until she had reached them, as they were getting farther away. Not a second longer had she looked behind, having accepted the fact that her mother had cared for and replaced her with her younger sister to realise just what she was doing. 'I am glad you've made this choice my dear, for the realm is in need of new acolytes, you'll fit just well around.' He said and as they approached the farthest edges of the clouds, tens of children taken from their homes just disappeared into the realm of the mad moon. A verdant place of bright colours that dragged them away, tainted as a second glance as reality kicked in again. 'This isn't the realm I was expecting.' It was a small plane of the solid ground, farther enough to be just a piece of rock instead of a planet, against which stood the living moon, which was staring at them as if they were a bunch of insects rather than the human beings filled with emotions which they were. This place saddened her as well as the other children, as they looked at every star which was farther than the reach of their minds. Those eyes made it seem like it was less than a rock and more like a being that was fleshed to look like the moon, a sick universal coincidence which appeared to have taken the minds of the followers. 'What going to happen now?' Asked another child as he looked around. It was some sort of controlled environment, in the thought that they could only float closer to a distance before being taken down. Meanwhile, they listened to it talk, unaware of their existence, with its many holes being the mouths, it spoke at times but not in English. A damning existence, especially for a child and she had realised her mistake only now. In the town there was no chance, to believe that a floating pair of men took their children away from them. To say at least that there wasn't any chance for them to return was an understatement for mothers wept and fathers carried on. Another dawn had passed over the city, as the other own seemed to have grown in power and it might. Two of them were there at least, as much alive as thinkers in their midsts of discovering and remembering who they were. The chances and coincidence had placed them in the same old spot. Starving though there was plenty of uncooked meat laying around. 'Are you sure no one would mind this? I mean we're taking someone else's meat from the stove.' 'Don't worry, it's an emergency, and we're not going to use much, just the obvious needed amount. Do me a favour, pass me the bottle of wine, will you?' 'I have a name, by the way, it's Morouse.' 'I'm Grendel, a pleasure to meet you, my dear.' The feeling was mutual, the way he could tell at least, both men found themselves there and hungry in a place which was unlike home. Worst of all was the fact that they had seen one another and had pure recollections of the events which had transpired between the two of them. At least that was the least they could get from one another. There was the stove in a corner, immediately turned on and ready to be used. Morouse looked out of the door in order to see whenever or not anyone might be out there to catch them in the act, without a doubt it was too far into the night for them to be caught. 'Put on the slabs of meat then, I'll take care of the wine, that way we may avoid being caught if anything happens.' Again with that, you should relax. I've been doing this type of job ever since I was a child, it's all about being discreet about what you're doing.' He was right in that, even proved his point as he took a shallow blanket and placed it on the pane window over the door. There wasn't any other was for light to be seen, perhaps from the bottom where the cold wind entered? Well, that was tricky enough he had seen, with a trail of sausages, he blocked that tiny path below, just so he could per perfectly sure. 'Done, now no one will see the light and no one will know we're here. Are you surprised by my abilities?' 'You're being silly now but the wine is good so I can give you a pass.' He poured himself wine in a giant beer cup rather than the usual tiny glass, not that he could complain about the amount he was to take. The chef was done even farther into the night, seasoned as well, slabs of meat and stakes, he even found something green behind to place there on the sides. 'So tell me, who are you Grendel? What brought you here, to begin with?' 'I've only got a vague recollection of having been in need for a job and being approached by a strange man in a suit who told me I wouldn't need anything else in my life if I were to accept his offer. 'It was safe to say that his offer somehow appeared to be as close to his as it could get. Well, close enough that he'd know about it anyway. 'I could say we're on the same boat over here, especially since I've come by the same circumstances as you have. 'Half-way through the meat, there came a sound from the back. 'No time for stories now.' Said Grendel as he raised a fist, closer to the cold air, swallowing as much of the dinner as he could get. His friend had been done already while he was already sick of the meat. Quickly he drank what he had left of the wine and started towards the back with the empty wine bottle in his hand. 'It might be dangerous back there, what if it's the butcher or someone with his cleaver? We're still trespassers. 'Just follow me and try to keep me safe from there, in case someone thinks of taking us from there. 'There's no weapon in my hand, how am I to stop anyone from marching all over us?' 'There wasn't any answer nor any satisfaction, something dragged at the butcher's shop for too far long, when the meat ended and they found themselves walking emptily on a shallow part of the shop. Exactly how far did it extend to? Morouse alone thought it had gone past all the human limit, especially since it leads to a pair of the door which was left open. 'Turn on the light for a moment. 'He did so and revealed that they either lead towards the basement or were the entrances of multiple underground tunnels. 'We can't be certain of going there. 'Then you can leave, I've got to see what's down there, making all that noise, it could be some poor victim or someone abandoned there to die off. 'Or it could be a trap, just think of it, we just woke up here and there's already something suspicious going on in the butcher's shop. Don't you see that there's something that shouldn't have happened? I feel as I'm filled with paranoia only from standing at the edge of the doors, unable to find myself picking. 'Grendel turned around, looking quite pale and rather sane for as much wine as he had. He trusted the man, at least enough as they had both shared this fate against one another. 'Regardless of what you are to do, we're in this together and we cannot get past it with one another's help. So please, are you in this with me?' He had been cornered into answering, unable to like there it was going. 'May I at least walk with you on each one of them? I'm deadly afraid of walking on my own, especially after waking up in here. 'Very well, as long as you will help me we shall head on together. 'They had walked a few steps in the dark when it suddenly came to a stop. Some sort of sensory device which was rather uneven and out of place in a butcher's shop suddenly turned on the light. From the looks ahead this wasn't any basement but something of an oriental designed room, with a wooden floor and a pathway which lead to as far as it could've gone. 'Just what exactly is it that's happening here?' The wind that came from here wasn't the same as the one which laid outside. For one, they both looked at one another and confirmed. 'Cold wind.' And such as. 'It was snowing, a snowstorm going outside. 'To the almost neutral to warm wind which came outside, both could tell that it something was wrong. The dreaded thing at the end of the corridor, it peered at both of them and seemed to have walked off. It wasn't just the design, but both could tell of the man there and just how feudal he looked in nature, rather than the fact that he appeared to drag some sort of yellow bag, there wasn't anything that could've been worse. Both looked more than surprised and confused at what was happening before their eyes. It didn't seem like there was any sort of artificial lightning coming from over there and for once, as to be a coward, he was likely surprised of his own choice, doing well to say. 'We're into this together, right? Well, I think you should be the first one to go ahead and walk Grendel, I'm only saying this because you're the most courageous person I've met so far ever since I woke up here.' Perhaps that was true, though he felt in perhaps a lesser matter the same discrediting fear that was common for whoever went there. 'Shall we go then? We could return and check for the other side and head out of the butcher's shop.' 'And get into the cold without the proper clothes? You must be out of your mind, either that or even braver than I had initially thought you as.' There was a pause where he had to rethink his stance, indeed, it was less of a great idea but the vague form of the feudal man who walked seemed to have taken out some of the guts he had. 'Well, let's go then, we're two against one, he cannot hope to stand against us.' 'Unless he has a sword of something sharp, he did look like the sort.' His mind did a lot to interpret that and make everything a lot worse than it had to be. At least, so far, the wooden floor was fine, but what was outside, as the movable wall revealed, laid a small court surrounded by a fence. The sky was clear and the night was blue, starless but no wind nor winter. Luckily they haven't appeared to notice the two of them peering but nine men were sitting in a circle, sipping out of small cups and paying attention to their strange game on their geometrically sliced board. 'Close the door.' Said Mordecai, as he back up, trying not to be caught in sight. At least he spoke softly enough, as the wall was unfurled and the two of them had just enough time to assimilate this. 'How and why are those people there? It isn't like there's enough space or a clear weather outside.' 'It may be made by a machine, we might've been brought here just to be messed up with. But as far as this goes? I don't know just what ends and what purpose could this stand for.' Both of which nodded and set a rule for the time being. First of all, it wasn't Grendel who said it, as obvious to his nature as it might've been. 'Let's avoid them or try avoiding them at every time, I don't like the look they have, something's dangerous about them and I think you know what I mean.' As he said it he appeared to drag on his red beard, his crimson flows being only now pushed behind his ears. He was middle-aged, a bit of a self-committed coward who cared more about his life and his clothes made him look as if he had missed the past century in line. The opposite could be said about Grendel who shared some of the colour of his hair if it weren't for a touch of silver despite him being young, much younger than Mordecai. Somehow they have found themselves there, walking to the end of where they saw the man going. No one in sight, but the place appeared to be filled. As slowly as they both worked on pushing a wall, they found a sleeping pair of ladies sleeping on the floor with some men such as those they have seen before. The women were pale as milk, turned in different ways, most of them naked to the very brink, while the men shared a common strange trait. It was some sort of discolouration of the skin which made them look closer to purple or far too dark to be seen under the light. Neither the men nor the women had shown signs of being ill, rather that was their natural colour. 'Just where exactly are we now? What's the final purpose here?' 'I do not know but at least, at least I think we shouldn't make any noise. Those people frighten me as well as they do you.' He nodded and checked around the corner. A smaller area followed, like some sort of lobby where the soldiers met. Every road appeared to lead there and it was big enough to hold a small battalion there. More food and some left off drinks were there, the same small cups which had been by both of them when it came to spying on those strangers.'Should we dare drink out of their cups? It may be that's poison for us or the reason why their skin's as sick as it looks.'"Do you really think that? So I suppose the women aren't drinkers either out of them?I suppose you also think they're as pale as milk because they're abstinent from those vice and remained so pure.'Grendle appeared to be in a rather good mood despite the circumstance.'I'm serious here, we don't know what effects it might have on us.'"Then you stay there and watch me if it's poison, then you could just try to run.'In truth, that was a heavy drinker, especially for someone who hadn't taken any sip of it before. After a short competition and three or four cups, Grendle was on the floor, passed out.'Damn you, why did you have to be so stubborn now?

They'll find us out eventually if we wait here.'Worse was the fact that he had to carry the younger man on a shoulder, luckily he hadn't weighted as much, but it was dark and a lot of noise would alert anyone in the proximity.

He had thought and checked, the first wall he pulled and the room was empty. It wasn't much of a great choice to spend their night right next to the place they all had their meetings, but the lad was getting heavier by the minute.He was getting just as drowsy, covered in those lesser sheets, wondering how could they even come close to being warm in a place like that where there was little to nothing for the men. Tugged in the back, he was aware that they might come and find both of them out if it weren't for the fact that he had done such a great job in hiding his friend closer to the wall, turned around with head. Even so, a helmet laid and other pieces, all of which would be enough to hide from those men.'I hope this works but bear with me my fellow stranger, we might make it through the night alive.'Without a proper warning, he placed a bandana he saw laying around, one of many which didn't appear to belong to anyone in particular. Placing Grendel in one of the small beds on the floor, he came to tug him well and turned him around to face no one in particular. He checked to see if anyone would see, even if there was any light to be brought, be it candle of that of day, there was little to see unless someone came close enough. Speaking of which, the sounds they gave off while their march began, it made poor Mordecai take one and wrap it around his head, anything to hide his type of hair and colour since a lot of the soldiers either appeared to have their cocked and dark or entirely bald.Don't make a sound, don't let yourself be known. The sounds of the men who dropped on the ground instead of paying any attention to them came quickly. It appeared as if they have been too tired to notice, avoiding their presence entirely, even coming as close to sleeping side by side without realisation. Great, he thought, as his eyes closed, he wasn't properly used to sleeping there but in the morning they'd both disappear the first chance they got.The night was filled with only a dream, it was a valley on the outside, from which the warm wind had thrown the leaves. One thing laid in the distance which bored to him an image so dark, as the black smoke came out of three adjacent towers. No, the more he approached, the more he realised that they weren't towers and they weren't only three, as no tower could move and crush the trees and bring destruction to the world at large. Nature had become tormented under his eyes and he could do nothing to stop it from becoming that way. He ran but stopped along the path behind, once he saw the man he had met, who looked at the same image but never blinked twice.Neither said a word but looked at how the towers approached and suddenly stopped. Only now had they become aware of the fact that each tower had feet and even worse than that, now that they suddenly raised themselves above the verdure and started levitating towards them.'What will we do now?'Nothing, it's the end that's come now for both of us.'The closer they got, the easier it was for them to feel every organ inside their bodies caught in a terrible vibration which made them bleed desperately as the tormentors approached. Looking around, though the effect had been minimal so far, animals, insects, any kind of living organism was affected by them and it was getting worse. The gas they expelled, it crept the colour out of the sky. 'We need to run.' But it was too late for him, he appeared not to have been killed but changed, once he had partially dissolved because of the vibration, he had become some sort of effigy which tied itself like some sort of plant to the ground. Wherever they had gotten the reserve of skin, it appeared as if they turned the trees and ground into it as well, trying to spread it just as far as it was possible. No options left, just run, get away, be as far as you can, stop the pain, though the man, until his knees gave in and saw himself become a piece of the ground, while everything around him turned into that twisted image which brought him back. It was a sudden realisation that he was awake, something which had gone too quickly for him to know whenever or not he had a dream or a nightmare, barely having the recollection for such a thing. Worse of all, it was morning and he dared not get up. Rather, he threw an eye and saw that four empty beds were left there, while one man still stood on his arse with his back turned at them. Why won't he leave? We're so close towards this and we haven't been found yet. He appeared to have left the door partially open, only so one could see if he dared to look at it, whenever or not there were the others. The noise came from outside but the man wouldn't go away. 'Hey, hey Grendle.' There wasn't any impression of his being heard, neither of them had even moved during their sleep together, or else they might've been found much sooner than was expected. But that was about to change when a man with a suit of armour came and started yelling some orders in a foreign language as it came to be, footsteps came but still no signs or reason for them being fast asleep. He had properly left the room, but not the man who gave the orders, no, he came closer and his accent suddenly turned to a violent thing which raged with anger. Though he couldn't understand a word of that, both of them had become awake by the shouts the man indulged himself into. He had too much impatience for soldiers who overslept and disobeyed and immediately bent to grab both of the covers off. Neither had enough time to think but tackled him to the ground immediately, gagging him around the mouth with the piece of cloth while the other one helped to restrain him. It was fairly easy since the armour wasn't made of steel, rather easier to turn him around and tie him with the little they had. Silently, he was stripped of armour and left only to a shirt, harder to be done since they had to push an arm or an entire leg at a time, but they had done some immediately. 'Again with that sickly coloured skin. You don't suppose it may be some sickness now that might come from standing too close to them, do you?' 'I won't concern myself with that, not when there's worse going on out there. Do you think they heard?' There was little but for a nod, as each of them started dressing. Mordecai got the undergarments while Grendle had the armour on. Those had to do for as long as they thought they could carry on the act. It wasn't unlikely that their friend there would make some noise as soon as they went out of the room, but at least they managed to get that chance alone. 'What do you suppose will happen to us if we were to head the other way?' 'I don't know but you may be right about it, the way we came seems to be blocked. I can hear them talk even from here and judging by their tones alone, I'm afraid something serious might be on the way.' Just so they were clear, neither of them held weapons, as they appeared to have confirmed, not to mention that these men who were against them were to be more than prepared. 'We won't have the element of surprise any longer, better be prepared for what's to come next unless you want us to be caught.' Grendle coughed and tried to think a way through, though there appeared to have had a sense for multiple doors he had been suspicious of the truth. 'I do not think there is a way to get through to the butcher by going on another one of the hallways, whatever happened here, it may have nothing to do with it. At least I can see that we either go past them."Or we head outside.' Interrupted Mordecai, with some sort of scornful desire to

known something of the alternative, there was none of that alone and he wanted to look and see. It was settled between them, as they slipped and rubbed the wall behind. Of course, they were to slip away, as they walked with a helmet over the face while the other had it grabbed below. The purple coloured man just rubbed his eyes and passed them by, far too tired to be able to recognise any kind of man who went into his view.'So far so good, just make sure you don't open your mouth unless you want us both to be caught in the middle of it.'Most were either in the process of waking or still asleep, it had been the perfect moment until a shout had been heard.'Someone discovered the man, run Mordecai, make it for the exit pane!'There had been some sort of words which came from mouth to mouth, going around, coming to a stop, until no one appeared to have known a thing or to be able to know what was going so far.'Well, we have an even lesser chance unless we make it past the door.'In the room they had reached there had been a fight it seemed, as they soon found out that the shout wasn't for them, but for another clan which came to fight. One man laid against a small pillar, killed by a few arrows which had easily penetrated his chest, the reason being that he had no armour to protect himself not any chance to realise what happened. His blood had run down on the floor and surprisingly, despite the colour of his skin, he bled like a human. 'There, I think'No, they might be there, just behind the main entrance, we cannot just go out anymore, come with me.'He came closer to the poor man and started pulling out the arrows, one by one until there had been none shoved inside of him. With a sudden gasp, he had almost been brought alive, if it weren't for the fact that he had bled far too much to be saved. The colouration had become in the least lighter and to him, they both seemed like a strange pair. 'I cannot, neither of us can understand what you're trying to say.'Clearly, there was a lot of pain involved, though that's how it was when deadly weapons missed all of your vital spots. The man guided the arrow in his had just right in front of the heart.'You cannot do that to him, Grendle, it would be murder.'Shut up for a moment.'His dry lips were moist again and he couldn't think properly past a headache brought by the heavy sounds coming from everywhere around him.'We're in the middle of a fight now and we have to make a choice, look at him for a moment, does he have to suffer any longer.'Caught under the pressure, Mordecai knelt and pushed the arrowhead further inside with the help of his fellow until the man's heart stopped. This was something he hadn't expected to be caught doing and consequences would certainly come out of it.'Are we done here now, may we go?'Grendle nodded and started making for another wall, they were to hide in it until they found. Dead men who were rotting, caught in their sleep and in an utmost peculiar way executed. Something extremely hot had melted holes into them, which dropped into the floor and farther below, the sort of assassination technique which left no traces whatsoever, not even the blood which drained below.'Whatever happened here it was planned all along.'They may ignore this place knowing everyone's dead, but we cannot fight the arrows or hide with the dead.'Can't we at least try to run as far as we can? We may have a chance that way.'Or if the least came to be, he thought at that at least one of them might be lucky enough to make it away while the other was doomed to agony.'You can make it for a run, but I won't go past that door.'Look at them, how they were killed, holes in their eyes, their guts and plenty of other obscure places. These people are good at what they do, we're nothing but peculiar strangers.'The shouting began from one of their sides, as they were much aware of what was going on, nothing could've been worse than the fact that their presence was made aware of.'What do we do now? Grendle, what do we do?"Calm down and damn it. We need to find a way to defend ourselves from them, other than a bunch of pointy arrows."There's nothing around, not even a lance, or a sword, nothing blunt neither sharp."Then run, you were right, we cannot fight so there's nothing but one option left.'For some reason Mordecai found it quite amusing, to be given to him as being right, especially since it hadn't happened for the man to admit it is such a direct manner.'Should we risk going through the front."It might be safer than returning the way we came.'The short consideration appeared to have ended as the ghastly figures tormented them from the end of the corridor, without a doubt they had been trying to use some sort of intimidation from afar. To be able to win the fight before it even started, in a way it had worked, as the two of them opened the gate, rather managed to push it to the side and fled from the area.Sparks were shallow, no fire started, that of which they both had witnessed after a long run might've been nothing but a small raid or a cheap shot against their enemies into the night."Take off those clothes, do you really want to be seen like that now? Other people might get a bad idea if they see you dressed that way, especially without a weapon and the look."Speaking of which.'Both had managed to get rid of them quickly, as they were abandoned near the road, in some sort of hole which laid there, as was said in time. A man passed them, bearing an ox and a cart, carrying hay, looking in an utmost peculiar way and their colour, faces and apparel, not in a way of fear but rather curiosity.Neither they nor he appeared to have any sort of thought of violence so far, at least not in the way either of them would've expected from one another.'Keep walking and don't get any attention onto us, as soon as we find some weapons and make for a full set of disguises, we'll be able to return to where we came from.'It wasn't as likely as they appeared to stare, but they would soon lose themselves into the Province ahead, with its darkly laid fields and the rows of poorly burnt moss which was placed near.As far as the land went, both of them could see far into the distance but remember.'Have you had the dream as well?'There was a nod of understanding and where, in place of all those tall structures built by men, there had been the giant floating towers, bringing destruction at hand.'Should we go ahead and make for that? It appears as if it's important if it came into both of our dreams."Do you remember the destruction and the pain? Or have you awakened before I?You were the last one to get up if I recall it and I don't think you can judge that well the complexity of our conundrum."Stop being such a coward Mordecai, let's make it for that point and explore the place, it's not as often as it happens to stumble upon such a scenery."Nor to take the life of a man.' The last one was spoken in silence but he could tell by the way he felt his entire expression of the face change that it had contorted at the guilt.It wasn't even that hard to be convinced and taken closer on the way to the next village where the normal people came and acted normal. Of course, they have appeared like strangers in the middle of the day when everyone was working hard, just to come to a momentary stall.'Greetings, greetings, no need to raise yourselves.'There was little to no response to what came next, no false admiration, just the strange look and the heavily tanned skin from those who worked on the fields. Neither could tell they have seen someone who could've become so much darker than he normally appeared to be. Even the women in the village seemed to talk between them and laugh at their appearance.'Don't you think we're bound to get in trouble if we keep this way everywhere we go?"There's little to no chance now, especially since we barely escape alive.'An older man approached them next, ready and prepared, he bowed, which was followed by both of them as well. The man appeared quite calm and peaceful, that sort which pointed towards a house and waved for them to follow.'Do you think we could trust him?"Should we make it for a run then?"Not yet, just hold it for a moment now, there might be food in there and I'm already starting to feel as if I'm hunched.' Though the house was small, they entered and closed the door, both of them being able to recognise that this was the house of their chief, or mayor, whatever he called himself there. Worst was the fact that the walls had been painted inside, not with the common tapestry those warriors had, but something which dragged at the eye and at the mind. Pictures, images, reproductions and interpretations of the darkest wars that might've been illustrated in an utmost peculiar manner. There were lurid beasts that had long necks and multiple clawing mouths which dragged the poor men in their pools of water. Such things might've seemed normal for their people but utmostly bizarre in the representation. Men which ate their children, beast of wool and black spikes from below, pulling from the darkest depths where all the skeletons were tied together forming chains to hold their darkest possession. Something might've been wrong with the person who painted that, especially since the colours used were rather changed, just so that they could reflect some sort of an aberration and disgust even at the first glance. The man made a few gestures as they came to sit down on the floor, making some loud claps that signalled for his servants to come. At least four of them arrived from somewhere of the confines of the small house, creating the illusion that it was far deeper than it actually was. For once, the so-called servants were merely two of the villagers they had both seen working outside, not to mention that the small room from which they came from had an exit from behind the house. Both of them had the worse feeling that might've been, to be cheated in this ruse rather than know what's happening. 'Look Grendle, it's that damned drink again, you'd think they're getting it from the same place.' The same sized cups brought the thought it might've been some sort of tradition to share it if it weren't for the fact that what was poured inside appeared to have been bloodier than usual. It wasn't the drink either expected, but crimson as if they had come from their very veins, with some black in their cups and some sort of vein-looking, moving worms. Both the servants left the room as soon as they had been served, it wasn't clear why they had been given it, but the mayor just grinned and waited. 'He's waiting for us to make the first move, what are we to do?' 'Calm down already, this might be some sort of test, all right? Just play along with me and don't try to rush anything unless I tell you.' Mordecai was ferociously shaking at the sight of it but followed Grendle in whatever plan he had in mind. They looked immediately at their host and how it appeared to have mirrored every move in a slower kind of way, rather, he was waiting for them to drink first before he made an additional move. What's in your mind you creepy old decrepit thing? This cannot be the kind of greeting your people welcome strangers with, he hadn't doubted in the least that something didn't fit. But rather, the expressionless demeanour appeared to have bored nothing but confusion. 'Lift it to the nose and sniff it.' Whispered Grendle, making sure to take each sniff in. There was nothing to the substance, no smell whatsoever, whoever blood it might've been, or whatever creature had it belonged to, this was kept in something. Worse was the fact that the worms appeared to have reacted poorly to his constant sniffing or the blowing of the air from his nose, even getting split in half by one long breath, which was unexpected. 'I think we should drink it now, we clearly have gotten ourselves into this, we should be the ones who go out, even if there's a small chance it might be poison.' 'Don't try making me even more nervous than I already am. I shall drink the blood as well if I am bound to die, know that it was all your fault Grendle.' 'You were the one who wanted to go together rather than slipping away.' 'And do you still regret that decision in your mind?' There wasn't an answer but he began to drink the small pool which laid in his cup. Strangely, that didn't taste like blood, nor had it had the consistency which was found in the human body, rather than that, it felt like crushed cherries. The strange man laughed as he drank and looked at the two afraid men who hadn't known what was going on. He spoke in his language but remained quite amused, revealed his open mouth and forked tongue. Obviously, someone had done that to him, but that wasn't important to note. A little black coiling moving ball laid on the side of his mouth, moving around as if it were alive. It seemed to have stretched as far as to lay behind and pump something into the man. That substance which ran deeply inside looked like a vein, a purple thing which might've been the very reason for their desolate colour. 'We have to leave now, I don't like the look of that in his mouth.' For once I tend to disagree, my friend, I don't believe we should run yet, not since we're to be welcomed in a such a manner.' After which, Mordecai appeared to have joined the man in his laugh. After the waiting though, they had been brought one of the mightiest creatures that might've lived, some sort of giant meat filled bird which occupied the entire table, seasoned among the other dishes that laid on the side. There was at least a wonder how the man might've afforded that, especially for them, the strangers who appeared in their town, it was too much. He could see it in the so-called servant's eyes, though they looked different, their eyes spoke of the same emotions as if it might've come from a brother. 'Are they not eating either?' Asked Grendle, but the man appeared to have caught the gesture in a totally wrong manner. His voice got louder and as he forced the man to go ahead and leave, there wasn't any doubt that he hadn't planned on it. Something in the room happened as well, a darkening of the light, a chance as the colours dimmed. Even the paintings on the walls changed from the virtuously looking mounted warriors to the wickedly touched creatures which remained. Faces dim, pointed down, ink running on the creatures they fought, for a moment though, it appeared that the hunter had become the hunted. Something about the image and how the ink appeared to have extended from the creatures they banished below made it seem that in the end, they were the ones which won and the men were cursed from that moment on. 'I do not know what to feel about all this, it might be a trick to scare us, if it were such a thing, though I feel we might not be as welcome as we were originally greeted as.' 'Nonsense my friend, you worry far too much for a man who wants to be free. Just do as I do and play along, we'll eat, we'll drink and be on our way.' Though it did appear like the meat had been taken from an animal which might've been far too big. First, that thing which looked like blood but tasted like cherries and now came the glutton which almost came to look like the belly of a man than an animal as big to them. 'Well, aren't you going to start Grendle? It looks as if he's waiting for us to make a move and I think the room's only going to get darker the more we'll keep him waiting.' At first, he thought of trying it but got reluctant, there were some empty plates which they received, most likely so they'd get exactly what they needed to do. If only I were to take a deep cut and see what lays inside, it should be in a short enough area, just so it could be unnoticed. To say the least, he was aware of the intense stare and the fact that the more he waited the gloomier their host became. Without a doubt, if he were to wait any longer, it'd be worse for the wearing, as that wasn't the face of a man who was displeased with his guests but rather someone hungry. Grendle made the first cut, some sort of circle, but it wasn't perfect, it fell inside. He peeked and saw nothing, as the light refused to travel but felt like making the hole larger until the next slab of meat fell on his plate. At least now their host smiled and turned his gaze at Mordecai, with nothing but an expectation. The two looked at one another before being pointed towards the meat. What exactly is he planning for me to do? Try to shove my hands inside the belly of the beast? That wasn't what he was to expect but he had done it with the small knife he had received, a strange forked thing that was neither common nor uncommon for the sight, only the design being foreign at all. But he pushed it at far, into the hole which was made and pulled out an extremely fat liver which had laid inside. From the way he had managed to take it, it seemed as if there had been nothing holding it in place there. As meaty and a bit raw, Mordecai looked most displeased, right before their host muttered and grabbed some meat for himself and started eating, drinking, passing on the cherry filled strange bottle. 'Should we risk it? Even if it is to be a man we're having?' No man could've had such a liver, at least not this size, but they were both contemplating the consequences of the act of cannibalism. It was too fine of a job that the neck was sealed, the arms and legs weren't present that it might've looked like a giant bird, not to mention that most of the bones were missing, the organs were bigger and too much of it was to be thought about. 'I'll risk it before we anger our host.' Grendle took a bite and was delighted, the taste of the chicken was most divine, even better than what he had expected, to the point where he didn't even think of it being any worse. The other side couldn't deal with the fact that he was hungry as well as he started eating the liver with his hands alone, delighting in the test, pouring himself some cherries flavoured, worm-filled cup. It looked like the most repulsing thing to someone who had no context of their entire conversation, not to mention that there wasn't even a chance for them to look away. Just on time, the room got darker and more purple in shade, though this time it had come from above as opposed to the point where it had come from below. The floor wasn't spared either and thought it was rude to get off from the table, watched by the host's bludgeoned eyes, he pulled the wall and noticed it was getting dark. How many hours have we spent here? Mordecai wondered at the fact, just before he noticed that there were soldiers camped around the town. He had recognised those damned uniforms and came to being seen. 'We need to leave before it's late, we've spent enough time here and they already reached us.' 'Who?' Asked the man, who dared to cut a bigger slice. The host had his mouth filled, unable to speak before he started choking under their eyes. 'Help him Grendle!' Having yelled in his ear messed with his walk, to the point before arriving to grab him from behind he felt nothing any longer, dropping whatever was in both of their mouths, they peered at him. Mordecai did the only thing he could think off, look again to see that the soldiers were approaching. 'They're coming to Grendle, they're coming here and we got a corpse on our hands. And we cannot explain to them what happened since we do not know the language, do you understand that?' 'Calm down for a moment and let me think of something. Check the house fast, look for something blunt or sharp, we might need something along the way.' Meanwhile, he peered furiously at the safest places candles which laid over small plates of water. They were desperately trying to protect their wood and linen houses, it had seemed. Well, it'd serve little to nothing any longer, since he started pushing them around. 'Found a few maces here, should I grab two? What on Earth are you doing there?' 'Just follow me and escape from behind. We'll settle this later if they decide to chase us.' He had grabbed the mace and pricked another slab of meat which they'd take on the way. Followed by the immediate escape, the house had burst into fire without even much of their help, closing the door behind. The soldiers came and jumped, trying desperately to decide if they were to come inside or not, seeing how there was still a figure stretched over the table. The mutterings left a trail as the two of them fled away from the stage, leaving behind sweat and some ink which had run over their hands as for him. 'Poor man, to get out this way, in a most strange manner. I could only hope he didn't suffer.' The night came, when eventually they appeared to have stopped the blunt trails of smoke, leaving nothing but the mere desire they have had to return to the place from which they fled. 'Just think about it, the perfect plan, they wouldn't expect for us to return and snick during the middle of the night, that way we could just return while no one suspects a thing."Do you truly think that'd work? Have you not paid any attention Grendle? They are civilised, they're more than ready to take both of us together, even more than that. We are trapped in her without a way to go."Don't say that, don't you dare say that to me, I know there's a way to go and I won't let any sick butcher or them get through my head, understand?"Unfortunately, the sad nod wasn't for either him nor for himself, as he had doubted himself that there was a chance that they'd get through without the place being fully abandoned.'That's it, I think I've become fortunate enough to come up with a plan.

Wait a minute, can you hear that shuffling in the bushes?"They had been stopped in their tracks, looking at the beauty which had come from the thorny bushes. It would seem as if she had been touched by the moon, right as she had come with a bright skin which almost managed to produce an aura in the dim light of the night. To say the least, neither of them had ever been as close to one of the women of this place as they had been now, drowsy and tired, they looked at her attire and said nothing.Silk barely stretched around her round form, not to mention that there wasn't in the least of chances that she bore any sort of undergarments. It was enough to grab both of their tongues and eye, just as no word had to be spoken and they did nothing but obey. Both of them followed her as if there wasn't any doubt at the intention which was to be called upon them, they wanted that being, more than anything in the world.After a short trip through the woods, there appeared to have been some sort of change in the desire both of them felt. For once, it appeared as if there was little to nothing around, not a village, just father into the plains, lower by the river stood her house. She was apparently covered in small seed, from the work which was done around the place.All around the river, it had seemed to have happened on this strange behaviour, seeds being washed on the plains, darker ones growing into saplings but never spreading. The closer to her house, the easier it was to notice that the growing saplings were hosting the shadow that let the small decaying mushrooms to grow. It was a strange relationship between the two things which would bother any man who was hungry enough to dry if one could handle the stench.Another one of these small houses, made of wood, as if it would seem to be long lasting if only there was stone. But there was another thing at which his eyes had peered upon, at least in the terms of wanting to know what her true feeling was. Barely lit inside her house, she had no candle but waited for them to make a move.'Wait, Grendle, you don't suppose she brought us here to."Just shut your mouth Mordecai, out of all the places and times you could've decided to open it, now it ain't the right one.'Shadows grew as the light dimmed, it wasn't long until she hadn't her clothes in. The experience was rather strange, as she slithered between the two of them, at night, inside.Nothing more was spoken of the night. Back in the morning, they had already been back on the road, trying to get on track, for a strange lack of words, they waved behind as the small ghastly lady and carried even further, unable to comprehend what had happened after the events of the night. They had remembered though could do little to understand what would be the consequences for what was done in their names. Such an ill manner in which they came to the point where there'd be no return.'If we keep going this way, we may not be able to come back. Would that be worth it, be stuck in here, Mordecai?I don't know about you but I see no feasible way to get past those soldiers, we're not fighters and to say the least, we haven't made any lasting impressions."I beg to differ on the latter my good friend, I think you may be right, this place brings promise.'Though the damned just waited as the pass and it was only now that they were to listen and understand what exactly went there and what they were preparing for. Folk moving and passing by them haven't noticed in the least what was going on. For starters neither had them, as the seemed as if they were preparing for war.'I don't like the looks of it, soldiers, men carrying short swords and lances, do you suppose that you may know what this means?'It means that there might be a chance after all if we come by the good side of things. Look at that flag out there in the distance, does that look like someone who respects the authority and fights for those in charge?'Farther in the distance, past the many passing people with their carts and supplies, there was a giant flag which had been raised, with an utmost peculiar symbol on top of it. From the looks, the tormented man in the image had nothing to do with anything but the brutal acts in which he was treated served as a warning for those that might've stood against them. At least that was obvious enough, more so than the people who were fleeing from their lands.'Look at those fields in the distance, do they not look as if they had been burnt? I think we might've stumbled upon something.'More so that they had thought, the men, women and even children among them were as cold as they could've been. They passed dead bodies which seemed to have been laid just around the moulds and lands, right around the round than pay any attention to the dead. Why, they appeared to have been members of the cruellest race they have encountered in the past, not to mention that despite the strangeness and morbid hospitality, their language remained most bizarre.Grendle took a few steps off the road and knelt against one of the bodies, ready to inspect just what was going on. He opened its mouth and looked at the strange organ which ran from it, right into the body, down the neck, pumping whatever there was left inside it.'Mordecai, throw me an arrowhead for a moment."What for exactly?"Just throw me one.'He had got what he asked for, with the least of which there came a few reactions from those who laid around. Though the man might've been dead, that thing inside of him made him feel as if a part of him was alive. With one sharp cut that part had immediately died, blowing that small amount of blood it bore onto the ground and finally stopped pumping.It wasn't as if he thought that whatever it was might've brought him back to life, but the simple idea of being set into some sort of coma in the middle of nowhere and starving to death somehow made him rethink of the whole plight through.As he was done, the men and women looked away. It was only then that they had been fully paid attention to, rather than different men, they looked as if they were agents of death who came to give the final rites to the dreaded end of their lives. Now, as they came back on the road, both of them notices that the men and women who came into contact with them gave a slight bow, if not one which was more formal around.'I could get used to this, wouldn't you?'Though the young man appeared to have been caught far too much into his mind to answer, being able to cut through the crowd and focus on ahead. For once, he was adamant about going ahead towards those tall buildings on the distance, even so, he pointed them and grinned.'We'll travel there, I know this to be the right path, and nothing short of a civil war might stop us now.'Their voices waned, they have been distant, for in those tall buildings they were pointing towards, the men were ill headed. Four bridges connected them, right near the very top, the base of which appearing more like wide towers being placed just so they'd be adjacent but far enough for it to take minutes to get from one of them to another. If fair is to say what it appeared inside, the dreaded paintings which corrupted themselves under the night sky. Practitioners of the dark arts and mad-men lived inside, those who had forced themselves past the normal and have become the darkest members of their race. That purple skin they bore inside was unhealthy, especially for the slaves. Most amusingly, the way of torture was one as discreet as a small square-like room inside the structure, which was tight enough only for a person to fit inside.There had been hundreds of those, thousands if all four structures were combined. Even after death, the whistling and their agony could be heart between their cries. From the distance, it gave off a feeling as if those dreaded tower heads were haunted and that any entrance would be forbidden for them there. Though it was undeniably so, that the masters at the very edges took the skin of peasants, boiled it into pots and applied it on themselves to get that special colour they desired. Most of them practised it and felt as if no life was wasted as long as it had been used for their own. 'Slave, bring us another man.' The vulgar accent, the voice which bred agony came and passed. Oh, what a dreadful sight it had been, to look upon that crafted armour, how sickly it might've looked if it was hit by the slightest ray of light. It was unwashed and the helmet bore a face of stark terror, if it wasn't for those sharp vine-like ornaments which went in every angle and appeared to sting people by accident, it might've been close to decency. If that had been the case, but for the time being, he looked dreadful and acted as such, dragging another peasant from the scruff of the neck and bearing him closer to the justice which had to be paid. He was brought in the foremost room and presented in smoke, the poor creature could barely breathe as if it wasn't enough, he was thrown on the floor and kicked in the back so he would properly bow. At the smell of the sick thing, the other masters had suddenly made themselves appear from various hidden corners or entries from the wall. It looked as if fresh meat was on the menu and they have been properly spoiled for that reason alone that they wanted to be so. 'Fresh and colourful, where have you found one as dark as I?' He's going to make a fine type of ink, he might even darken me to reach the bowels. 'Enough of that brothers, let us wait and examine it first, we don't want to be rash and best this creature until it is prepared, as the custom goes.' The poor thing wasn't even considered human, to have been brought by that dark night in front of those coloured dark beings. There wasn't any trust between one another and from the looks of it, there wasn't in the least any time left until each of them would jump and grab a piece to rip the poor man apart. For there had been various methods to obtain that colouring of the skin, which either involved the boiling or eating the coloured skin from the meat. Both of the methods, including the various variations which might've spawned from them appeared to have been reflected in the poor man's eyes. He was dreadfully aware that despite being a poor man, there'd be no mercy given for him, at least not coming from those starving beasts in front of his eyes. 'I say we take him piece by piece and let's devour.' 'Stop, brother, you'd only make it worse, I pray that we come to an agreement about what we must do with him ahead. We cannot take care of this later, we must decide now instead of waiting and give him a chance to escape.' A set of laughter came from the brooding men as if the poor creature had a chance. Even as he desired to escape, knowing that there'd be no chance other than a fair judgement which would make it quick, the thought made him want to. 'I've come to a conclusion.' But before it could be passed, a surge came into the man and he started running through the open door, seeing how he wasn't stopped nor followed by the guard, he grinned. 'I will be free, I'll be free.' His words spoke of the greatness of adoration for whatever deity might've helped him then and there if it weren't for the fact that he had lost himself in thought and failed to see. That at the end of the long pane he walked upon, down the stairs, those master who had been speaking about his fate were already there, waiting for him to come and to approached. 'The master has no patience for fools and we're afraid you've already lost your chance for something quick.' Worse than anything was the matter that the voices were coming from below the stairs, rather from everywhere around, from others so-called masters who decided to toy with the food. That's what he was, quite aware of the fact that he was to be slaughtered like cattle, unable to know good from wrong. At least there was the function in which he could put himself forward into, step, by step, as he jumped into the motion, ready to end it before they'd bring the torture. But as his feet left the ground, prepared to leap on the stairs and break his bones, he was tightly but firmly grabbed by the scruffs of the neck but a hand which was big enough to encompass it entirely. Those ill fingers had become grey at their end, long and skinny, nails softly pressed against the flesh. But he was revealed to be an old man, not immortal, one of the masters thought himself too far to be a victim of a poor creature such as that which ran away from him. 'Let go of me you mongrel.' The master said, as the man turned around and grabbed him in return. With the realisation that he was far more feeble than him, he pushed the dreadful one against the wall, feeling how he was crushed and wailed in pain. While this was happening, the true ruler watched over them and raised a hand for everyone involved to stray their hands and witness the struggle between the two of them. First, the nails came off, as rotten as they had become, there was no force in the skin which held them sticking in the fingers. Even the colouration fell aside from his body as sweat ran through. 'Let go, I said let go of me, I saved you, putrid mongrel!' But those cries had done nothing more than reminding him of the fact that he was to be eaten or boiled, only for that dark skin to become a temporary accessory of the kind. He had been eventually turned away from the wall once the poor man realised that enough bones broke in the body, switched then threw away on the stairs. As he rolled, the body started breaking apart, like a small box of old bones which had never been supposed to come out into a fight. When the body got down to the others, they started as their dreaded brother then back at the poor man. Almost instinctively, he turned around to hear the judgement, this time, his breath was steady as he waited calmly, content with whatever was to happen. It was only for a moment that the others came into their right minds and happened to reach for him in the moment of him raising another hand to stop them. 'I believe that our brother was greedy and wrong to attack him without me having passed the judgement brothers. For that alone, I have decided that this man in front of us, who's so desperately fought for his freedom now deserved to be set given the freedom he deserves.' Almost slithering, they coiled at the sound and jerked their bodies into mad motion which reflected upon both of them the pain they felt as the escape of their prey. How could he set him free after he has murdered one of our brothers? 'Be reasonable now, how might we go away and join them in their appearance? What might the others say of this if they see a peasant escape from our tower?' 'Who said anything about escaping the tower? I have merely passed the judgement as being freed from the agony of death.' With a change in the smile, the thought of freedom had passed away. It was almost as if then and there, a trap-door in the wall opened and pulled him inside, pushing and guiding him farther inside, left and right, pulled in front, perhaps a few feet down below, until he ended in a small space from which no one would hear him wailing. That was to be his tomb, as it closed and lost itself there, leaving them filled with disdain and the very thought that one of their brothers had died. 'What are we to do about him then?' 'Are we to use him as our own for the purposes we are told? Or may we do with him as we truly desire?' 'Go ahead and rip him apart, boil his pieces and do with him as you properly please. Bring me but a cup of his colour if you want to live or bring me yet another, do you understand?' 'Alas, they bowed and took one of their own instead, grabbing him by the scruff of the neck and carrying it into the room. That was well enough to be called, the worst of experiences that were to be had, despite what they have shown they felt ill. Neither of which had been content with bringing themselves to cut the bonds and take care of the decaying corpse of one of their brothers.' 'Look at what had become of him, one of our oldest siblings, fallen in the most accusatory manner. I cannot believe this happened to him, to struggle and to fail, against a peasant of them all.' Even hearing himself speak was rather incredibly awfully mannered, instead of which there came no surprise. The body twitched at some touches but the mind was dead. Something of the compound which went into the skin made it pop up on the touch, there wasn't any possible way one could avoid that after so many chemicals had been dumped into their bodies.'This procedure that we are doing, would it happen to be dangerous?'The three self-proclaimed surgeons looked at the body and appeared to have shared a common thought, about the volatile nature of the skin and how exactly would they have to go about it.'Look at this and judge for yourself, whenever or not it is dangerous to feel at last.'With a small precise cut of the small knife, there wasn't even a chance to move before one of the hands lifted itself and jumped at his throat. The stretch upon which it had achieved was unreal, the response even more so, as it knew who was the one who was doing what was done.'Help me, brothers.'A tiny voice came from his throat before the others realised what was going on. They clung to the notion and brought themselves back to their senses where there was little to no doubt.'The skin shouldn't react this way, it shouldn't have the power, nor should it have the muscle to do anything.'Each of them looked at the naked body in turns, looking forward to seeing what was the secret behind the power, how could it have known?First, one to judge and examine was Stratos with his mind which slipped away at a time when there came something to examine. It would've been an understatement to say that he was interested in the body for this had to precedent in the matter and the only other body which was to be experimented upon was his own.'Look now and feel for his fingers, can't you feel that already? The skin had begun breaking everything inside his body apart and before long there'd be nothing left but the flat layer of skin we so desire, right without the least of trouble.'Each of them felt until they saw what he was talking about. Some of the fingers had thin bones, while others had none left, at a fast rate as well. Most of the muscle mass was affected and right in front of their eyes, it just happened that the creature would be no more.'How long until this happens Stratos?'I concur that we may be able to boil it in half a scene of the moon there when we will be ready to bring the cup to the sleeper.'For some reason they each felt as if they heard something which amused them in a most indifferent manner. Neither of which showed any of the dread they felt as if that of which they saw in front of them would be the consequence of not feeding the skin and managing the colouring behind it.Awful, awful feeling on the road, instead, by the two men which should've been dead. They spoke none of the languages and had no time to explain, yet they knew enough and understood some signs, managing to earn a living for themselves from road to road as works around.Most recently came the tilling around a field, despite being some sort of civil conflict going around, there were still people going by their way.'Are you tired already Grendle? Weren't you supposed to be a young lad?'I wasn't built for this and you know it. Just take a look at my arms and you should understand.'It's hard, I know, but we can't let ourselves be caught into all of this, just remember, you said that if we were to face against what those four strongholds have to offer, we might be able to face the soldiers and return to our homes.'Wishful thinking at best, though neither of them was ready to accept any other truth.At once came the man who hired them and asked them back after the longest day they felt alive. It was a great job what they have done there and it was rightfully reflected in his expression even though his words said nought.'Well, are we to stand or should we return?'I think you're right, it's fine enough a job for them to be pleased, at least I know it would've pleased me if I owned the land.'Hard enough, as they have been unsure how exactly their system was, but they were paid in coins at least and given a meal in the man's small home. This time at least there wasn't any trick of the kind, no darkening, at last, just the man and his wife who have prepared a meal and looked at them as if he had never seen the likes of which have shown themselves at the front door. It had been difficult enough to convince them that they were there to help but other than that. Other than that, Mordecai felt quite ill, not physically but in bad terms with the coping of the people around him. They looked different, both at them and in the ways they looked and as indifferent as he was at first, once the guilt of killing the man passed, he realised his high dislike of the people. As long as he kept his vacant expression and dared to look away before their eyes met, he was more than content with carrying on, hidden from the eyes. 'Next time, let's avoid the road, it might be better that way, I think we could make a small detour through those rocks among the passage.' 'That thing doesn't look as safe, even from the distance, I wager that we may get lost if we start going through. Should we not at least carry on the road some more?' 'We won't make any progress this way Grendle, can't you see that we're wasting day after day here and making as little as we can? We're already as far away from that point as we can be.' 'And cutting the time shorter is the only reason, right?' They paused in silence as another man passed by. He hadn't an animal to carry his luggage but rather a backpack twice his size and multiple garments of pants and spoons tied around various parts of his body. He was in the least strangely kind enough to go around them and pay no heed to the argument at hand. 'Look at that, can't you see those sings and what they look like? That is what disturbs me the most, it's looking at what they have on them. And every time I look again upon them, it always gets worse.' He proved to Grendle as he asked to look upon the sings which were hanging on the stranger's backpack. They got bloodier, sharper, darker in contrast with the slightly dim blue sky. It was the same effect some houses had and neither of them could explain why. 'Again I look away, then return my gaze, only to see the man looking like some sort of a shallow sprite who mocks me during my walks. I can see them on the fields as well, just look out there.' Both of them undeniably saw, if not dimmer while the other could see them in much greater detail. Small creatures, which seemed to be limbed and mock the human bodies while keeping a twisted posture in their fat bodies filled with lumps. They were covered in coal and for the time acted as if unobserved as if there was nothing to do but to get the fields dirty after men's work. 'Don't worry about them, there's a rain on the way, it should wash whatever damage there may be.' With the sharpness of the ear, there was almost a clue that they might be able to hear and produce a sound. All of the way they stared at them and how they came to it, as well. The world crackled, their vision shattered, it was almost as if they had taken a wrong turn. 'Did you feel that as well or was it only I?' No answer came, but they both felt it, making it seem as if everything which they had known and as far as they went wasn't any longer feasible to comprehend. They were in the room and it wasn't lit, as for the luck of the cobbler, they stood next to a clicking device which was accidentally pressed by Mordecai. It lit up to a small room, made of metal, with a small table in the middle. Nothing laid inside, but for some reason, there was a window by the side or a pane, an opening of some sort, it was really hard to explain. From the form and the looks it bore, it didn't matter much since it was barred. 'Look, there's a panel next to it.' 'What, are we going to press it now? Don't you find it odd that we found ourselves here after going on the road?' 'It might've been a dream, I'd wager.' Though even that stopped abruptly as he thought about how real it all had appeared in his mind. Little to no certainty remained to be told about what was to be next. 'He pressed some buttons, got it right. The metal barring opened at once to reveal that they were still on the road, with a minor difficulty which was the fact that they were trapped, no longer exposed to the world out there.' 'We're trapped Grendle, we're no longer going to be able to escape.' 'Calm down, we're yet to do so, it's a minor set back, that's all.'He hadn't liked being there a bit, ever since he stepped away from the house, the peculiarness of the place and the strange things which happened did nothing but ruin the comfort which laid in his mind.'Let's get away from this place then, the sooner we escape from this room, the better.'Automatically, the window was barred again, and there appeared to be no lock on the door. It was large, that had to be given and it seemed as if they were being led to a path which would only have them descending.'Should we go there now? Won't it be dangerous at all? I seem to recall that the last time we did something which was such as this, we came to all the problems that lay on ahead."That time we had a chance, now we have none so carry on.' He'd push if it weren't for the fact that they enjoyed their conversations.It was a long way down, he was sure of that, and as a matter of fact, there would be little to do from now and then, as every light lit, only to reveal that they were in for a long way ahead.'What must we do now brothers, if not to boil him? It's taken so much longer to take all the proper measurements but as you can see, there's nothing left of him but the skin which kept on living.'For as a matter it would leap ahead at the first chance to attach itself to another living organism and start eating from him.'How many attempts have there been for it to escape?"We need to take care and act as rationally as we can, there's no other way around the fact, we need to make certain that it's taken care off now before it gets out of hand.'From the looks of which, it had been pinned done at each limb, with long triangular constructs of steel which held it in place, though from time to time it managed to raise itself a few inches in the air.It felt like a ghastly thing which tried to run, to slip away than to be boiled alive. At least there was some sort of impression that it knew what they were planning to do with it, even though that was unlikely since the brother they knew was dead.'Don't heed what's trying to do, it's only trying to distract us and escape."What if what we're doing isn't right, brother?"We'll do as we were told to unless you want to join him in the line and end up as he had.'The feat of sharing the same fate as the pale skin was rather unutterably being embrace. Both of them left to prepare the small cauldron for the ritual, in which neither of them thought they had to stay behind and look at the skin.Such a vague lack of vigilance forced it to come back to life, in the last attempt when it suddenly jerked to get free, being pierced further off until they left four holes inside the body. The wind suddenly blew the armless and legless, thin-sheet ghost, leading it through the open path below and right through the hold as if he had been alive again.There would be no stopping once the wind blew, not to mention that it was all being forced upon it. In a moment of supreme hold, there had been a door, upon which it fell and came from below, being pulled through the other side at the easily enterable opening as well. As it had passed the many poor tortured souls which stood there encased in metal, it was still driven in the hold through their concoction of wood, the air almost making it seem like the place was the outside if it weren't for the fact that it was all an illusion. Nonetheless, the skin hadn't felt that it had no eyes to see, no brain to think about such a mundane thing. It felt onto one of the branches, or rather one of the long hands a man had and remained there for the short duration there had been. At least until a peasant, another man had trespassed in, a rather long-headed fellow who found himself wandering inside. He hadn't any clue whatsoever about what he was about to get himself in.But at the vague touch, he touched something sticky on a branch and yelled. No one heard him.'Brothers, Stratos will be mad, what will we do once he finds this out?"I do not know how to react, but get what's left of him, in the least we may be forgiven if we give our master the only drink, we could survive, even if the chance is thin.'Both nodded at accordingly did so, despite planning on going on a hunt to hopefully retrieve whoever stole the skin, something was immediately more demanding. Looking back upon it, they approached, at last, staring at their king as if he was some sort of pagan statue to be prayed upon. The boiling system held and melted the empty skin as if it was nothing to it nor for them. Alone, as it came, Stratos was suspiciously missing from the start. 'Here it is, as we have said, we have left the best for you instead.' 'Have you tasted it before I?' 'We wouldn't have dared in the least brother, we could do no such thing without your permission or with the care, we obey supremely with no reason to doubt instead.' 'Out brother Stratos had seemed to have lost himself.' Said Orxos, with some pale smile, which seemed to have deepened for seconds before going as far away from him as to be possible to look at him. 'He was to grow impatient and waited for none. At last, he took the cup and decided to drink it rather bathe in such a small portion of the liquid as it were out there.' 'This used to be him, wasn't it? Is there more of him then?' The concoction looked rather concentrated yet he hadn't had a taste as of yet, it was almost as if he knew there wasn't more. 'No, there's none of it, not any of it which had survived the process of the boil. Everything else had failed and rotten past the point where anything of it might've been extracted.' In a way, he was only half-lying on the fact that there wasn't any sort of knowing whenever or not they were lying. He nodded nonetheless and started tasting down at the middle, for a moment then, they both started thinking they had seen some smile contorting but had a vague idea why. Why had he stopped at a quarter in? There was still more than enough for him to drink on if he even cares about that alone. 'I shouldn't be surprised that you were expecting me to have it alone, but since you are here and Stratos isn't, I believe you're to be rewarded.' He passed the cup from him to the other, without the least of expectations he drank but stopped under a hard stare. Alone, he wouldn't have thought, nor would Orxos even think about sharing if it weren't for that demanding gaze upon which there seemed to be a boiling desire to carry on with it. The cup was passed from one person to another, with the least faked interest in dismissing it at last. Though they were cold about it, neither care that what they had used to be one of their brothers, rather rejoiced over the fact that it was kept in the family. He had managed to escape through the hinges of memory now, the man who had ventured and found himself covered in the least with the face and body of another. It would seem that he had found himself in a rather convenient thing which would strike others with terror upon sight. Not only had the skin taken over some part of his brain but the way it had replaced the old skin the man had was both painful as well as it had felt that he had been flayed alive before it could place itself there. The pain came upon the sight, even in the pools or mirrors there'd come the sight, the darkest of them he had become. With the memories of the previous life gone, the man remembered that he had a wife somewhere far, though they had argued, which had been the turning point that led him there, where his life had changed. There was no explained on how he had been driven back, knocking at the door in the middle of the night. His wife had answered but dared not glance, she was afraid as if he had come to join her into a dance. With both of his attached to her, he suddenly smiled and jerked back and forth as if to cradle her outside. All the while, her expression hadn't changed, her eyes were filled with something of a maddening approach. 'I have returned my dear, why don't you welcome your warm husband?' It had seemed that as he said it, some space in his skin just jerked around, removing itself then reattaching for the comfort it had felt there was the need for. Both of them didn't pay any attention to that, rather to the important thing between the two of them, the darkening which happened to frighten her upon the touch and sight. Even now, the moisture could be felt, her touch against his face took away some of the colour and for some reason, he was angered. With a motion of a much stronger arm, she has shoved aside and pushed against her back.'Don't you ever touch me unless you want to see what I'm truly capable of.'With which he flew into the night, leaving her to weep at the closest edge of the stairs. There wasn't any explanation for why this was to happen, but he grabbed a stick, he took stones, he chews on them despite the pain and cracked his teeth beyond repair. Without a doubt, there wasn't any excuse for what followed in the night. Such acts of pain and sorrow against the towns which reigned near the four towers, so-called holds, neither of which dared send anyone outside, not during the day nor the night. Soon what followed was a series of acts of arson which came into flights, as he has heard the screams and couldn't happen but smile with the fact that he had the guts to do so. He looked and waited for the citizens to flee out of their flaming homes, some burnt, others severely endangered, just so he could grab them and eat their still moist flesh. It was painful to watch but almost fainted at the act. With each taste, the skin consolidated and rooted itself against bone and against the mind. Now he would finally have his say and take care of those who pushed him against the ground.'Can't you balance the buckets of water on your shoulders properly, you animal?'They would say before pushing the stick and having him get through the river to get water again. On his way, he had met with the same prick who was trying to carry water back to his burning village when they met.'Quickly, we need help, everything's burning.'He had recognised the face but there wasn't in the least a notice for his condition. Unless something was about to happen, nothing would stop him now.'You can't balance that many buckets on your back either, you should try to carry less of them.'With which he pushed him on the ground, while the other men who were helping tried to rush to their homes and lands rather than be slowed while the fires ran.'What's your problem? Can't you see the fires, my family, my house and farm, it could reach them at any moment.'Too bad you won't be able to do it any longer. You won't be able to reach them in time to save them from the fire.'Please, my daughter, my wife, they're sleeping.'He tried to plead for their sake alone, but he was only pushed further back as his skin was stolen, mouthful after mouthful, an action which had changed his toes and fingers to the point where he wouldn't be recognised any longer. Overall, his features grew much duller and younger while the corpse had been thrown into the river and left there to follow the tide.'I should return home to my wife, shouldn't I? She must've been worried sick, after me, but.'On a sudden change of tune, he had taken a look in the distance and noticed that he wasn't the only one starting fires. Trails of smoke in the distance made him feel as if this wasn't as great of an idea as he had originally planned. If there were others, he had to know, instead of going back home. The night was still young, and on the road, the two partners walked alone with none in sight. Just as to point something before making their beds, it wasn't a good view at all.'Look Grendle, there's been another fire.'There's no need for you to point it out any longer, look, they're everywhere, it looks as if it may be their main form of warfare around.' It had seemed indeed that every field and every little creature had set some crop of the like on fire, rather than be confrontational, they preferred setting fire from one house to another. The place was a mess, something which couldn't be dismissed in the least by some look alone. Without the chance to comprehend what was the reason for those tiny creature's existence, it was pointless to try to understand them in the least. 'It's only a few days now and I think I'm beginning to like the language, I may even be able to understand a few words at least if I'm really trying.'Don't bother, we're going to get away, don't you understand?'From this trap or from this place? Either of which I'd be content if I were to see more, rather than look through the windows panes, after entering each code.'How are you still doing that?'Mordecai looked, still surprised by the fact that his fellow somehow found a way to get through each combination and reveal what was outside. For each moment they spend there, there came another which would promise the lack of a meal and water, at least decent ones in the least.'This might be well, we're going down again.'Said Grendle, as a matter of fact, the last time would've been a dead end, for whatever happened then, taken from memory, the stairway ended at some sort of an explosion of the kind which was uncommon to their primaeval society.It managed to destroy and collapse the stone structure below, and leave only a blanket of melted iron to last as a final sealed placed.'This is the plan then, we look for some sort of explosive and carve away behind."Can't we at least try to blow open the hulk that is against the window? Neither the glass nor the window should be able to resist it and that's only if there's the case that we might be locked with explosives here.'The satisfaction reigned on his face as he noticed that Mordecai hadn't looked right where he had needed. But right in front of them laid a door with the recognisable word of storage.'Here, in this place? No, no, this just cannot be happening here, it must be a mistake, some sort of farce of the sort, there's just no possible way the word could've found its way here.'Neither would it have been possible for us to wake up trapped here from walking on the road alone. I won't question it as long as there's a way to get through.'Another closed case from the looks of which, something had destroyed it, making it rather easier to work upon. He had pulled some wires and carefully thrown them onto one another until it made a spark.That always seemed to have done the trick.'You realise that we're wasting much of our time in here."Unless you got a better idea, pass me that box and open the other.'Both of them came to frustration as they looked at the most bizarre set of devices. From the most deluded mind came a thought, as Mordecai closed a box and seemed to have lost himself in thought, wanting to take another look outside.'Search without me for a second, I need to check something here.'He went behind for a long time, just so he would be out of sight, then, as it came, almost naturally, he opened one of the windows by the code and came to the idea of removing the pane. As if there, his jaw almost dropped after seeing how it was a fake, placed upon the nothingness of space which laid out there.There wasn't in the least a clue whenever or not he was seeing the top of the sky or if anything was wrong instead. He had glimpsed and noticed that something was off, even since they had taken a look together. In the least, he felt as if his fellow might've been spared for the dark thoughts that might've come. Wherever they were, there wasn't in the least a chance of return, not at this point.Though he dared not speak a word he placed the flat circle of glass back and returned with an unexpected grimness to him. As he looked at it alone, he noticed that he had found what they had come there for, the sticks of old explosive, an antique, as well as the fuse as the means of which to fire.'Do you still plan on blowing the bulk of our prison, or the glass?"I'm well aware that it won't do much, there's no need for that now.' Both looked away from one another as if they had seen something which they haven't been supposed to see. It was at least in their wake of things that they decided to return to the staircase through which they had been and finally place the explosives between.'This may be dangerous, better get as far away from this place Mordecai, I'll handle this."You should better let me lit the fuse if that's what you're coming at, just in case you know?There's a long life ahead of you if we manage to escape and I'd rather no waste someone such as yourself if I can help it.'It wasn't dangerous but the shock ran dry, the two of them shook hands and there was almost a sadness in Mordecai's eyes as if he was ready to die.For his friend alone made him feel well enough of the place where he had been. He left as far as he could, unable to see through him and notice. That tiny glitter had died away, he was ready to pass through and never return to the tainted world if there was a chance for him to go. He was getting hungry, he felt thirst, his shaking hands had betrayed him for minutes and despite being dangerous for it to get through, he was stopped. There was a pair of hands who held him off from trying to get closer to extinction, it was Grendel, he returned. He looked as if he knew and understood what was going through his mind and instead of being mad and overreacting, he accepted it at last as if it wouldn't have mattered in the least for him. 'We're bound to fail one of these days I know, but we have to get through it together.' There wasn't anything in particular which went into his mind, Mordecai felt like an old man who was slowly getting worn by the age, not as sharp as he used to be, past his prime, looking into the emptiness, waiting to.. 'Well, should we at least get ready for it? The burst could be enough to make it worse than for the better.' Just head on behind as far as you can reach, I'll take care of the details from now on. 'And then he was out of sight as well as he was out of his way, there continued the preparation, the tying of the fuse and in the end, he lit it and ran away. He apparently waiting near the storage door as far as he could be, keeping it open as his fellow was approaching the scene. 'Be ready to close the door when I enter the room, head inside already!' The man shouted, of which echo came faster than he had expected, for Mordecai was already inside the room, going through boxes as he waited. In a moment's notice, the two of them were together in the room, staring at one another like buffons waiting for a change. It happened like a sudden burst of anger that they were slammed against the door, luckily for them, it had been locked for the longest while. Everything hit their parade inside the room as the boxes had been all over them, with everything which laid inside, rolls of strange images which were pitch as coal, various cards and names, nothing sharp though and nothing which would've crushed their bones. 'Hold on tight, I think it's bound to be worst.' He said as he felt the entire prison in which they had been shove itself on a slope which went as far down as it could before stopping as they shouted for their lives. The way ahead was somewhat stabilised if not inclined, whatever fell on them reached the ground eventually without much of a bother. 'What now? Do you think it may be safe to open the door now?' 'I do not know, but we have to find out, don't we? Are we still going to this together?' 'Always Grendel, as long as you won't lead me to another strange place such as this one.' To which he made no promise but opened the door and managed to see, that dirt had erupted from various spots and blocked some of the other rooms they hadn't checked. Something about it had managed to disturb them there, perhaps over the fact that it seemed as if a liquid had penetrated the soil and made it fleshier. It would explain the moistness and the water which had flooded the place. 'You have to have lost your damn mind.' But both of them reached the same conclusion at last, that as the end of their side, where the stairs met with their level there was something of a flooding problem. Water wasn't rising as of yet, henceforth there was no problem. 'That isn't water Mordecai, don't try drinking it.' His expression was stark with dread as he noticed all around him what was going on. 'What is it Grendel? If it isn't water, what could it be?' 'It's the..'. His voice snapped as he looked away, opening the closed pane to notice that they were surrounded, rather than being sent deep in the ground, they haven't even moved a few feet from the road outside. 'Take a look for yourself, we've merely managed to twist in inside the ground, nothing more.' 'No, it can't be so, look, there's the space out there if only I could.' Though it couldn't budge regardless of how many attempts carried on. 'It wasn't an exit after all, but a prison for that thing there and I'm afraid it's to awaken.' 'How can you know so much about it? You were the one who came up with the idea to escape that way.' 'Mordecai, you had the chance to stop me and could've made me blow up one of the windows instead, this is your fault as well.' 'But I was reluctant to do so, no in the least would I have wagered both of our lives if I knew there was danger down there.' 'I couldn't have known you, lout, I was merely suspecting over the fact that it had been an explosion caused by someone who went below there, nothing more. Don't put the blame on me now because I haven't acted on a poor suspicion.'There it was, that guilt and fear, they could do nothing else but pushed themselves away from that which would soon sneer.'My good man, I am in need of direction, I seem to have been lost.'An insignificant mongrel came to him while being caught on the road, he wore only a bag, filled with what would seem to be stolen goods. He immediately recognised that unnatural colouration, even in the sun, whence he looked as dark as some sort of ill grapes.'I don't know where.'Oh but I haven't even spoken of where I was to go, my dear man. Why won't you sit down on this trunk near the stones and offer me your company, I may even be bound to forget what I saw.'A heavy sigh came to him as he approached, leaving his bag as farther away as for him not to peer at him. He would've asked for nought and spared the man if it weren't for the fact that he had tried to steal from him. One was bound to eventually find him out so why not start ahead?They have somewhat of an awkward conversation before he was taken behind the trunk.'Are you ready for what's next to come? I don't think I've done this before but I'm sure enough bent on doing it whenever or not you'll decide to cooperate."Mercy please, I swear I stole to feed my family, nothing more, they're the ones who're starving there, I've had no choice."Silence.'The word came as a followup to the bitter laugh, after which the man was given a mighty slap which had thrown him on the ground in a sweeping sort of daze. He couldn't help but look away, as he went on to slay the man, there were shouts, there were sounds which were inhuman coming from his body as he proceeded. It felt as if he wasn't in control any longer but rather, the skin which stretched around his body which made the calls some of the time.'Watch him, watch, watch, see him, look at him, do it, take a peek, his body, his body, what have you done? Take a glimpse, try to look at him.'It felt as if someone was whispering just around his ears, ready to make any sort of attempt. Instead of which, there wasn't any other attempt at resilience once he had been exposed to what had happened. The corpse in front of him had been severely mutilated, as for him, it was revealed that the skin around his arms and hands extended sluggishly against the body and started pulling the mass of the corpse. Poor man, he had thought inside, as farther away as his skin went, the clearer his mind could form his own thoughts.He had felt for the poor man who only did it out of need, not to mention that he didn't want to antagonize himself either, or what he had become. It's this itchy skin.'Someone's coming.'With that announcement, it was almost as if he had been heard by it and went into a sort of retreat. The way it looked, as the body came, it couldn't have been made by a man, thought some sort of animal who ate the flesh with many cuts might've done the cut.Regardless of what that was, the rider which came and slowed down needed nothing but a glance at the scene, once he saw the colour of his skin, the dreadful gaze gave him a wicked thought and he went away as cowardly as he could. He could've ended the threat there but he was free, it didn't matter how much he looked at it, there wasn't a way to be.The journey continued, for hours at a time, until past the roads, as farther away, the prison was in sight. In the distance, he was able to see, that crowds of people came to watch what was going on, without the least of thought and consideration for what was going on. For once, for them to meet was long expected.By now, inside of it, that thing was rather deranged.'What are we to do now that we are locked? Sooner or later we'll have to change side or look for some food, we can't spend the rest of what we got here."Are you willing to go on and leap over it to the stairs? What if it wakes up all of the sudden and pulls you down with it?"Mordecai was fiddling with a bunch of needles and a ball, nervously trying to distract himself, though the way it was bent, there was just no way to get through.'All I know is that we're in too deep, and whatever that is, it came from someplace deeper.'The sight of which was still dreadful, to be glanced upon, a malignity of extremes, almost transparent in sight, blocking the light as well as it had been in a state of guilt for what had happened to him.'Let's grab whatever explosive is left and try for the other side.'I'm afraid to move around it, you know that Grendle, it's those things that resemble eyes, they're almost human, if they weren't actually stolen from humans I'll be damned. I said it, we cannot trust that it might sleep, from what we know it could be that it's fainting.No, I think we need to end it somehow, after all, it was done with for a reason."You don't suppose."It can't be worse than what we're to deal with on here.'With a sharp glance, he came again to the same conclusion as his companion wagered.The explosive was lit like candles and three of them had been thrown from across the room, right into that oozing thing, through which it came and it was stuck.Moments passed, the door was locked, and the sudden burst had made the entire container in which they were shatter and shimmer, glaze in-between.'Is it safe to look?' Asked Mordecai as he had done well in keeping himself safe, on his knees, both hands on top of his neck.Without a doubt, there had been others who wouldn't have care, but once the door was open, all was safe. There had been a hole and the thing had made a shriek before it must've retreated in its hole.That of which was deep, far too deep for any further knowledge to be told off.It had crawled from below in some sort of worm-made hole, with all the rings having left their mark against the soil.'Should we use another one?"No, that would be nothing but a waste, we should use whatever we have only for our escape. The stairway seems to be in a rather well condition, so what do you say?"Both of them agreed as they started climbing, hand in hand as neither desired yet to fall, whatever that was, now there was no concern over it.It had just happened that they reached a point where they came to seeing that the integrity of their prison was no more.The upper wall was generally protruding through the other, as well as it had been by the sides. Without being able to measure either side, they both realised that this part which had been blown twice had lost stability and was to fall.'It seems like we won't be returning that way any longer."You think so? And what gave you that idea then?"Better make it a who if you're as certain as you are that we're going to escape Mordecai. I don't like being trapped in this place either, remember?"The slender hole from which they had come out now looked like one rather than a finely shaped entrance. It seemed as if every second which passed there wasn't a way that its integrity would last.'Look, if it gets ripped apart, we may have a chance to jump on its top and make for it, as long as we're quick about it."What about the explosive then?' Asked Mordecai, looking distraught at the thought that there'd be any danger from this point on.'Do you think it may return though?' He continued, looking beyond his friend, through that hole, at it slipped away. For once, the thought of it crawling away from that spot might've been a rather dull one for starters. He couldn't even get the thought out of his head without being able to stare straight at it.But they both looked intently at it, waiting for something to crawl at the last second, just as the hole had become something that rats, or rather mice would come through. Had it not been that those liquid formations crossed the room and latched around the door frames?If that was so, and they both remembered, what stopped it from crawling back in? It couldn't have been that they had ended the threat, after all, the hole was locked for a reason.'There, it's done, now we can wait for it to fall.'With a sudden unspoken moment came the light from above. It seemed as if the entire prison shook violently as the passing came to be. Faces could be seen from the nearness of the outside world and when the sudden hole had become wide enough for them to crawl, both of them just jumped outside and ran to the sides. They jumped and had been caught, hand by hand, pulled by villagers and travellers alike. It was in the heat of that that the prison was swallowed inside the ground, just in time as a blanket of dust covered what seemed to have been the final resting place, the grave of that damning fiend. 'This means we're done with it, right? No more out of it Grendle, no more time to spare. We're going straight to the towers and we make for the top of it.' The man had paid enough attention despite the fact that he had been dealing with another man, the help of which seemed to have been the trade-off for water and food which came as even for them. 'We should try getting as far away from this place as we can, we've already had gotten enough attention on us as we could.' Some started speaking and tried addressing to them, though it was still too short of a time for either of them to get a grasp on the language and neither of which tried. Without that, they lacked basic understanding and couldn't say a word. They had resumed walking away without speaking a word to one another but looked ahead, for in the distance, despite the fact that a road was clear, there was a man, looking dark as if he had been worn. He stopped from his tracks as if to examine who were the two strangers which looked in his direction. Neither of which appeared to have been fair, but he had never seen someone even remotely close to being pale. That skin, the sight of which would do nothing but taint himself and make him lighter, it wouldn't do, it wouldn't do. He thought even less of the fact that he had witnessed them as they emerged from the metal box before it fell to the ground. Dangerous fellows to have come from a place which wasn't known to him, nor to his skin. Avoid them at all cost, don't make it seem as if you care, it won't happen so don't you dare look upon them. Just keep by the road, until it just so happened that they stopped. The skin made him top as well. With the least of understanding why he was as dark, his nails as thin, that dangerous creature with its blood-shot eyes appeared to have paid little to no concern over the fact that they had been trying to stare it in the eyes. While hardly trying, he slowly lifted his gaze and looked at them. The tension had begun, it wasn't a matter of what was to be done with him but rather that they both tried figuring out whenever or not, whoever laid in front of them would be dangerous enough or not. Neither of them had any clue, yet decided to make a move. 'Should we walk by the side Grendle? I don't think he'll give us trouble if we leave him be.' 'Shouldn't we be cautious in the least? I thought you of all would understand the dangers of putting your trust in a stranger, especially one as decrepit as this one.' One step too few and there was a sudden hiss and a few steps which had been taken behind. Something was definitely going on with it, that it came to the point of acting in some sort of aggressive manner. Without the least of concerns, Mordecai followed Grendle as they walked closer while paying no heed to the so-called danger which was thrown at them. They stopped just before he could get any more aggressive, being as close as to be able to hear his own thoughts. It felt as if he was exceedingly pushing vapours of heat through his body, trying to deny all thought. He looked past them on the road and saw that no one else was mad enough to walk in this direction. To say the least, in this fool's errand, there was no wonder where they were heading towards, the only problem being that they spoke that damned language which made little sense, to begin with. He had seen them get prepared, in case they would get violent with him instead, he knew nothing of them and in which way they'd defend themselves. With little knowledge and awareness, he did a reasonable thing and pointed at the four towers in the distance. Yes, they want to get there, must be their reason for this madness to begin with. Just follow me right through there. 'It seemed to have pointed towards the towers, think it knows something about them?' 'I most definitely think he knows of the place, even more, that he had been there before. He's much stranger looking than any of the others and looks at how rabid he seems each time I pointed in that direction.'Indeed it appeared as if he had been a shock or a stab at him each time that place was pointed at. Most likely some history between the two, as such as he might be useful, to say the least.' I know you don't understand but lead the way.' The mongrel had to repeat a word but understood nought. 'Lead?' It asked before seeing a sign of the hand made by Grendle, who made it seem as if he shoved the air by the side. Another time, he pointed towards the tower and moved closer to that one. He lashed behind and started walking towards the direction they wanted to go. 'Doesn't it bode well with you when things go right? I knew we didn't need to know the words or the language to deal with them.' Though they had been started at or followed, by those little beings that dwelled in fields. For once they looked mightily afraid, trying to approach in fear, yet no warning passed by. Closer by the night they peered, at the towers, at the sky, and when they looked at them together, only the dark thoughts began. After all, they had forced the dark creature, enslaved rather, with wrappings around his hands as not to try anything too rash. 'One of us sleeps at a time, while the other waits with him.' He started at the creature and had seen nothing even remotely to it, other than it looked rather sick for the time it had to spend staying entrapped. Sweat ran like beads and like some sort of slicing winning note, he lost the turn and Mordecai was to stay awake at first. Armed with a sharp rock and a look of complete determination, he would neither come any closer nor feel remorse if it were to attack and for him to defend himself by any means. Rather than that he welcomed it and came to pass. Something happened that it couldn't wait there but shake violently at the thought of being trapped with them. Mordecai immediately shook his head, as if the lack of sleep would've already taken its toll, he looked again. The skin was entirely loose from the body of the creature, even danced around the cuffs, thin enough to pull itself out, it dropped the body which made a loud clicking noise. Perhaps he was unconscious, but after hitting his head that way, little to no doubt remained of the fact. He was dead, skinless while that sluggish carcass of meat and fat went on to crawl towards him. 'Not a step further I say, not towards me nor my friend!' It couldn't have understood not heard as a matter of fact, though it was met by resistance as the sharp rock was thrown and pinned it to the ground. The soft ground under it trapped in with immediate signs. 'Wake up Grendle, wake up for your sake alone, we're in danger.' 'What? What's going on already?' 'Look, it's the man we've brought, he's, he's.' He was sleeping on his back, with his skin back on, rather looking more comfortable than either of them had been. 'This paranoia will do you no good if you continue this way.' 'Fine, you go on ahead and look after him then and see for yourself, I'm not going insane, I know I'm not.' 'We're so close to them, only a relatively few hours of walking, do you need to this every night?' He only seems to act when it's your turn, night after night. 'As it were true enough, he came to sleep, accepting rather than to weep.' 'Mark me, for I know what's going on, it's trying to get both of us.' 'We need him just to get a general direction. I'll make myself clear again, go to sleep before you lose your mind entirely, I can't deal with that now, whoever else might I talk to if that happens?' Though their conversation was neither comforting nor had it done anything about his mood. A change in the manner he acted left some bitter taste to his mouth. Had he been right? Grendle asked himself as he noticed the symptoms he had seemed to have spared to himself and no other. For once at least, he noticed that the man was bare-chested this night, with the most dreadful marks on the skin, as if had been pierced. Either he would've been right or the man was beaten by his fellow, which wouldn't bode well for either of them. Certainly, he wouldn't be that way, in all the while he met him, he showed only mercy and acted only on desperation, so what was it that made this creature so much special than the others? There was still doubt in his heart, he didn't want to act on something as defenceless as from a foreigner like himself. It could be any night now that he'd be proven wrong and taken by surprise, in the case of which he wouldn't have a chance to take it alone. If what he said was the truth, not only did it have some sort of resistance to pain which wasn't anything of the sort he'd ever encountered, but it could also be quick enough to flee away and stalk through the night. Chances were, at least from the explanation that he was dealing with a corpse, perhaps something worse. 'How can you sleep so well Mordecai after being the one acting so paranoid.' It had been one second when he looked away, only to turn and stare at the man who was sitting on a piece of a fallen trunk, with little to no sign of paying any attention whatsoever. He was stared through by the coldest eyes, getting worse each day and night. Least of all, there wasn't any doubt about what was going on here, some disease or condition was getting over the body, eating him from inside while they were debating whenever or not he was a monster. Little was known, if partially true, about the man who stood in front of them. A certain pain resistance and coldness, not to mention the refusal of the rations they offered, another one being that he didn't eat nor did he drink, unless he'd done it in private, beyond their eyes. Now, he was serene, enjoying the quiet while the eyes moved, waiting as if for something of a sign, anything which would make him drop. Grendel's eyes were flashing, dazed as if he wanted to wake the other and switch ahead, even though not enough hours had passed. He knew that it wasn't fair but cared little, it was true enough that the creature was unsettling in its manner and they never even needed it in the first place. I should've listened to you Mordecai, he thought, with the nerve to approach his friend, met with resistance. So that would be your play, again, he peered at how suddenly he was on his feet, ready to sneer and jeer as soon as he woke up the sleeping man. Luckily there had been a rock in his hand as well, though little would do to him if he even managed to hit him with it. He'd be swift enough and unnerving, ready to snap at the throat or bowels if given the chance. 'Slowly, slowly, we're all friends here.' He had thought, before seeing another flash, in the middle of the night. The second time it happened for his vision to better, it appeared as if another cage sprouted, metal walls, closed ceiling and the door. It was perfect enough for him to feel around through pitch black darkness and know that it wouldn't be able to get through. Unless they had been caged with him, he opened what he felt like a pane and left it open to see the light of day when it came. He fell below to sleep unnerved, both by the sight and the thought of being caged again. One sudden blow against the steel woke up Mordecai from slumber and as he started looking, he saw, this wasn't supposed to be here, rather than anything else. 'We're trapped again, it seems, though this time with it.' 'Can it enter our room?' He asked, looking with his eyes beyond the shaking room, the pale light of moon barely disturbing. 'I doubt it can unless it managed to punch it down or bite through it. There's little he can do to get to us, I wager.' 'Then go to sleep, we'll deal with it in the morning.' As it were the case the night went on, the pane had closed and by the time the day had come, the artificial light from above had appeared. A dirty neon green, dark and barely dim had appeared at the exact day when they had to be woken up. Without being the least dismissive, they both looked and questioned, again. 'Why is it that this happens to us each time?' 'Shh, look, what is that thing over there?' 'Closely, Grendel approached what seemed to be a small piece of skin which tried snicking itself through the cracks. It was fairly thin but it had failed to get through entirely. 'I've told you, it's a being of its own, if it weren't for the door, we would've most certainly have been turned to waste.' 'Open the door then, I think I believe you, I've seen with my own eyes the way it acted when the two of us were alone during the night. If it weren't for this place.' Though his thought laid to rest as the sight of the dead man on the floor. It had seemed as if whatever tied itself to him had managed to make for an escape, or rather hide in the midst of the place. 'Look, it tried from this side and ripped itself off when it failed to get through.' 'Don't touch the body Mordecai, I mean it! You don't have in the least a clue what might happen if you touch that decaying, rotting blasphemous host, it may still carry some sort of infection of virus which had belonged to the skin.' He wasn't sure either, whenever that corpse was truly feigning and alive or rather dead, ready on its way. It was another setting with four chambers, two on each side, a deck which had a pair of stairs leading to another level, not far from which there had been a blow which pushed the outer hull of the ship father inside. With the least of doubt, neither cared, little nor more of what was going on, but stressed enough as to peer around. 'What if there are other people dead here?' 'We'll find out soon enough if that had a chance of making you feel better.' 'It won't, trust me when I tell you.' In their turns and ends, it seemed as if they ended going further, coping as they could with the fact that it was hidden from their sight. Such as it happened for them to be alone with a moving sort of skin-carpet which could be at any side, in each part, trying to get through. 'Were there other bodies here, Grendel? I know you don't like hearing me going around, but I need to know I'm not going mad if I were to say there were others here before us.' 'I don't know, stop asking me things I can't know, you're just going to make the both of us feel more paranoid with every aberrant question you ask.' 'Truly, I'm sorry to have been a companion to you so far, if I only I would've known how much of an irritant for you would've become, I might've averted my eyes and sight away from the likes.' Undoubtedly so, it scorned away and tried moving in strange patterns, the man in a suit, at the end of which, he stood erect. A globular set of sphere laid as his helmet, all of the glass or some sort of reflecting material, standing on a flat plane, leading to a suit of white with strips of black everywhere around. He would look sideways, then try making for them in the tight space. 'Head on here.' There was a man who opened the door, from their side, as it seemed there had been survivors after all. It was the first one which looked normal for once, in the least of appearance, while his ragged clothes dragged from his behind, he peered all around and pulled them in. This wasn't a simple room but the entrance to another level altogether. What followed after was some sort of introduction of the code, followed by the blocking and the end of a few locks that would stop any which tried getting through. 'Don't worry, it's modified, locking from the inside, rather than the outside.' 'Who is exactly, how did you get here? Why has this cage appeared from the middle of nowhere? And what was that thing that stood there erect, looking at us as if we were some animals or viruses in need to be taken care off?' 'One thing at a time Mordecai, let the man take a breather as well, after all, we're in his domain, not ours.' A simple nod would've been enough, but the man wasn't in the greatest of moods, for once, he had lost far too much sleep for him to have been expected anything else. He wouldn't have dared anything in the least if it meant leaving something or someone behind, which followed. 'One of you must stay here while we check the other.' 'Is it safe yet?' A pair of voices called, from the looks of which, there appeared to have been three others in the hiding. 'Everything's fine, just two have arrived it seems, wearing the strangest looking apparel they could come up with.' The man was visibly disturbed by their appearance, not that he was the one to talk, with a suit of one colour, broad by the shoulders with a silver line where it'd slip away from him. Well enough, that it would've come by the nose, he looked away, ready to choose. 'One of you must definitely follow for the checking. I'll have Donna look after the other. Don't worry, these are standard things, we won't injector push anything out of you.' 'It's not that, I was trying to figure out if you were the one who was to be trusted. We don't know you and examinations tend to be dangerous, at least in my experience."I know it may sound like that, but trust me when I tell you that both of you will be in good hands."I'll come then, the sooner we deal with this, the easier will be for us to get away."The confusion didn't matter, for he was already on his way. It wasn't Donna alone but another younger woman with her who looked as if to have crossed her legs, bored as to why she was set there. For once, the man didn't look interested and maybe battered, more visually shaken was the fairer woman who waited for something. 'Come closer, don't stand by the gate, it's how they seem to get you around.' "They seem to get you? Lady, I don't know where I am or what is going on but if you think you can make me feel bad with anything weird, I tell you from the starters that I've been through enough. Nothing out there is going to get me whenever or not it tries. Meanwhile, Grendle stood shirtless, having come into contact with a hot needle for some blood test. He was fairly passive for the whole duration, feeling little pain, no physical defect, nothing expanded, nor a mark on his body which would last. 'So, for how long have you been locked inside? For me and Mordecai, it's the second time it seemed to have happened.' "Trapped? Well, eight, maybe a few more rounds of time, I cannot be sure, it's been hard for everyone involved. Especially down there, by the side, there's always something which seems as if to be creeping around, and everyone in the crew seems to notice it. The looks of which assured him that there were at least four of them, two women, this doctor which was presumed and a lad. 'Is that your wife and children?' "No, the two of them are brothers but neither of us is their parents. As a matter of fact, we're not into, you know. There was an understanding there, but little faded once the tests turned well. 'You're free to call the other man, Mordecai, you said? After which we'll decide what happens after.' The finality in his words seemed to have shuffled thoughts in his mind of which there wasn't any way for him to be prepared. The other came and the test quickly commenced, yielding the same result as it had previously had. Little doubt now remained, both were clean, rather than anything wrong with them physically, the crew looked at them as if something still was off, which couldn't be pointed. 'Well, we've just expanded it seems, that does mean we'll have to ration our supplies, as well as to train both of you how to snick in and get some foot without being noticed.' "I believe that won't be necessary at all, not since we're planning on escaping from this place and getting to the towers. "Towers? Do you mean control towers? Some sort of satellites or some stations which are on your way? Neither of you looks familiar so you couldn't have been part of the crew and I know everyone who was on this ship. I know well enough that you're humans, both of you, in relatively good and healthy condition but that would be all. There's a chance that you might've been boarded or snuck somehow but I doubt that you've lasted for so long out there without starving or proper medical condition, so it only makes sense that you've arrived on another ship. Would that be correct?" "No, we were on the road when this metal prison erected itself from the ground." "Let me, Mordecai, there's something more important he needs to know. Something had followed us on the way here and we've got a reason to believe something wrong's about to happen in case we don't find it or escape." "What exactly are you talking about?" Chimed in the other crew-member, she was subtle and looking at them for only a sign that they were messing with them. There wasn't any ship in which they arrived though, and she could only hope for the least she could get. 'How are you planning on getting out of here, then? To get to these towers I mean.' "We just need to blow through the walls." "Blow through the walls?" Bjord paused, with his face almost caught in past-relief, he looked as if he had heard, seen and met madness incarnated, in the least of subtle ways. The pounding began again against the doors. 'Look at what you've done, you woke him up, now he'll be hours at it, trying to.' He had attempted to access the inner camera and look through from one of the monitors, something was wrong with the quality but neither of them had seen something as that before. 'But for once it seemed that the man in the suit was more violent than he had ever been, an important detail to which went unnoticed was that fact that there had laid a hole through his helmet which was new. It was right under the right cheek and had been there for the past few hours. 'Whatever is behind that suit is a corpse, a decaying thing, in-human. I can't think of the worst that's to happen if it managed to break the door.' The children were being set in corners, held and helped by the woman as she set them inside a small chamber. It had been emptied as this was planned. 'Hold on in there and don't open it, no matter what, do you understand?' Both nodded but still managed to look with doubt, just as she assured them that everything would be fine. The pounding continued and the upper hull was almost pushed inwardly, to the extreme where a piece of his knuckle could be seen, decayed as it were, there was some strength. 'Listen, weapons, something sharp, anything that we could use to defend ourselves?' 'We're just researchers, doctors, those are children, of families who were brought aboard, there wasn't anything which prepared us for what was about to happen.' 'Nothing to repair this either?' 'There's maybe a blowtorch which we might use for the purpose, but I don't see how.' 'That would be most useful.' Said Grendle as he pointed to Bjord to find it. 'You, what's your name?' 'I'm called Riggled, what do you want me to do?' 'You'd better find something heavy and perhaps a chain or a leash, something which would make it hard for someone to move in case he would be caught.' 'I'll see what I can find.' With a sudden pull and no regard for the creature pounding behind, Mordecai spoke in whispers. 'What are you planning on doing here now? We've got nothing to do, nor any single way to deal with it, just look at it, there may be a moment before the door is broken and we don't stand a chance against that kind of strength.' 'Unless we're quick about it, we'll end up like the rest of them, somehow I doubt it's only one of them out there anyway.' He sniffed around and pulled at his hair as in desperation, whatever it was to happen, everything would be decided at a span of a few seconds. 'I found something, here, help me with it.' There was a small beige panel which had been removed from the wall, having lots of machinery which were rather unrecognisable to either of them, other than the common metal chain which was attached to nought other than two small rods. 'Those are to prevent others from touching and interrupting the flow of circuit, it shouldn't have any effect on anything if we were to remove it.' It was pulled on, long enough as it were, that was the type which would be managed well enough by three of them if they were set on it, though the thought remained. A visible hole was made through the door and it was getting dangerously close to the refuge. 'Where's that blow torch?' 'Right here, I had to make sure it would work before making any promises.' Now, there came the danger as he pushed the top of the door to the point where his helmet and a good chunk of his body could be seen. The pounding stopped and instead that hand ran across their side in an attempt to reach the device which held it closed. The mechanism or at least whatever configuration which made it lay that way seemed to have been so. 'Get the chain, fast.' He said while they acted on it with utmost care as to not damage what was already broken, seeing how it would be long enough from them to get it across the room, they decided to leave one side of it still chained to the machinery. 'What now?' 'Tied it around his hand before he does something. He cannot be as strong as that, he won't know what we're doing until it's late.' Both the woman and Mordecai came around and threw it as a leash around the neck of a stray dog, being tied as well as it might be without touching it. The constant motion it had come to do managed to wrap the chain even harder around the fingers and the bulk of the arm. At least it was clear enough that it had stopped while there wasn't any way to tell if it was fully trapped in there. 'Grab the chain, all of you, don't let him escape, no matter what!' Other than the fact that the three of them held the chained and pulled, while the suited creep did the same in reverse, it was safe to say that his movement was sparse and restricted. Grendle came with the strange blow torch, starting around the valve while seeing to it that there'd be nothing left of it once he was done. He hadn't begun with his arm but started melting the glass around his helmet, seeing how he was being pulled to the full extent of it. It had already cracked from the pressure coming from the fact that he was forced only on one side without a way to reach with the other. Clear muffled sounds could be heard as if melted away, layer after layer until there came the image of that damned face, which reeked of the many years in which air hadn't touched. It couldn't have been but that rotten being moved its features then, the eyes which looked like raw brown sponges, the same condition which seemed to have extended to most of the skin. Teeth rubbed against one another and from the looks of which he could see that they were soft, bending as they had been pushed against one another. 'What are you waiting for? Finish it off before it frees itself, this may be our only chance.' He could feel the heat, that was clear enough, but the agony it displayed was unnerving, even for him. It tried speaking, talking, shouting but only the bulk of the sounds came, nothing more.

One couldn't even know or wouldn't have known about if it weren't for the facial expressions which gave them away. That had been a man now before the torch was shoved right in his face. One of the most bizarre and frightening jerk came about as the neck almost cracked itself in an attempt to help the head jerk away from the flame. It was painful and disturbing, watching the force go off from the arm as it went limp, standing still now as the torch had already come through the face and right into the head. As if on command, Stratos said or did something, for the blowtorch stopped with a voice of command coming from above, saying. 'Overruled.' Now the chain was released and the beast in its suit of space fell on the floor and bounced, hitting what remained of it then. 'What have I done?' 'I think you have freed us from it.' Said, Stratos, as he came and attached himself to him. For once he had been content and relatively happy with the fact that a bunch of strangers came to rescue them. 'May we?' 'Shouldn't there be others outside? We cannot risk all of us heading that way. How about me and.' 'No, I think it would be better if there was someone who knew the ship, rather than the company, so it will be the two of us, me and you Grendle. Your friend can stay here in case something happens, he seems to have kept himself rather well.' There wasn't any other mention that Rigg was paying much of her attention on him. After all, he'd been so closer holding the chain near her that she had a good look all around his body. 'It's settled then, we'll return as fast as we can, in case anything happens, make sure we'll have a safeword.' 'I think home would be the only good one which would come close in terms of a pass for you to come back.' 'Wishful thinking?' Asked Grendle while fiddling with the torch, he wasn't prepared for it, but it came as a sigh. The two of them were already out while Rigg went down to take the children out. They had been frightened if nothing else by the sound of the encounter, speaking of which. 'Well, this is what it came to be.' 'And you're telling me that it's been alive for so long in that state and that it managed to move its lips and flip his eyes.' 'Mostly, not that it would qualify for any sort, but I was sure that a part of him was, or used to be alive.' The tremor came, the thought remained, but the body would not rise again. He had only planned on cutting down an arm so he would flee and know not to return, but this had been taken to a great extreme. A body laid and as they walked, it seemed that there were many more on the bridge. 'Careful now, we haven't seen this area in over ten years or so, from what we may know, there could be others.' Grendle paid a special kind of attention for another thing which might've proven to be worse than dangerous if it came to it. He wouldn't release his suspicions yet, but he was sure that it was out there. Crawling like a sheet of dry meat, trying for another, he would've been utmost set on the fact that it might've tried hooking itself with the suited creature if it weren't for the fact that there wasn't even something which dragged him on. He took at least a moment to look down upon the walls, the circuit was fried, long ago as well. 'What happened here exactly? It looks as if we may be spending a lot of time together, so we may as well just get to know each other, as well as our surroundings.' 'It may be a longer story than you have to hear, believe me when I tell you, that there's nothing that's going to keep you less than captivated than this.' 'Try me then, I'd like to know before we eventually get free from this.' 'Right, because you're supposed to be our saviours, coming from the unknown and ready to take us back home.' Grandle whiffed at it as well as he looked, with the least of concern hanging on his face. 'Got anything else to tell me or can you begin with what happened?' With another whiff, though this time coming from Stratos, he had become somewhat calmer than he had anticipated and begun. 'We were supposed to be heading towards one of the fourteen colonies in the great beyond and establish ourselves there for our further studies. Apparently, one of them, though I cannot remember which one had made a discovery in a kind of space rock, of which an alloy could be extracted, something which was never seen by anyone before. Its properties were something which would make one thing of sorcery rather than its real apparent purpose. From the various test which had been made long before our arrival, it turned out that the extract could push and revitalise the skin and pore, even seemed to leave some kind of rejuvenation on the dead plants on which the alloy had been tested.' 'And you were brought here to test it and turn it into a product, right?' 'It was as obvious as it had always been, even Grendle was aware that some things just never changed regardless of the people, although.' 'What exactly went wrong then?' 'Well, we were there, the twenty of us.' 'Including the families.' Interrupted Grendle, seeing how that brought some sort of insecurity on his face, there was something definitely hidden and it was getting dangerous above. Once they had been passed the stairs, on the upper level, the room was darker, everything was eerier than it happened to be. 'Look for the room, if I remember correctly, two hundred eighty. No that I would doubt in myself or my story, in case you were wondering but this was because of us.' His tone was lowered into a whisper. 'Careful, we may be stumbling into a scene of the sort, if I remember correctly, one of the other two crew-members which had been affected were stuck into an act of cannibalism which couldn't be stopped.' 'And you were going to tell me when exactly? When we stumbled upon them?' Though he had paid a lot more attention to the important part of their conversation, which had been, alas, their fault. 'A mutation caused by us in the alloy, as it seems that we have tested it in our attempts set by the High Directive that we would try to enchant, or rather turn our lungs into something which would need no air to survive. It was only the beginning of the experiments which pushed the alloy into an organic state of mutation from which they have come about today.' As this happened, it looked as if they have arrived at the scene, after all, setting themselves face to face with some kind of strange-looking humanoids. One of them was standing tall, holding himself slightly bent against the other. He seemed to have grabbed the other one on the ground while they were both struggling in the least to make some sort of move. 'Is this what you were talking about? They're both exposed.' Noticed Grendle, as he looked for another way to hide his gaze, to look away, he couldn't do it but feel as a creep. 'We called it the Conjoined Strain, coming from the fact that regardless of how many times we tried separating them, their bodies found a way to liquefy bone and organs until they met, then solidify to an extreme, as if they had been born this way."What of the exposed organs, and how about the suits, then?"Well, I have previously told you of the case involving two crew members involved into cannibalism, haven't I? Well, this is it, after which, it just seemed normal for us to leave them there."Alive and suffering for the rest of their miserable existence?"We have no data over the fact that they might be sentient or not, and in a way, they're an effective stop to anyone past this point, if they indeed feel something in the sense of primal need, though I doubt that.They should feel danger from one another and nothing could be more dreadful and frightening to another than what you see in front of your eyes.Wait a minute now, you're not."I am going to put an end to their existence, no one deserves that, be it a sentry or not."We need to preserve the ones which are alive."I won't have any of it now, this will be done in a moment."This time around, he didn't even try to burn through the helmet but rather leave the visor from the side. It was strange, though the face had been spread and was pulled off the face with the visor, leaving behind some skull-shape carcass, still moving and breathing. Judging by what was said alone, breathing without air was still a dream rather than being any closer to reality.He sniffed and looked away now, before preparing to go forth.'You should look the other way if you're not prepared to see what's about to happen. It'll be just like before."Carry on them, I don't need to sugar-coat it just because we don't know one another.'A mutual nod led to them reaching the same conclusion, as it became more obvious that whatever infected the poor man ran deep.'You still haven't told me, why are their wearing suits? Each of the one I've seen so far, wearing at least a suit with the same design."It's a way for us to contaminate them so we're sure they won't spread the disease, or at least that's what we thought we did. It turned out that it wasn't something which was transmissible, not airborne, not through touch. We're still unsure of what's causing it so far.'It was time nonetheless and the flame seemed to have melted through the skull immediately, right through both lobes and the metal index which seemed to have run between the two of them.For once, he didn't enjoy it, but the body fell and got stuck with the head and the torso on top of it.A peculiar pose came to be, but this one was far much easier to take care of, as simply removing the helmet pulled the neck and head, whatever it was. Far decayed, the remains of it spilt all over the man's chest, leaving nothing but the corpses stuck in that position.'Are you done now, can we carry on before another one of them shows?"I need to know more about what I'm to expect out there then, Stratos, you've not told me of the others.Would they act like the first one we've encountered or like these ones?"Different conditions, I can assure you, it's not that often that one of them become as violent as it."So you have encountered them before then?"Well, until we were driven into that chamber, we used to dwell in the lower areas and the bridge, if that means anything. We're still to carry on, right?"Right.' Said Grendle, looking at his wrist, he'd break it if it were for him to push it even farther.In the little time he had known Stratos, there still wasn't any clue on his intention, other than the fact that he looked forward to someone to do his lousy job, that as well as keeping track on those failed experiments.'Say, I don't suppose.'He stopped and looked down, there was almost a transparent rectangle on the floor, running from one side to another. Looking through it wasn't the least of his concerns. There were things moving there, metallic in nature, which couldn't be put down in their place, but he knew he saw it.'Is someone there? Or something in a suit of armour, metal or anything of the sort?"Calm down, I'm sure there's nothing unless you vaguely saw another one of them."No, no, it wasn't them, it was something, shorter, thinner but it could grab things from below and move them to a farther place. I know what I saw, this is hardly the time for you to laugh."Well, it's not that often I get to be in the company of another so you should excuse me in the least.'With a slight pause, he deterred to looking by the side and pointing it out, but before he could've said a thing, he was largely interrupted.'You know this reminds me of the first time I met Mordecai, and just how much I had wanted to propose for both of us to split and walk our own ways.'I do hope you don't propose walking away with our only weapon, do you?'No, no, that's not my intention, it's just that this place is so familiar, that it makes me think that it's been days or weeks since then. It's a marvel how the time flies under your own eyes, isn't it?'But he spoke of it no longer, as he could see it into the man's eyes that he couldn't relate with him in the least. They were strangers from the far-away place who knew not one another and walked in the dark.Regardless of what they thought of it, they carried on and approached the side.'Do you think they'll return?'Asked the girl, as it seemed that Rigg had prepared the table for them to eat, seemingly it was terrible to think about the fact that the door would never be entirely closed, left in this manner for as long as it would be.'I do think they can take care of themselves, ain't that right Mordecai.'He only clicked on his heel and seemed to have peered in the distance. Nothing could've convinced the man that everything was right, not in the least, especially not after what happened.'I can tell you that I'm sure we'll be out of this place one way or the other, at least that can be certain.'Although he still seemed to grasp a sight as an eagle, trying to peer on every side, as not be sure that someone would take them by surprise.'Think you'll be better off than here once you leave? I mean, after we deal with all the troubles around, it could be better if we had another hand to help us with the rebuilding and refurbishing of the ship. We may even be thrusting in the outer space again.'That's wishful thinking ma'am, at least not since your ships seems to be deeply sunken in the dirt. I doubt there could be any duel whatsoever even if it were for you to reach outside and search for it.'It was harsh but it was the very truth, they had to realise one way or the other that eventually, they would find out. And when they did, it wasn't like they were in an any better condition than staying in the cold, he seemed to have cared a little in the least.The delusion had to be done with sooner or later, that being certain in the least, he himself had dealt with such things in the very appropriate past, but how exactly would they react?Children which hadn't know or might've been spared from the sight of the outside world, of nature, only to be thrust in this war.'Say, this ship of yours, is it of some common design? Are there others like it that look exactly the same, in terms of materials and what it looks?'I suppose, this was only one of the common model they Division made, perhaps they might've made, oh, I don't know, eight hundred, five thousand of them, something like that.'So you're not excluding the fact that there might be others out there, still going on, possibly still in some places.'Again, there were plenty of them made as well as newer ones which made others abandon old junk like this for the newer models so I'm not entirely sure I would put more thought into it. Unless someone specifically made a motion to keep it working, I don't think they would've taken it, you've got no idea just how much someone has to pay to get a model such as this registered and pass all the tests.'Why not buy a new one then?'They're worth a fortune, more than what a few explorers and scientists can afford on a common basis. We were lucky enough that we could go through it at all, I'd say. With the regulations and.'The flickering lights from time to time, which was to be ignored, though it made the two children quite ecstatic over the effect it had.'Things like this happen often?'More or less, it's that the entire energy of the ship is directed straight to our room, there's not much we can do about it. We're using the generator as well as we can and so far it worked well, at least until you two came along, there weren't any prospects for us to keep. Being trapped in here for so long.'No privacy at all.' Said the girl, as she came closer to Rigg smiling.There was somewhat of a pair of bumps above their very room. 'Think that's them?' 'No, it sounds like there's something much heavier going around the room, I doubt it'd be enough for two men of average heights.' The headlights stopped flashing and he was sure that it was the two of them. More than that, he could undeniably point out how certain he was of their very location, especially since Grendle had started faking some sort of limp for the reason. Heavy bumps meant something was wrong, but he couldn't leave them alone. 'Why do you have a rock in your hand? You couldn't have gotten it from anywhere but the outside.' 'Just in case something happens, that's where we came from and, something followed us here.' 'I understand, is that why you were both so nervous being here and looking around?' He nodded slowly and stood up from the table, now being inclined near the edge of the door. 'It might be anywhere, ready to pounce at anyone unsuspecting, I know it is.' 'That's what we needed, more trouble in this blasted ship.' 'Language, please. Listen, Mordecai, there's nothing to be afraid of, especially with a primitive weapon such as that.' 'It served me well enough the last time, and it will serve me as well.' 'You said you came from the outside, right? Show me where you came from then?' He nodded as she signalled for the children to stay behind, they were already steps from the dark room, when the panel opened, revealing yet more spectators who stopped on their way to peer upon the strange machinery. Rigg already looked stupefied over the fact that there was nothing but distress there, dwindling at her sight. Something in her made her mind race from time to time, unable to cope with the changes this brought to her. 'Now, do you believe me when I say that I came from here?' 'How? This couldn't have been, there's been no landing, we were supposed to be floating in space at least until our help signal came. And what are those things? They're not coloured as humans are, they're.' 'Different.' Came in Grendle, with some sort of irritation, now that she was all caught up, he retreated back into the room and waited. Sooner or later they had to return, hopefully just as disappointed as the two of them were now. 'What's with the violent trashing happening in there?' 'That's where one of them is locked, far too dangerous to be released or for any attempt to save him to be made. If I'm not wrong about it, he might've been one of the first ones to be infected, the first one to go feral, mad, whatever you might call it.' 'Worse than that, there were signs of entry from below, something which he had recognised alone, marks of skin from the bottom, too recognisable to be anyone else's.' 'Say, what would it happen if a foreign element came and took over one of those mutated bodies? Like some sort of parasite of any kind, going on the rotten carcass, what exactly could it possibly do to it?' 'After all, it should be dead, there's no way to take out something which is dead, there's no mind.' 'Except there's some activity going on in there, which has been recorded, they're still human from any standpoint, despite displaying in-human capabilities.' 'That much alone made them indistinguishable foes for anyone to face, let alone the two of them.' 'Could it open the doors from inside? Say, if it was given enough time, would it be able to find a way to break through.' 'I'm afraid that it could happen, but the chances are slim, it's gone past any sort of thought forming since the alloy had twisted it for far too long.' 'But what if something took over its body and gave it that extra kick of violence and of mind? How tall and nasty is the creature which lays behind those closed doors?' 'They're sealed past any sort of attempt to exit, as the chamber was originally planned to entrap any kind of reactor failure if we ever had to bring it somewhere before melting. To make yourself a better idea, that room could handle a nuclear device if it were brought inside and detonated. Now, the creature inside that room is strong enough to make slight dents from the insides but that's as far as my knowledge of it goes. Anything else is beyond me, as there are no cameras inside nor any way to see how much it had grown.' 'Grown? You're saying that it has the ability to grow? Weren't they supposed to be some sort of decaying creatures now?"No, I'm afraid that it doesn't take anything else than proper observation to realise that the size of the mandibles which are hitting the walls produce far too much sound to come from something small. From my expectations, I believe that it's grown enough to encompass the entire room in the least, that, if it would be possible to peek inside, if it came to that."Aren't you afraid that it may get out of control in time? If there was no way to contain the magnitude of that creature, it could break the entire ship apart."We can take the risk as long as we receive help from the Directive, just look over her."They walked a few steps in an awkward direction, only to notice that there was a metallic sealed entry hole, round, as for a tube to be inserted.'That's supposed to have a cooling device inserted inside, there'd be no way for anything to get through, not even radiation since it's meant to reach one of the layers of this room and cool it to an extreme level.'So, you're planning on freezing it then breaking it to pieces?'A nod confirmed as they moved on, still dimly aware of the fact that there were others looking around. With a flash of the light from his shoulder, in the area which was darker, there was a common face with he recognised. It was unexpected but that face looked young, too much so for the body which was out of its suit. The bones were visible, nothing but a skinless and meatless body holding the head of a human, something had stopped the progression from the deck above.It spoke no word but smile, apparently bearing a couple of heads which had been shrunken, right in its lap, smiling while it looked for something on the floor.'No sudden movement now, I think I know who that used to be."Should we take it out then? There are just a few feet between the two of us."Again, take nothing sudden, I don't think this evolution is normal, far too eerie to be called anything of the sort."What then?"Keep walking and don't stare into its eyes, it's best we don't get any attention drawn to us."Whose heads do they belong to then?"When he was alive, I mean, in the past, he used to be a collector, having them shoved in the bottle, hidden in his room. It seems as if he managed to break through and play with them, just take a look at his fingers and you'll know what I'm talking about.'From a glance, it seemed like his fingers were twisted with the hairs of those shrunken heads, to the point where they had merged. It was only after a brief shock that he realised that those heads had some sort of movement and life into them.Not much of it, but enough to noise that his fingers came out of their small mouths and moved them each second.'How can his bone grow at this age? Is that the alloy's doing as well?This kind of experimentation of humans doesn't just happen all of the sudden."Well it wasn't supposed to be like this but it spread like a disease once the direct contact with the alloy started."Is it still inside the ship, then?"That was obvious enough to tell, as he was certain himself of the answer. Least of all, he could tell that he was in for something that had no chance for him to return. He wanted or needed Mordecai to be here with him, to the point where he would've preferred his company over this man with his many secrets.'Should we put it out of its misery at least?"No, let it live, for now, it can do no harm any longer."Unless it shows any signs of growing like the others."It won't, now don't step any closer to it, I mean what I said.'Though there was in the least some expectation to be called upon their return if the entire area was to be safe they all had to be taken care off.'Now, follow me and be careful, we're entering the reactors room, it may be best if you were to breathe slowly and make no more than two steps at a time. It's for your safety, now, if you'll.'Something must've hit him hard in the gut, for he stared at nothing else than an empty room and the thin air which laid in the place where the reactors had been. There had to be an explanation which his mind tried desperately to contort, but nothing came to it in the least of his attempts.'Is this room supposed to be empty? I thought you said."Let me think for a moment, please.'He stared in disbelief, trying with his hand to push towards the emptiness but felt nothing there. It wasn't a hallucination as he might've thought it to be in the least of seconds which passed. Soon enough, the realisation came, while he realised the impossibility of his problem as well as the absence of the machinery which had to be in place, he sighed before falling to his knees. Hands on his face, he took it worse than it might've been imagined.'Do you need something?' "Yes, yes, a minute if you could, alone.'Grendle looked around and saw that there was only one door at the end of the corridor. Not that he didn't trust her to go on alone, but this seemed important enough to respect his wish.Strange, it was so silent in that room, while outside, he could still hear the pounding. Much of his awareness flew over the fact that he saw the marks and knew it went inside, trying to assimilate the new host to some dreadful results.The dimness hadn't helped and he had thought he waited far too long now. Upon entering the room, he watched, his grin had faded as he asked.'Stratos, Stratos, are you there?'He looked below but there hadn't been any signs of a man jumping below. As a matter of fact, without a doubt, there weren't any signs of that the door at the end had opened, but he knew it to be the only way. He was alone now and like it even less.Below them, neither of them seemed to be in any sort of distress, rather content in their safety zone, still having to wait for word before taking the children out.Some shorter trips had been made from time to time but nothing as serious as the two of them went on.'Did you get used to them? They're rather strange in their appearance."No, I haven't and there was plenty of time for me to accommodate to them. It's just that they speak a different tongue I could never get used to as well as they act so strangely in their wooden and linen houses. As I've told you about the ink and the tricks they've tried using to scare us, they're bizarre."I think I understand. You don't suppose it might be easier if we get out, do you?"It certainly can't be worse than being trapped in here.'Pounding could be heard from above, someone had been running, no, sprinting, a flight of the sorts, full speed ahead. The man or the thing which was making its way seemed to have in mind a matter of the living or the dead.Both Rigg and Mordecai looked at one another and signalled for the children to hide. Now they were armed with two long metal pipes which had been found inside the circuit. Since the ship wasn't functional any longer, there wasn't any need for it not to be salvaged for everything.'Wait, wait, wait, it's me, it's me, Grendle. Don't hit me just yet."What happened, where's Stratos?"He went on ahead without me, I think he might be in trouble, that's why I came, Mordecai, I need your help in finding the man."Will you take Rigg as well?'She looked at him considerably, flattered even for he had thought about it.'I need to look after the children, but I need to know what happened before I let any of you go.'While he went away, the news came as grave as they might be.'All of them disappeared? But that means this ship won't be able to fly again, even the electricity and what holds the door closed or open might go in time if they aren't there to sustain everything. Food might spoil and."There's something else."She knows Grendle, I've shown her, the only thing which remains is for us to find him and break through.'That was the plan, at least, until they got in front of the gate where he was last seen at. In was hard to move around there, all those wires at the chest level, which were clearly meant to have some purpose after all. Clearly, this was an area in which neither man nor creature was meant to get through.'Grendle, we're locked, look.'He returned to check and see, there wasn't any other way for him to be able to work the locks, as the door was tightly sealed. There were only humming sounds around, and the thought that they might never see them again.'You don't suppose some doors closed while others opened, do you?'Judging from one ball of light, from far away, someone was there, working at something. He had locked himself, it must've been him of all.'Get down, we don't need to let him see us yet."You don't suppose he's done something regrettable, do you?"At this point, there's none of us who hadn't, Mordecai, absolutely neither of us had their hands clean.'He peered below, the muck between the wires, the unclean still went from material to material, leaving nothing but the misery around.'What do you suppose will happen once we meet him? He seems to be the one who has purposefully closed the doors."I can hear both of you down there.'He said, before lighting the entire room, from the bottom to the very ceiling, bright white lights making this look like some facility or some doctor's room.'As you may have guessed, I'm unarmed as well, but let me propose the fact that I won't open the door for you.Get up already, I'm sick of speaking to you like this.'Both of them seemed to have sprouted from their knees, staring directly at him after they have climbed the stairs. Both of them were nervous about him and made little effort to hide it. Grendle had known that there were a great number of men and women who'd been affected by the alloy, while he had met just a tiny fraction of them. Most of which had to be locked in various rooms which were entirely avoided, without a doubt, a lot of which would've been stronger and more than aggressive on human sight.'Do you even know why I wanted to bring you here Grendle, at least before you ran to get him?"If it prevents you from doing something rash, go ahead, I'm all ears."No further steps, I'm warning you, I know that I've got enough power in this panel that I could release every cage and every door in this wreck before its inevitability comes.'Neither of them was in any condition to test his bluff, henceforth, they stopped and peered around. Wires everywhere, leading through the walls and ceilings, with the exception of one or two panels which seemed to have been lost around.'Is it worth it now? When the only people left alive are two children and a woman?"Barely, do you know what it feels like being isolated in such a manner and having to keep control for such a long duration of time? If anything, if I were to stay there any longer, I would've lost my mind and murdered them only to be with her, whenever she liked it or not.'The man was serious, there were an emptiness and sickness which could be seen through him. Lust and rage have incorporated into this disease and there wasn't any doubt that something was definitely wrong with his body.Jerking around, being happily attached to the panel, Mordecai thought of a way he might've ripped a cord or to if it weren't as dangerous, to begin with.He might've even tried it if there were the two of them alone with no other chance, but the two of them there? Nothing could stop them if they put their minds at ease and focused.'I said no more steps, don't move any closer or I'm releasing them.'He changed a bit right in front of their eyes, the skin and how his body jerked into some direction, clearly something foreign had entered him.That's when it became relevant to remind himself of the one important matter which had entered in contact with their crew.'You inserted alloy into your body."Directly into my bloodstream, exactly, doesn't surprise me that you found that out. Perhaps you could've become my student if things were different but I'm afraid that there'd be no chance for me to take any more children in my body of work."What are you stalling for? Are you trying to kill us after you transform, is that it?"Or I could open all the doors and have you deal with all of them as I have originally planned. You won't believe just how hard it is not to turn in and let them be free as I am.It was inevitable that we all become that way from the start, just as one of my colleagues above.'For the time being, it seemed like a slightly flattened man, with a broken visor which seemed to have lost no crack. It was the first time they had noticed him, mostly because it hid from sight and seemed to crawl too fast above to be noticed.'Strange but fascinating creatures, they imitate or get some type of behaviour they got at the time when most of them had been alive. This one might get aggressive enough to split in two again.'Just as if it were a command, the being split into two halves which crawled around the wires. Neither of which seemed to have touched any of them, not the lower half neither the upper. 'I guess we're two against two now and it seems as if you moved again. Someone's bound to be punished if you're not taking me any serious.' A shriek could be heard from around the base, he grinned. Looking at it, it looked as if those two crawling human parts retreated into the holes from which they came, gnawing and chittering at the creature. 'What have you done, you madman?' Immediately Grendle went past Mordecai and reached the door only to slam his hands and yield less than a result. Both were aware of just what was released there, the results of which were disastrous, for it must've known exactly what it wanted, and for which reason alone. 'Don't bother going after her, she's the only one there. It might be guided by the smell or it might find itself going down the coldest place it can. If I remember completely, one of the observations was the fact that they seemed to like damp and cold places.' He barely finished when he came from across the room and threw him against the wall. Regardless of the fact that he was no longer becoming a human, he seemed to have little regards for himself, nor that he feared being shaken around. 'If you want to do it, there's nothing else you can, this place is about to lose whatever supplies it has, they were bound to run out sooner or later.' 'You damn mongrel, we could've prepared, he could've saved them, but now we got no chance at that.' 'And who's at fault for all? Who came to us looking for trouble? Admit it, this is as much on you as the blood is on my hands, there's no way to...to.' He looked all of the sudden at the torch and just managed to feel its heat reach his face. The man was the madman, not him, could he not realise that there was a conscious being there that felt pain? 'You can't do this, not now, while I'm still a human, while I'm still a man.' 'Grendle, this feels wrong for some reason, what's happening there, now with this.' But he was too far gone now, farther than being absorbed in the heat of the moment. He had long come into terms with the fact that his hands were stained and there was little to no return to what they had become. Without realising nor being stopped, he blazed through his chest and carved the man alive, the shouts of which disturbed the other as he tried throwing a tantrum over the pain. It worked its way slowly, just so he would make sure there'd be no return. Mordecai decided to look away, instead, he tried to rip out some of the cords in hope that there'd be a change. They were too thick, even for the pipe to work its way through. When the screams of agony had ended, he was aware that it was time for him to return. 'What are we to do now? I don't know what he released but I certainly don't like the way he sounded.' Every crew member which had been, which are like. The ones that are suffering from the same condition as the one that broke through. He realised a hand as to be stopped. Something was just behind the door, snorting loudly, sniffing around as sharply as it could. 'Don't make a word.' There was the pnel there but little to no good could come if it were for him to open the door. But it had to be a good enough idea if he really thought of it. Looking in front of his panel he realised that it wasn't as complicated as it were since a map of the entire place laid overlaid, with every button being set for every door, exactly where they had been located. With that level of accuracy, there wasn't any way for him to miss. 'What are you doing? Can't you see I'm still here?' As the door suddenly opened without a warning, some primal man came, walking on all four. He was much taller than the other specimens, bulkier, and there had been something in terms of tusks coming out of his face, which had pierced the helmet. It wouldn't have been a problem if it weren't for the fact that they came out of his mouth, his nose, even pierced through his eyes. Even upon examinations, it was clear that those weren't tusks, but rather grown columns of bone which were somewhat covered with the skin at the base, sharp as to cut some rock. It came slowly since Mordecai was far too afraid to make a sudden move and right as he reached the in-between the doors, he noticed. The door immediately slammed from the right, trapping the once-human who had no chance to push or pull behind, there wasn't any escape but damning pain. 'Take care of it now, before it alarms the others.' 'How should I take care of it?

Have you seen the way it looks?' 'Use the pipe and crush it, now, I think others will hear and might be on the way.' Without the least of satisfaction, he came closer and with a single stroke, he silenced it. The blow came from above and seemed to have set the two pieces of its skull together. Now the tusks were set in the utmost awkward position, pointing above and below as opposed to being placed straight. Now, it couldn't speak either it seemed, but waited as a docile creature. The thought of this sickened him, as he would take no part in it. 'I cannot just bash its head now, that's far too cruel. There should be another way to end it in the fastest way.' 'Knock yourself off Mordecai, I need to find a way out.' Those were the plans of the ship after all if there was a single way to find how to escape, it was in those plans. 'On the other side, the other looked around and managed to see something which was rather loose, the type of cords which were connected from one end to another in some kind of plugging device. He wore no gloves whatsoever and it wasn't the brightest of ideas to grab on it in such a manner, but there was little left for him to try. At least he used the pipe to move the head in a weird position, having placed it between the door and the spine. Now there wasn't any way to comfortably move its head without breaking the neck. He only needed a few centimetres and the creature was strangely calm about the process. No fight, no attempt for a flight, it came to him acting a doctor would, when dealing with the putting down of a beast. He proceeded to look for a way to rip out the helmet, but that would be far too dangerous with so many sharp things attached. Enough of a position it was that pushing it around would yield nothing if make it even looser than it had been. Little remained to the entire thing, other than to unzip the zipper which laid on the back. The first thing he noticed was that the shirt still remained there, promptly ripped apart next. One or a few layers of skin away, just from being pulled before it started getting slightly nervous. There's no way he can get out of that grip, Mordecai told himself, just as a reassurance, nothing else. He looked as if could actually care while busying himself with the dangerous thing which came. First, he pulled the plug which connects both of the cords, grabbing a hold of them both. The entry point would be placed on the bottom of the floor, while the piece from which came the electricity laid in his hand. Sharp hooks coming out of it as well. Perhaps they were intended to act as weapons in cases of emergency, but as soon as it felt the static in the air, caused by this strange cord, it started thrashing about, trying to dig around. Something it is cracked, at least at the point where the metal bar had been shoved. 'End it already, I cannot have it distract me now. Remember what I have said about the others coming, you wouldn't want to deal with an entire horde.' Hearing that made him more anxious, as he thrust ahead and heard a daemonical sound coming from inside it. Perhaps it had been the bar, or the door, maybe the suit. But as he backed away, he looked how the cord blackened, and the light above of them started flashing in violent manners. The cackling of skin was accompanied by a groaning which was weaker after all the jaw was sealed shut from the way it was previously forced. Flashes followed and the rage, when all of the sudden the metal ball fell through his neck, heated, as it were, it immediately beheaded the creature, taking a piece of the spine. From below, there was not even a slight twitch as it laid, the door closing instead. 'Pull the cord before it makes contact with anything, you did right.' He said in a sarcastic manner while looking out for the least he could think of. The problem was dealt with successfully, as he reconnected the cables again, seeing how it was a bit dirty from his side, he chose to ignore the fact. Everything was going to eventually stop working either way, but this wasn't exactly working, this style of execution was putrid, even for him. Finally, the door managed to close and ripped the body in two halves, one on each side. 'Have you found a way out yet? I can't deal with the stress while knowing that there are others out there.' 'I'm afraid there doesn't seem to be any other way out.' 'Any other? What do you mean by any other?' 'The front of the ship Mordecai, I believe that it might be our only escape so far, we would need to break through the glass and start digging through the dirt with whatever we can find.' 'Digging through the dead? As if we were crawling from a damned coffin?' 'Don't you understand yet? This is out the coffin, or it might become unless we make an effort to get out.' 'Then why are we wasting our time and aren't on our way there?' 'I need to make sure that all the doors are locked before going ahead, we cannot deal with what was released over there.' He wanted to grab that metal bar and used, though the fear that he might get a burn still lingered. Even with a piece of his shirt wrapped around his hand, he could feel the heat behind it. Though to blame it all on the fact that it burnt inside the body wasn't what he intended. Soon, they would need something blunt if they were to break the glass, maybe even something with which they could defend themselves. Rather, nothing could've been harder than to look upon his surroundings and realise how shallow this place was. Especially low-energy, with Grendle busy working on his newly found toy, he was left all alone unable to walk through the circuit. It was the first time he had missed this new world they found themselves in, but that was about to change. The door opened with an immediate click, letting the other side of the body slide against the other. Without the least of care, Mordecai got down and tried again, feeling around until there it was the cold edge upon which his piece of cloth could hold about. 'Are we ready to go now? You don't suppose we could try going below the deck and try...' 'I'm afraid I cannot know whenever or not they changed the rooms when the shout began, but we should make sure we avoid it ourselves.' They snuck past the body, going by the feel on the ground. It was dangerous with so many forms moving around, most of which hadn't been human after all. But they both kept together and moved as a pair, unable to talk too much or to hope. That they met another one snicking near them who stare, it took a second to realise and take everything it. Darkness made that broken ball dim, but it was obvious that it tried imitating them there. If there was a face there, it had been flattened, pulling in every piece of glass, only to make his face a broken reflection of the two of them. Eyes and a few mouths could be seen, a foul creature which seemed reclusive enough not to attack. It kept its distance just as well, after all, it used to be a suited man, he used to think, maybe there still was some intelligence there after all. With that at least, both of them could hope for better, going by the memory, soon, the door from which the biggest failure of this alloy laid. Remains of it were spread everywhere around the room. A blue light covered, barely revealing what laid through every corner and each stretch of the wall. Apparently, it had grown so large as to get itself stuck against the wall by long extensions of thin skin, like meat chains which had been ripped upon escaping. Most of all, there had been faces, carved against the wall, without a doubt something which resembled what it looked like, the only problem having remained was the fact that there two or three heads which had been abandoned there, part of the entire mould. It seemed as if they were part of the crew, two of them down, to say the least, collected like trophies in a poor imitation of the animalistic manner. 'I don't like seeing this any longer, can we try escaping now?' 'No sudden movement, you wouldn't want to encounter what's down there.' 'Where are you going? That's not the right direction you should head in.' 'It will only take a moment.' Said Grendle as he went it, carefully as not to get himself on too much of what remained of the being caged in here. Though he was unsettled just as much as him, he followed, seeing just how frightened the faceless one behind laid. Not a step forth to follow nor to attempt to do the same as them. 'All right, you've seen everything from inside, can we go now?' 'Not yet, not until I checked everything at the head, look into the metal cabinets to your right.' 'The ones covered in?' It seemed as it had formed some sort of web around it, which had to be carefully ripped apart. He didn't enjoy doing this any better than he did, not to mention that he only had a blow-torch, which he was reluctant to use because of the limited fuel cannister it held upon. Carefully, he used the bar to pull away from the web and open the cabinets doors only to look at bottles and many syringes which were empty, useless, without a use or any trouble. 'Nothing here, maybe on your side, then?' He wasn't aware of what exactly he was looking for, though at least he wanted to think of a way in which he could make an idea of what they were about to face. This creature, the strangeness of it, how big it had been, what were its thoughts at the time of which it bore a human mind. At least, it would've been helpful if there was some kind of document which was kept around for them to read, something which would've worked without denying. 'I think I found something, it's some sort of documentation regarding the crew members and what they owed.' 'That won't help us much unless the creature remembers and it's on the way to recover its debts.' 'I think there might be more to it than you think. Take a look here, two names are crossed, Apricott and Barnabee, these two seemed to have owed him the most. Say, you don't suppose, take a look under their heads, something of the way they were killed makes it seem like their bodies had been there for a long time ago before they had been destroyed.' 'You want me to mess with their corpses now?' 'It's only for me to confirm something, nothing more, you're the one with the weapon after all.' 'I wasn't the one who, nevermind, I'll check to see then.' There was a small amount of meat, out of the tip of which there came some bones, clearly, most of them were their remains, but there was something else in that mixture. Bones that sharp, long and thick belong to animals as well as human, not to mention the blue pouches of blood which seemed to have laid inside. Look for a card, Mordecai, look for a card, do this and that, this man wouldn't. 'Grendle, Grendle, what is this thing?' He turned closer to look as what swam in that covered pool, revealing itself as another head, another victim which wasn't signed off the ledge. 'The man could've died at the time where the being had lost its humanity and no longer care about the debts.' 'No, Grendle, just look, it had a piece of the torso still attached, look at the nameplate on his chest. It read Sam, just as in the ledger. What he had failed to look was the fact that the ledger was full, twenty or thirty pages in which they were kept in check. More than a few had been crossed off, including an underscore under some names of the people who might've been alive but kept in check. Look, one of them used to be Stratos, it says like here, and judging by the numbers, he would've been next. It was getting dangerous to wait in the dark, where they brooded to close to their now red-litten room. Something in the illumination waited and the moaning of a great creature roamed below. 'You don't suppose there was a chance.' 'Drop it already Mordecai, nothing down there could've survived it, as I'm sure it reached that place before I even managed to close most of the doors. Just take a look at how the door was ripped apart past the point of no return. It wanted to make sure there'd be no way for it to be caged again, and this time, it seemed to have succeeded.' 'Is that all then? Are we going to be settled with only the ledger?' 'No, this only offers us some clue, I still yearn for something more, since we are to escape and never to come back.' 'Could we not take whatever note we find with us and read it on the way? I cannot believe you would find here, of all places, where danger roams freely with us, a place to study.' 'The world is full of surprises my friend, and I believe we may find something great here, if only we were just to look around."They have been looking but found nothing, if it weren't for one small thing which seemed to sparkle at his eyes. One keycard, seemingly blue, there wasn't any certainty for what it was, but Grendle made sure to carry it with him wherever he went, without giving it in nor paying any attention but not for it."Think we may find a way to open the doors with that?"I doubt it, but at least I think I might be able to find a way."The wailing stopped all of the sudden and it felt as if the silence was more bizarre. As they walked outside, they had been finally met with resistance, as a damnable split of a creature, half and half approached, from two sides, crawling. Opposite of the others, it seemed as if this one creature bore not any sort of resemblance to a human, wearing no suit and having adapted, on each specimen to work with only one half of the brain.'Careful now, it may lash at us at any moment now, we cannot be sure of it won't try."Listen to me, just stay behind, you cannot take it with a small canister of bottled fire.'It was true enough that they crawled like worms, aggressively in the way they sneered and peered about with their deformed forms and lack of eyes. One of them was faster and just in reach, the sound of which crackled as the metal bar came in full force over the head and smashed the skull inside. The buzzing began as he hadn't expected it to be as forcefully pushed inside as it had been. Perhaps it might've been enough to cripple the fiend, but the other had shown signs that it wouldn't have stopped just as the death of the other, instead it made it charge faster. He rolled the pipe from below and managed to kick something which looked like a lower jaw, including some of the crooked teeth which seemed to have been crackling from side to side. The pain unbearable, but it made no sound, finally understanding on which side it was. There wasn't any way to end him, turning around and making into the dimness of the unknown, both feet fairly showed below.'Let's go before he returns or brings the others.'Much taller ones laid tied to the walls of seemed to have some tendencies to hurt themselves there. It felt as if, more than anything, they weren't monsters but mentally ill humans acting out of nature as well as outside their bodies. It was a short leap from where they were, towards the bridge where the glass laid.'Wait, Mordecai, it isn't worth it, can't you see? The light out there just lit again, look at the shadow and tell me if it's them.'He tried to make out the forms of the children, but they might've hidden, perhaps that could've been Rigg. But his mind tried way too hard to hide the fact that the many lobed, twisted shadow couldn't have belonged to any human. It seemed from that of which was cast that it was in the process of eating. Something was pulled, such as it would've been if they were to eat chicken, having taken slabs of meat and eating the skin right off the base. A dreadful realisation, that he turned and saw those who were ill approaching.'They're coming for us, it seems, what should I do?'Fend them off until I get enough of a hole for us to get through, this is our way out.'It turned out that there were a few layers of reinforced glass, but nothing was impossible to be taken off. But those behind had some sort of quarrel with the living, uninfected, as he could see that from below, one carried something which had been unknown to him.'I think that's the alloy, they're trying to convert us.'For a moment now, Mordecai had turned around while seemingly quite anxious at that. One touch, perhaps exposure, maybe it had to be taken orally, he had no idea just how they could've been infected with it. No risk was to be taken as the man started whipping away with his pipe, blow after blow, putting their weak bodies on the ground. It was time that the hole was made, just large enough for a man to get through. Perhaps it might've been the reaching point of heat which made it so but the rest of the glass seemed to have melted in an instant one a hole was made from one side to the other.'I've made it, Mordecai, I've made it.'And just in time, for it had looked like they were cornered, while the beast who was eating seemed to have been done and in need of replacements.'Why is the dirt on?"It doesn't matter, I need only to push it away.'As it came, a blinding light just made them stop their advance.They both jumped through before any chance of their demise could've come and walked away a few feet.It was only a piece of a greater ship, from the looks and determination, the real one might've been four-time wider and longer, despite the fact that it didn't stop the spectators from going around and peering at that.'They died inside, but are we going to let a hole there, you know what it will happen if they bring that thing outside.'I'm not their saviour and we've got more important business at hand.'As he walked away, there was no choice but to follow. The dark metallic ship glistened in the sun like a tiny darkened rocks which hadn't been touched by the river or by sea.One additional glance and it seemed they had escaped.'This cannot be good, this cannot be happening.'But it seemed that even the peasants were surprised and banished by the strange looking forms which crept from inside.'We'll go around and search for something in the towers, they won't find us as long as we mix ourselves along with the three and the bushes.'You can't seriously ignore what will happen if they're let to run loosely."The night is much closer than you think it is and I'm afraid we wouldn't stand a chance if we were to match wits against creatures bringing an infection.If they're infection the people, let them do as they please, we're far better than that in any sort of way.'He changed a bit, that was sure, and still, he clung on that card he had taken from inside.It made him feel as if he was prepared for something else to come, something which would've made him trapped again.'It was bound to happen.'He said it in the night, around the fire, it seemed that for the first time he had found something which they had in common with their world, seemingly being the rabbits which tasted the same.'Think it might be safe to sleep around with those things free? They got it in it for us, you know that?"I'm aware that there may be some kind of animosity, but I chose not to bother myself with it.'Especially since the tower was just within their reach, as close as they had ever been before.For a moment then they realised the most damning thing, is the fact that the ship might've moved by itself during their stay.Perhaps no time was lost, after all, not that he was going to tell Mordecai of his realisation as the last of the flames went out.The operation seemed to have faded once they realised that they were still in the damned realm. A new day brought some discoloured purple sky, as well as darkened bluegrass and flowers around them.What might've caused all this? It was evenly close to the time they've spent inside that ship, making it seem like it were ready to be taken in such a manner.Neither of which would try to say a thing in the morning, now that, it was just in reach. Perhaps the darkening happened only since they approached that place and nothing else. A virus would've shown itself with other kinds of symptoms.They ate what they had taken and hidden in their bags and were already on the road, occasionally looking behind to see whenever or not someone or something managed to tail them during the entire happening there.'Are we not to talk about what happened?"The silence was suddenly cut, to no avail since neither of them continued that piece of their past.'It may be dangerous to head inside."I do not know about it, we might be a trespasser and deemed as criminals in the most likely case. But if it's not that way, we may be able to find weapons, real weapons which we may be able to use, unlike the thing I have.And you've already run out of fuel, remember?We're in the worst conundrum possible and this may be the answer to all of our questions."You sure put a lot of thought on it for someone who hates this place."I want nothing more than you do, which is to be able to return home unharmed.But this, this might've been a bad idea, to begin with.'They were both standing just in reach, feeling as if there was night again. Something in the proximity of the towers made everything look way worse than it must've been inside. 'You don't suppose this may be the only time we could give up and try to find another way?' 'We've made it this far and went through worse.' 'Not that this, I've got a bad feeling about what lays inside.' But Grendel waited no longer for any more discussion, he was set on entering and dealing with whatever laid on the other side. Fauna inside, they have grown a giant forest in what seemed to be a small room, not only that the door wasn't locked, but there were ashes. Black trees, they could've burnt the entire tower to the ground with it, but seemed to have left a dead piece of the forest behind. 'Do you think someone else before us attempted to take them down?' 'I've no doubt that it may be true enough, at least for the time being stay close and make nothing too sudden. Attack only when I tell you to jump at it, right?' He nodded and started peering around, pushing ash with his pipe in small circles. Underneath the ashes, the floor was clean, way too clean for something to have been covered a long time ago. At least, the smell and the heat around the room made it seem as if this was recent. 'Careful now so you may not trip on the way.' A weird voice came from below, under the ashes, it bore as it came closer. First, there came a lump which seemed to have been the being which spoke. Clumsily, there came a slap, a swipe and a bluntly curved hit above it, which wasn't even close to being felt. 'Oh but I'm not here, in the wall, come closer, come closer!' The voice was ghastly, thin and pitched, neither of them trusted but seemed to have approached one of the walls. 'Pull the leaves, swipe the dust, let the wall be clean so I may speak with you at last.' They complied and started pulling long banks of marshes and plenty of sticks, revealing a small trapdoor which opened in the wall, a square. It was only small enough that his face would come out and seem to peer at them. Pale skin, pink lips and big eyes, it apparently knew the same language but gave no sign that they were speaking the same. Before long, it had begun. 'You shouldn't be here, I say, there's no need for you to be here any longer, flee while there's still a chance or stay and meet your doom.' 'Who are you and why are you there?' 'I'm one of the many souls who is trapped inside, I used to be a man just as you were before I was cursed in this eternity alone. Somehow

I stumbled on my way from a lousy day only to better to this dark place and find myself before the master. Trespasser he said, you will have to be punished, three hundred years you have earned your stay inside the walls, may you provide stability as you repay me for the crime.' 'And you've been trapped ever since, but that doesn't explain why are you as pale, or why.' He thought to question the fact that he looked somewhat like the two of them in appearance rather than the people they had seen around. Both of them could feel the time run short, henceforth, they came to their senses and asked. 'Do you know where the weapons are, if there's any, what about armour?' 'The master keeps nothing inside, only his sting, it is said though that those who prick their fingers in it become as shadows for a short period of time, in the eyes of the beholders.' The thought alone could've provided nothing less than an answer to their every problem. 'Is that all that he has then?' 'Seemingly hard to move inside there, he managed to nod and continue without trailing off.' The other towers with their masters were each given something to guard against the likes of men who would abuse the gifts for their own perilous thoughts and desires. 'But where exactly does he keep it hidden? Would you be so kind as to tell us while we're set to go? There shouldn't be any kind of distraction on the way and I'm afraid the two of us aren't a match for these masters.' 'Indeed you aren't, henceforth you must leave.' Stubbornness still came first beyond any sort of question, especially since there wasn't in the least a chance they would flee after hearing about such tools. 'We could do more than use them to return.' Grendel spoke in confidence, toe to toe, looking away so he wouldn't be heard while the one in the wall. 'This may be even better than expected, what do you say? Think we can handle this if we are to stick together and snick inside?"Things may be far more dangerous than we expect, I've no clue whenever or not it might be heavily guarded or by what."No, weapons and no armour to go on and we have at least a metal pipe.'Immediately Mordecai was interrupted, as in favour of that one behind.'Again, foolish thing, why do you assume you can fight with that when my masters are immortal?They can't be stopped by any conventional means, so you're much better off."What does affect them then? Tell us, we need to know before we carry on, we need that tool he has in order to return home."A dreadful fate but I'm afraid I cannot help you. I used to do the same and wonder but now look at what I've become. A pale shade of the man I used to be, trapped and enslaved, I speak to none but for a moment, I thought I could recognise the language."Then come with us.' Proposed Mordecai, looking around at the man's head, he still looked somewhat healthy despite his had claims of rightful old age.'Have you not listened that I am cursed?For me, the night has no meaning whatsoever while the day burns me from inside. I wonder during both, unable to feed myself despite carving for that thing inside of you.Look at what I've become because of my starvation.'He opened his mouth and seemed to have revealed the fact that his incisors had grown inward, while his tongue was pulled away.'My body had begun devouring itself of what is worth and in a few more years I'll be entirely drained."We see but nonetheless, we seek entry."Then the best way for you to come if to bring nothing short of an offering.'He almost yelled while something around his neck was felt, a short streak of heat which boiled as the man beheaded himself from where he stood.His head bounced on the floor while the trapdoor closed, leaving it on the floor with an expressionless gaze.'What has it done? How had it managed to end itself in this manner?"It doesn't matter, haven't you heard? Hide that pipe, will ya?"Grendle, what are you doing there? You're not seriously considering taking that with us, are you?It could be a trap, we could head in after killing one of their own and end up treated as their enemies instead."Instead of what then? We are already trespasser, with no more help, the only one who spoke something which wasn't gibberish died. Now we are to make it with the least we have, something which can prick us and make us such as the shadows.'It came to be wrapped under a piece of cloth, as for the head, it made not a sound as if it were expected. Both of them were surprised at the fact that it hadn't.'Show it to me again, I want to see something.'The creature had already turned upon the seconds it had been outside the body. No longer were they tricked to see a human but its real, much bigger bulbous head which seemed to have its long antennae protruding from its various spots.Some of them might've been the reason why they spoke in something which they understood.'Don't touch it, can't you see it's still warm?"That wriggle inside those empty pyramidal structures which served as its eyes rent it in a demanding manner, but in the least, they knew what to expect.'Do you think they'll look just as human as we are?'He asked in a whisper, seeing how there was at least a fragment of an echo going around the room. Something wasn't much to it but one couldn't be more aware of the surrounding.This entire tower seemed to be a trap for wanderers, doors which had their knobs surrounded in spike leashed and cutting leaves distracted from any attempt to explore.It was far too dangerous to look and see whenever or not they had something there.'What are doing there? Stop it.'Grendle was approaching while he held the wrapped head inside his grasp. He looked mightily surprised at the fact that he hadn't even a care of doing anything right any longer but would risk everything just to eavesdrop for a mere moment."This is far too dangerous, don't you dare.'But he had wrapped his ears around and could hear, what appeared to have been legions there, at least a couple of snores from those who had been caught in slumber. There wasn't any denying that an army reigned there, something of a thing which wasn't to be called upon a question or any further intrusion, he would be heard. One additional thing remained to be called into action, which was the fact that the creaking noises would alert others of their presence. Fairly old as it were, the creaking floor did much as to serve better than any other mechanism, especially since they weren't supposed to be here at a time of disquiet. It was still a lot of floors to climb and every door seemed to have some sort of masochistic mechanism to prevent any attempt at them. With one hard push, they were both left with the impression that they lost the element of surprise, especially at the occasional trap door opening when someone peered from inside. No sound, not any voice, they looked like the locals but seemed to have lost their voices. An ugly fellow, afraid as well, made no sudden movements as well as he invited himself out. There came others who seemed to have peered from various corners, moving freely and opening the square holes, everyone seemingly set at that head which was kept in the bag. At least they were aware now that they were aware of one another, regardless of how far they were. Could it be that they realised that as well? Without a doubt, the form was far too big to be suddenly seen as a small head, or something which could fit inside. There wasn't any way to communicate either, as they carried on the steps. 'Had there been a fight here?' Grendle seemed to have observed the bloody marks on the walls, the toes which were spread, as two pairs of feet had lost them. An image of despair came as for the eyes which had been cut with a piece of the skull which had kept them inside. From the looks of the hair which had been ripped from the scalp, the quality of which seemed to have been woollen, it was safe to say that they were right into the right place. Seriously close to the top, each corner had a pair of those things, who were awake and stared at both of them. The main door was closed, and it was obvious where their master was. For now, they had been docile and acted as if nothing was about to happen. They, too, looked rather human, just like them for someone who didn't belong in the place. 'He's waiting for you.' They said with a sneer, almost in a perfect unison which dragged at their throngs and pulled at them. Something had been lost, they felt the place being taken apart. With a sudden turn at the door, both of them had come to the realisation that this wasn't a door to be rubbed against. The knob had fallen off and from behind the closed gate-like thing came a big mandible which pulled them both in. There was something of a cutaneous feel which spread everywhere across their sight. Maybe the ink which had spilt in the pools of water, or the stone which seemed to have been encountered here for the first time. But the being they had in their sight was nothing less of an abomination, of which true form could be fairly seen. It dwindles and handled changing its form as worse as it might, pulling the mass and pushing it behind that crawling spine. From each end having come a pair of long teeth which had been horned, but they were pulled inside the body. Those giant bulbous eyes and the little hairs revealed much of it, other than what it had desired. Could it be that they had been lied and pulled into a trap? Looking behind revealed that there wasn't any exit any longer. The only way to get out was to climb above through the hole from which the gloom came. It said nothing and went behind, on a throne of skulls and bones from its past victims. Those were accompanied by those of other creatures, much bigger, far taller, body structures which didn't belong to human-kind. One metal plate laid ready as if they had brought a feast and they were expected. But there was another second in which they took a great look at what had laid in front of them. Such a thing seemed to have brought only misery on sight. It was those of which came out of his mouth, for it had been a soft incisor which pulled them inside, not a hand or arms. Every time it moves, some serious deformation came with the hand, but as he waited, this was the time. Patience started coming apart as it had become less of a problem waiting. He had tried looking around and seeming come up with a plan but they were both mesmerised by the ever-darkening of their sight. Somehow their minds had failed to notice the fact that this creature, this being was cursed to be tied to this tower, changing its appearance for its watcher. This might explain the trapdoors and how there might be as many. 'Wait no longer, give to me what I have waited for.' All of the sudden, everything looked normal, the man who stood in front of them seemed to have had a bowl of hot water near to him and a small stove. There was a skinning knife no doubt, but this was it. He seemed to have perched his lips with the expectation of what was to come. That desire would be hard to compete with, especially since it was something which rulers would desire. But that dreadful thing came on his face once the head reached the small plate. His eyes bobbed as he threw the water and whatever else he had. For a moment they forgot where they were and saw the damned creature come and surround the plate with that small head on it. It almost looked as if they had been twins, both cursed to be as far apart, one trapped inside the tower and the other in the last room where one would come. 'Psh, look, it must be there.' Like a small needle or a metal prick, long enough to come out of one of the skulls in the throne, there seemed to have come to a small glimmer out of it. The fire made it seem like it was made of pure silver, filled with radiance. It wasn't hard as to go around, but to see the behind and that tube which appeared to pulsate something in the tower appeared to have frightened even them. Such a thing that came at last to pass, this was the perfect opportunity for someone to make a move and take the chance. 'Just take it, I'll deal with it.' On such a sudden note, he pulled the pipe from under his clothes and got into position. Right above the point where the tower got fed, he pushed the pipe inside and slammed until the tube was ripped entirely apart. A rippling effect came, which shook the entire room and made it tilt to one side, almost making it seem as if it were to fall entirely from the top of the damn cylinder upon which it laid. 'What have the two of you done? You deserted creatures who come into my lair, you've taken the only thing I was fond of and turned it into ash.' He held pieces of the head which had remained in their entirety, he seemed to have both rage and dissatisfaction with everything around. Maddening sounds came as soon as they realised what was happening with the tower, as they both shouted. 'Get to the bridge.' And looked at one another, as the so-called master stood at the entrance unnerved. There'd be less of a way to deal with him than with that, as he was aware that they would have to get through if they wanted to escape with their lives. 'Do you want to perish with us then, just like your friend? We can both escape and be free and resolve our differences once we're safe.' 'Silence you beings of anguish, you've come to insult me as well as you've stolen something of value from me, do not think this trick will work as easily on me as you seem to think. I could have both of you trapped in here and dealt with as soon as I can, but let my mourning not distract you as the stones threaten to fall on your heads.' One tentacle seemed to have wrapped itself along the what remained of the head, he knew that there wasn't much to be done about it. 'Should we give it a shot then?' They both nodded and seemed to have pricked their fingers, seemingly seeing that no mark was left there and not a single droplet of blood came into being. Both of them no longer seemed to have been into the room, but as it happened they were not seen as long as they stood near objects which had shadows about them. 'I can still smell you and I know, you cannot escape this place without getting through to me, do you hear?' The shouting got louder and louder to a point before it suddenly started being dismissed by the distance. He couldn't have protected himself well from the falling rocks but in this, he had been wrong. It was half-way through that they had walked through the wall of shadows, without realising what was going on. Either of them could've emerged at different spots if it weren't for the fact that they were joined together, hand in hand like some sort of cut, both pricked and cut.'Do you hear that?'With a sudden burst of light, they could both see one another well, as opposed to being transparent, as it had happened to have punctured through the bottom half of the other tower.'It had fallen, quickly, let's head inside.'Through which they seemed to have entered the sanctuary which had been prided with by the ones who dwelled inside.For once they had carpets, well made, of red with various shapes overthrown by men who were set in fights.Walls of different hues and plenty of tables with had vases and other ornaments. Compared to the previous tower, this one seemed to be one of worth and value.'We should head towards.'And attack, there had been an attack!'Yelled a man as he arrived, though his clothing was strange, they had both been aware enough that it wasn't a human but something which dared look like one.Could it be that he was aware as well that they didn't belong?'What happened here? Why is there a hole there?'"There's been an attack as you have said, they've dropped one of the towers already.'With a sudden burst, the information was far too much to be taken in. He wouldn't have been able to say a thing if it weren't for the fact that others had to know.'Follow me, we shall inform the one.'Everything was going almost well, as they had taken what they wanted.'We could return already, you were lucky enough to be right as we have the means to return home.'"Not yet, Mordecai, there might be a way to get something even better and increase our chances of escape."Can you at least show it to me again?'But there was nought, as it had seemed, the prick had only but a use, while Mordecai attempted to prick his finger, nothing came to it.'Useless, it's been drained.'From under their noses, and under their glance, the metal pin started crackling and cackling as it twisted and became as dry as the waterless organic matter before disintegrating under their eyes.'We've been tricked into believing this.'From the sounds of which, something was trying to drag itself closer to the hole.'Let's make our way before it comes here to start trouble.'Mad at the prospect, they thought to have avoided everything, but instead, they followed through the twist of stairs. Under their own gaze, they saw that they have not one but various libraries and men who were actively learning, those who were sharpening and making their craft, everyone who worked and looked disturbed in the slight.'Well, wait in here, sit on a chair if you like, I shall inform him of your presence.'He had become extremely calm, that servant of his, with his moustache and finely dressed body. This wasn't any ordinary use of any of their time, as it started shaking, quite demanding.It painted both but they looked away, as a shout had come, with a pool of blood becoming apparent from under the door.Both Mordecai and Grendel suddenly raised themselves and stepped back, seeing how it was suddenly become some amorphous mass of skin and bones, forming into some sort of creature that headed below.'They're not like us, don't get tricked for a moment that they're the same, it could be for the worse.'That thing might've been a man once if it weren't the facts of what it had become.'We're to explain and try to find another, that at least, could be for the best."Are you sure about it? Grendle, I've come to think we've overextended, it's become far too dangerous. Even these tools of there seem to be far too fragile for any other use, and I don't think we can get through with it any longer."You should've said that when we were inside, now it is too late. We're both tired and worn out, the least of which we need remains as a miracle.In case you haven't noticed, this isn't any place for that.'With a swoon, the door opened and the servant came, there wasn't any blood in there any longer.'The master will see you shortly, just wait.'Both nodded as he just left, almost in a sort of flight. Outside, things were worse, a fear came from the distance once the smoke arises, most could see the broken tower from the distance and thought of the fear which accompanied it. Nothing good could spring from that as the smoke wasn't of fire but of a great ghastly being which had died in there. In exchange for its death, the toxicity bore its way back into the atmosphere, making life worse for everyone who was alive. Worse than that, there came a creature as abhorrently dreadful to be peered upon as its might could wager its chances against others. It was a malformation which had been controlled, past any mutation, one with limbs that didn't belong to any earthly creature, giant human hands and the torsos which were hardly inverted. Those of which barely resembled human parts have twisted their colour and texture of their pores to reflect the malnutrition it had suffered for the years it was locked inside. There was little which was given when the children and the ma'am were there, as they were thin as well as there wasn't much to them other than a taste. In life, neither of the crewmembers who were now inside thought of tasting human flesh before, never would they kill another, even in the most extreme case. But those devils from the road looked rather plump, now that they had been driven away from the fields and into the nearest formation of bushes, they had to deal with its devouring might. Pulled by the limbs inside, those spikes which came from everywhere around seemed to produce something of a boiling blood. It was inserted deep inside the small creature, just so it would crisp the skin. That was the first to come, as for the small entry which was covered still reflected the sucker. It pulled as much of the colour as it would, carrying a legacy which shouldn't be. Now it was its time to return, no more mourning, just this thing. A pair of mouths came from under the orifice which had the skin stretched outwardly, through which it fed itself as a mother would feel its children. No payment would be enough for that, he was aware, nothing out there, any longer. Villagers who came on roads no longer went through there, the beasts and the small creatures, driven off seemed to have done the same. It wasn't a question whenever or not they would unite against this threat. This was a problem of waiting for it to return, as it had seen what had happened, upon the arrival of which, the block of square-like mass it was, pushed through the tower on which its twin had fallen and crushed the door along the wall so it would fit through. Disturbed by the noise and problem, those who attended the lobby already had become alert. The creature who had entered their home was nothing they had ever seen, no witness to bear a grudge against the malevolence it displayed. Openings almost erupted as it felt the pores from their insides, and could almost want and need for that colour, as his master once had. Little understanding remained why this practice was ended but a slam took away whatever cognition could be created in the mind which ruled over that tormented body. They would flee, they would see that there's no hope. 'You may enter.' A voice came and appeared to have brought pity in the atmosphere, as it waited for the two men to head inside. Worse than that, there came the time for that soulless husk to head inside, as those giant eyes displayed themselves to have been cracked, and whatever was inside of it faded, there was still the mindless body. The rubble had failed to take away the likes of the master, of whom rotten carcass still could walk and attack such as a rabid force would do. It escaped that tower, which was slowly being taken apart, piece by piece, little by little for any kind of worth. 'Who is that came before me, in a time of destruction, if not for the destroyers.' He was not even close to what they had expected, not even bothering to hide the true form it had. A simpleton might've been set to flight, but the two of them were prepared to be showed against any kind of creature out there, regardless of what it looked like. That being who was half solid and half transparent seemed to have been through enough processed of self-satisfaction as they could see the remains which were. From under the open torso, a mass of gelatine covered the rest of the room behind it, while there was only a little of the hairy ape-like torso and the contorted heavy head above. Tubes from which prevented a full conversion into that thing, which would've rendered it below intelligent, if that might've been called in play. Worse than that, was the fact that such a creature ruled over what appeared to have been a peaceful community, who brought their depravities and hid them at the top of the tower. It seemed to wait and wager, to cover any need for danger, as it appeared to judge them where they stood. Something told them both that they weren't supposed to look and see and be able to tell what was going on. Obviously, from the way both of them shook as they glanced around at the creature and its strange manners, there wasn't even a way either would attempt to start the conversation. 'You know, do you not?' That voice was deep and strong, followed by an echo, at last, the likes of which, in-human, as if weren't enough that it came through and seemed to push through various channels. I brought them both closer to wanting to be on their knees, their wills being the only measure of protection which prevented them from giving in. 'We've come because we're in need of help.' And you brought trouble, have you not? 'We have, and for that, we cannot think that there's another way, but we were taken away and placed in here, entrapped without a way to return. This is why we came here, seeking for any kind of help.' Then you have come into the wrong place, you shallow creatures shouldn't have dared to bring me such an insult proposal without anything for which to trade. Others came and passed them, bloody with their deserted suits and missing fingernails. It was always pleasant to see a nice embroidered shirt ruined, but not this came as for the worse when the news arrived. 'We're being invaded not by one but two dreadful beings that seem to be mindlessly driven by rage.' What has happened to the others? Our defenders, brothers, those who were at the forge? Was there even a fight or a way in which they attempted to fight? Without even a pause, as he had come to bring the news, he confirmed that there had been no survivors. Lock the gates. But that had already been done, in the absence of mind, it bore. Whatever happened down there, or how they'd get through, at last, wouldn't matter as long as they were as far away when it happened. Both of them men quickly backed once the force came behind the walls and forced them to shatter. They'll try getting through, what are we to do? 'We'll wait and if they come any closer, I'll make sure they'll never return. No one will mourn for them, as they should know, I cannot be divided, I cannot perish.' But those sounds weren't for what was going on, as for their fight went one and that dreadful being finally pushed the smaller creature through the gates defeated. A soulless husk which had become nothing less of an extension of its body that seemed to move, connected from behind. From the looks on both men, they were aware of what stood at the command, none other than that stretched skin, which had once belonged to a man. Is this one of yours, I presume? You've never been the strongest, after all, just a poor imitation of your brothers and their towers. It spoke almost as if he knew he'd be heard by the body. Not that there was any kind of rush to do things the right way, as if that would matter in the least. Soon they would all join the feast, as the mass seemed to have shifted further, while the torso and the head were set behind. In no way would he leave himself exposed to those who came to bring him to harm, to rip away what was left of his arm and the rest of the mind. Aren't you going to deal with it now? 'Why should I? Can't you see that it's nothing but a mindless being? Even in the most primal form, that flesh seemed to have killed whatever intelligence the previous host had, leaving nothing but a poor recognition and nothing to say for itself.' It seemed that for a sudden moment the attention turned to the closest one, who was caught trying to flee, or maybe to force an attack. With a failed attempt to bite and infect, it saw the various marks of others left there, everywhere across the body. There had been others, with much bigger sets of teeth who had failed and let it live, so why should he be any different than any single one of them? Without a chance, he failed to retreat, being taken by the scruff of the neck by a longer muzzle and fleshed way in pieces while the insides seemed to have been dissolved. From their side, both could see that it happened in mere seconds, without a chance to correct this problem either. They were there, all alone since this creature seemed to have retreated. It would've been hard now for it to turn, especially since it would get stuck in that ooze. 'Must we try something for this?' 'I do not think there is, haven't you heard at all? It got rid of everyone who laid in the tower.' 'It was the two of them.' 'Mordecai, this isn't the time to argue in the least. We need to approach.' And they moved to the side, closer to the wall as it carefully attempted to do as well. Both were at opposite ends, as the mere size of the creature almost made it fill a corner. It didn't even compete with the other but in a way, there seemed to be an impartial desire to approach. Danger arose once both of them realised that the sudden shift of mass also meant that it was pushing itself closer to the other side of the room. The plan had been, most likely to absorb the brute and break it down to piece but the shriek stopped it before it could move an inch closer. They stared and dared not a sudden move, not to mention that they were on the side where the wall had been crushed and that there was enough of a time to get through. Nothing sudden, don't give it the wrong impression, as it might come for a straight leap. He desperately wanted to speak but there wasn't enough confidence that the creature wouldn't just leap from the other side of the room and attempt to strike at them with all its might. Something was bound to do happen nonetheless, those sounds of objects breaking, the dead who had fled from the other tower, they might draw attention towards them. He could only look at his fellow in danger and try not to seem distraught, making eye contact with a blind beast at all times, seeming caught at a draw. 'Will you help us, please?' 'We seem to have no hope to face this creature here, in this tight place, and you're seemingly a force of nature which cannot be destroyed, oh master of your own tower.' He didn't answer, but laid back, as it seemed that neither trickery nor flattery would do anything to move the fiend, the villain, the creature who threatened them at last. With this type of being there wasn't any certainty what could happen if they were to run through and pay little to no attention to the details which laid around. Either of them could be caught and the abomination just appeared to be waiting. Finally one of them seemed to have displayed a sign that he had guts. 'We should at least remain as close as we can to the ooze, as you may see, there's no way in its right mind it would approach.' 'It's dangerous, to remain here, just a slip and I doubt there'd be a way out of here.' 'We've got to try something, just look around the place and around the room, the ceiling and everything around. They're shaking, we barely have enough time to escape before it all shatters to dust and us with it.' 'It was getting dangerously close to home now, especially since he wasn't Grendel wasn't exaggerating in the least, something was about to come and whenever one of the towers fell and pushed the other, they had to escape.' 'There was a bridge, remember, perhaps four of them which had been connected, that should be our way through, as much as I can see a way out before everything falls.' 'But how are we to get there now? Can't you see that we're surrounded, do you not see how it approaches?' 'Compared to it, they were small, like some kind of roaches, trying to scurry in-between the cracks, attempting to scape at a cost which wasn't theirs to take. Both of which looked mightily surprised to have been found there in a place which wasn't needed to be looked upon. And for once, it seemed as if the slime moved as well, with its reddish glow and seemingly bloody concoction inside, turning hairy from the outside and hardening while keeping itself still mobile.' 'Do not worry any longer for I have decided that all of you are to be crushed.' With a sudden threatening push, the dead master was pushed inside and broadened a strike which spilt some of the putrid blood which reigned hidden in the ooze. It had been hidden no longer, for this seemed to have not been known. The two creatures fought one another, bite, slow and some of the alloy slipping on the floor, the screams of which revealed the many men who had been inside, those of which were still suffering to be brought back to life. In their wake, there seemed to be some kind of a dreadful awakening of the sorts inside. For the slime had raised itself to the top of the ceiling and pushed itself atop to dwarf the small creature, who seemed still distraught. That piece of skin seemed to slowly move as it was to be crushed without the little of remorse, for a being such as himself, one of which was filled with taint. Such it was, as the alloy entered the slim, once half of the body which was still struggling seemed to have entered it, the two of them found a way to get through out of the room. Both creatures made violent noises of struggle as for their fight had only begun. 'We need to find the bridge before they crush the top of the tower. I don't think it can sustain as much as a fight between the two of them.' As it seemed right, the two of which pounced and sneered, filling each other with dread and peering at the substances which didn't combine. One agent of coagulation seemed to have happened on the floor as the boiling blood and the alloy drooled upon one another, forming small bubbles in their wake and hardening as well. This grip couldn't be broken, and once it understood, once the slime had been thrown against the body like some sort of thin-like net, there was little to no other option but to go ahead and attempt ahead of the attack, like the prey it had meant to be. One of the mandibles suddenly made a cut on its own body, severing some of the faces to reveal a body which was dripping. It made them both desire to be driven away from one another, but as it came, the abomination, open from the chest to bottom charged towards the slime. There'd be no stopping to the pain, the suffering as the front of the slime had hardened and boiled inside, making it feel pain for the first time, releasing the darkest of the shrieks which had been heard by human ears. 'This has to be it, I don't think there's any other way we can take.' Both had descended through at least two floors and managed to notice that there had been some sort of slaughter, most objects of worth being destroyed. At least they found it, opening the door, it was barely hanging and they could see that this tower was tilted as well. Both of them were more than aware of the fact that the bridge had just as much of a chance to fall on them like any other piece of ceiling or structure at large. 'It's now or we may not get a second chance.' Then lead the way Grendel, I'm sure you know the best. They went on and heard the mumbles, something inside seemed to shatter. First, there were the bones inside, there wasn't any wonder that, once there came the boil and the breaking of the alloy, the abomination had suffered just as much, if not some more. That ooze had already separated itself from the infection and pushed it back through the guts. While the main part of the master's body had retreated in an air bubble inside the mass of slime, there seemed to have been something which projected itself upon the piece of skin. Somehow the alloy had gotten through the system and permanently tied it to the rest of the body. A need for release came as they fell, one floor upon the other, breaking the stairs, having nothing other but the spine cushion the fall once gravity came into effect. It didn't suffer but something broke inside, clearly having lost the fight, it felt around, through smell and sound, particles guiding its hatred towards the bridge upon which there was its sight. The two of them had attempted far too much to have been set towards, and it was time. But he was denied, being pulled above and dragged as it seemed that the ooze somehow managed to adapt and break the piece of it which had been hardened apart. Not only that but there seemed to have been some sort of dismissal of sorts, worse than it as it had seemed. It cut through the skin and managed to break one limb, devouring a piece at the time as to no repeat the same mistake, to not be closer to coagulation. As they bailed, and it turned again, it seemed that the other tower would push the latter into the ground, gravity paying a great role into his final dismissal of life. 'We've made it look over there. Just a few moments and I think it would've caught us there.' 'Help me with this then, we need to untie the knots somehow.' 'Leave them, can't you see it's hurt and on its knees? There's no way he'd made it through Grendel, just let it be the way it is.' 'I won't take any chances and I'm done. Next time you're about to ask me something just shut it and let me do my thing.' he went on with a piece of glass there was on the side, as convenient as that seemed, it turned out as being useful. A cutting motion came at last, with no virtue to hold, it would be a feeble thing to cut it with no threat on. Seemingly there came the first piece of the bridge off, which fell immediately to one side. There'd be no chance to make up for another, as it seemed to him that he couldn't predict the outcome, which had snapped the bridge by sheer force. His piece of glass had fallen off as he was startled. 'Head inside, now!' As he yelled, both of them dismissed the fact that there'd be no second chance to be alive. One repercussion of which, the dust and the woods were ruined once both towers collapsed, the wave underneath the ground even made the other towers shake in their wake. Such it was that the breaking had taken them apart, leaving them aware that there'd be nothing left. 'Just the two of these, I seem to think we're cursed in here.' But Mordecai was silent, looking for a way to get through. Strangely this place had some sort of elevator inside, raised up or down with the help of chains. 'Help me see if this works, this may save us a lot of trouble if we can make it work.' Everything inside the room seemed normal, no one was rushed nor had anyone come distraught by the fact that two of the towers had been taken down. More importantly was that there had come one who seemed not to care, walking with a stick along the stairs. He paid little attention and looked like nothing more than a villager. Not the dark one who bore secrets or who planned on destruction, but the honest man whom Mordecai appeared to dislike. The scrutiny would've been applied if it weren't for the fact that he was tired. Everything was fairly peaceful and rather silent and both of them decided that instead of going by elevator, to climb the stairs and follow, the others. One glance through the opening between the stairs revealed that there were others who went through, having brought things as well. Not everyone but certainly there were plenty of them to follow. Something made the place smell like an empty husk filled with corruption. Neither of them thought much and said as little, when it came what had to be done, there was little to no repercussion to cutting through the line. 'I'm terribly sorry.' Said Grendel after bumping against an older man, the face of which turned and there could be seen the genuine sadness in them. Something had brought all of those people together, at the top of which seemed to have been the place which dragged them all like misguided leeches. Pale but still with their genuine colour, they seemed to have brought some tribute. Mordecai could think of nothing else but the fact that someone had come and taken the opportunity to change every carpet and every piece in a dull dark grey. Perhaps too much time was on their mind, for some of the original colour on the walls could be seen in corners as solid colours, bright as they came. No, it disappeared, perhaps that might've been nothing but some illusion spawned by his weeping mind. It had to become blockage he had observed around, there was no other explanation which could've made sense in this place. Plates were turned while the misery had faded away, dark as they were, roots had grown in them. Merely a distraction, Mordecai thought, from the real problem which laid at hand, if they were truly approaching what seemed to be a funeral of the sort, it would truly be some kind of bad timing with what happened around. 'Should we truly go and disturb whatever they're doing here? We might be intruding on them, for that, I'm sure there could be some sort of unspoken punishment if you understand."Nonsense, just follow and pretend, here.'He had grabbed a pair of robes which laid around, they seemed to have been placed everywhere in sight for people to take and do with them what must be done. There were more people than either of them had expected, which wasn't as bad of a thing now. No one spared the time to turn or look around, to greet or meet with the two covered strangers.They not only disturbed but also laid there, unknown, watching as they peered through the snow. It was a truly cold corner in which it stood, generating enough to have surrounded its pieces of meat with deep frost shards of ice.Whatever had happened in here, it had one final laugh at last, against whoever tried to attack it. Not only that, but the people who were the closest seemed to suffer most.Nonetheless, as they both stood there, Grendle appeared to have had the time to remember, for the first time in a while they could both rest.'What's that you're holding? Oh, I remember you taking it.'In his hand laid the last thing he had touched inside the prison, just somewhat before he had realised that things were going for the worse.'We haven't spoken about them yet, but I can say in the least that at least that won't let me forget about the three of them down there.'It's over, we won't be followed any longer by it, most likely it seems as if both of them had been taken out by the sudden fall of their tower."That won't change what I saw, the shadows and what seemed to have been the woman being chewed."Perhaps the children have managed to hide themselves as they showed up, there's no way to think otherwise."But for how long will they wait there afraid? How will they not starve or die of thirst in the dark?We don't know if all of them had left the place like the abomination had. Any of them could turn rabid, surely you must know that there's a limit to all."You should have never grabbed that card, I'd say, this is all your fault."Mine? For trying to remember those with which we were stuck?"It had been temporary and you know it, this isn't either one of our faults and remember that, there's something else down there dragging things down, those structures that appear from thin air.The explosives weren't at fault for dragging it down the first time we have been caught."And why haven't you told me that, why have you waited for so long to disclose that information, Mordecai?"I was afraid, there were things down there which made me think of ill thoughts and nothing else could frighten me rather than reminding myself of that dreadful thing and its murmur of a song.'It had taken them a while but both of them felt guilty about what happened. Whenever or not the children had been dragged into the bottom of the abyss was unknown. Instead, what was clear to them was the fact that there were those people who had been released, and two lives which missed. One small card remained in Grendel's pocket, which changed little to nothing now.'It's peaceful you know? Looking at the cold and at the snow?This might be a funeral but it kind of reminds me how it all started, doesn't it?'In a way, he felt the same but chose instead to walk away."Are you coming? I think we've disturbed them with our presence for far too long.'Grendel turned to see that everyone had apparently shifted their attention towards them as well as to their heated conversation. There was no bother as he shrugged and followed.'Listen, don't rush into the lion's den yet, we might have a thing here, for as long as that creature's frozen and no longer living, these people won't hurt us."They might if we were to stay there and keep disturbing their funeral, at least that's what I was able to tell from around their looks."We're in this together, aren't we? In the least, we could just stay around there for a moment, even if it may get cold.If I'm not wrong they even brought food for their celebration."You're a damned liar Grendle, a good one at that. I still can't believe after so much time I'm still listening to you."Just one final glance, it's all I'm asking.'The door opened and from inside there was difficulty in closing it. Both of them looked shocked at the fact that there seemed to be a stretch of cold and glass-like ice, the view which would've been in the farthest spot in the north. Not only was snow falling during a storm, but it was obvious that there had been other structures and buildings, small objects completely covered by the weather. He took a few steps in, seeing how there'd be no closing of the door and started following a trail. It was hard to see, even without the current conditions, but he was desperately trying to rub himself as hard as he could. After a while of walking, he had turned upon hearing his voice being shouted at him. 'Grendle, come back, it's too cold out there, there's nothing but a tomb waiting in the cold!' It was hard to look behind and notice anything past the sound of the harsh wind and while this was dangerous, especially letting him go farther away, someone had to keep the door open. Someone had to make sure, especially since he was out of sight, lost out there, going through until he found the walls, frozen as they were, still there. By this fact a long, he judged that it was the same room, without a doubt in some sort of transition and lack of vigour, he returned and fell to his knees. Immediately, the cold door was slammed closed and it seemed as if it was gone once Mordecai peered through the peeping hole. If the sounds weren't as obvious yet, they were both aware of what was going on the other side. 'Was it worth it? Heading out there by yourself?' 'There was a limit, I could feel the walls of the room around me, I'm sure I felt them.' 'We should leave, this isn't helping us as much as coming here hadn't. There was no tools, nor anything which could help us, so I'm afraid we might've come there unprepared and empty-handed.' 'Not yet we haven't, I'm still convinced there's something in here which may help, we just need to get it, as well as some warm clothes while we're heading through that vile snow storm which waits for us.' It kicked in fast, but he remembered, surprisingly so, even for him. To look upon this, they went on the stairs, no danger yet, no man turning into any creature out there. And the last bridge laid unguarded, and this time, as opposed to all, it seemed to be tied by chains and reinforced. There'd be no way to cut this without a blowtorch or something far much sharper. Looking back at it, while going on, the two towers had laid in a total ruin, as their fall seemed to have had no place where it hadn't reached. Yet, despite that, there wasn't any doubt that the ooze had managed to survive, despite the fact that neither of them had spoken of it. Nevertheless, what they kept in mind was what they needed and what they'd get. Through the last tower, the door filled them with misery, even from the start. An emblem laid against it, a symbol of a laughing skull, from which there came elbow-like tubes that dragged themselves right into the frame it bore. One metal ring seemed to have been set as well, all of which was formal, dread instead of common fear. They both seemed to have not even the decency to keep to themselves. As they grabbed the heavy ring and pulled, it was much harder than it had seemed, all of the sudden, there came the echo as well as the vibration. Withing a minute of expectation, the door opened and revealed on a pale face which vanished from sight. It had no body and disappeared. For the starters, they became rightfully suspicious of what was to happen inside of the place. Why was it that they didn't know who might've been the ones that came? They seemed familiar, even bore some faces they recognised, the man as well as the woman who died previously in their encounter. Without the children present, it was harsh to put the finger on what exactly was wrong. Especially since they looked to have been placed on different bodies. 'Greetings, and who exactly has come to greet us in this fine a day?' 'Are you travellers from far-away? You don't seem local.' 'Again with those voices and the accents which tricked the mind into believing they spoke it. One wouldn't be able to think otherwise if he had known.' 'Have you come, prepared for the coming? Do you suppose we'll let you get through to him one way or another?' 'We only wish to get home, that would be all, but the place through which we came is guarded."Quite unfortunate, but tell us, would you spend the night?"It was preposterous to call upon that, especially with the sun still on the sky. But it wasn't there, that was certain, darkness had dampened the air, even the sight.How long had they spent there near the door saying nothing? Neither of them could tell if it was another illusion or whenever or not it was another trick.'Would that earn us the right to talk to him then?'Only if he's pleased of his company, you'd have to be prepared.'Both of them shared a dreadful laugh between one another, moving their clearly outlandish eyes from one point to another. It might've been that their face had been cut deep, but that couldn't have happened.Not only that but the man he had killed changed, he hadn't been a human being by the time his life was taken.'We'll follow and take our chances if it means we'll meet him.'"Very well, please try to keep us.'Before anything else might be done, Grendle approached him and scowled at this taken chance.'Don't look at me that way, you know that we were ready to accept whatever came with it. We have to try this before returning since we got nothing on us, nothing which could help us fight or snuck past them.'"We could've taken any other of those halls, there had been choices."And we chose this, we can't change the past but we can make sure there's a way to get there safely. After all now, after so much time, someone who's both friendly and understands what we're saying seems to help us."It didn't go any better the last time someone tried doing it and it will end up just as much of a mess before the night is over.'The two hosts, if that's what they could be called peered into one of the holes which opened from the wall. Someone spoke in that broken dialect again with the least of shame which could've come.Some announcement of the kind, the least of which seemed to be close to their mind, a recent event which may change some things. At least the trap door seemed to have closed when they returned and offered.'We're to lead you to your room when you'll be fed and spend the night. Does that sound well enough?'It seemed to ask innocently at least, with the least of shame when it came, to the destruction and fear again. Reluctantly, the acceptance came, and there wasn't any moment which seemed to have been wasted.Looking around the room they were set in made them both realise that there'd be some time for adjustment, at least since the way it looked made them both uncomfortable.Not in the least as sleeping outside, but what was on the ceiling, caught in chains, being the bones, the trophy of a great winged beast there, which encompasses a piece of the ceiling. Worse than that was that fact that its teeth seemed to have been long in front, sharp even, and through the blackness of the eyes, there was almost a deep red popping from time to time.'We hope you'll enjoy your stay for the night. Servants are bound to come and bring you everything you're in need of.'With that kind of a smile, left behind, it was obvious that they both hid something. As a matter of fact, his fellow had been strangely silent ever since they met.By the time they were given the privacy, Moredcai approached.'Is it me, or has he not spoken a word ever since we arrived here?'Grendle was apparently resting in bed, barely paying any sort of attention on the man. At least he was aware of the fact that there'd be ears everywhere around.One even popped in and took a glance, while another one peered from around the floor. There was no end from where these moles came, worse being the fact that they were somewhat human-looking, or at least some kind of twist which made itself look that way.'He might've been silent, I can't remember whenever or not he spoke."Even when that thing in the wall came out to speak to them? I'm not trying to make us both more paranoid, it's obvious that he was hiding something from us."Forget it, we're here and.'The doors opened and bore a small wooden table around. It was wide enough to fit all kinds of dishes of meats, small rodents, heads and well and stuffed fruits, potatoes, and the drinks they had become accustomed to. Perhaps the food wasn't bad, not as they thought, but wonder came whenever or not they were only fed for some kind of reason. It's why they waited until the servants left, with their tiny hands and thin bodies. "Those poor creatures had been starved as well, have you seen the way they looked at the food but dared not look?" "I know, it kind of makes me sad seeing them like that, but are they getting any worse than those who are trapped inside the towers? Most of those prisoners who were in the previous ones are most likely dead, to begin with." "They're not starved Mordecai, something's keeping them alive but not in this manner." "How would you know? You've never seen them from the waist down, you haven't even seen anything below a neck. They could be just as in a bad condition or even worse." He shut his mouth and started eating, parched over the fact that it had been a while, for a real meal like this to take it into account. Looking around the table, they even brought some water for them to wash their hands when they were ready and a specially designed bell for when they were done. All expenses, most likely taken care of, and for some time everything was right. While eating, though, he couldn't help it but look at it a different way. "What's your plan then, when we stop eating and everything is said and done? We'll blow out the candles and then what? They're dangerous when they're alive, you should've learned this by now. Even when one of them is dead, we're at risk of being trapped in one of their cold traps and I doubt that's the least of our problems right now." "Grendle, just trust me on this, you'll see, I know what I'm doing, just finish what you're having and I'll explain." After that and the washing, the return of the servants revealed eyes in the dark. Perhaps rats, small, despite the place being clean, they bore their gaze beyond the far edges of the bottom and seemed to give a special kind of attention to the agony which could be felt around. They couldn't be there, but neither could the bats, even though their forms could be seen through the dark, sitting on the ceiling, up-side-down, peering at them while they prepared. "I have taken the liberty to leave you some kind of clothes in the drawers, you'll find that they are set for your size." It just happened for them to be gone, with the plate and all, followed by the appearance of their host, who laid in the middle of the room. He had appeared there, while the others were gone, and left slowly with barely any sign. With the creaking door closing, there had been a key there, just in case they had desired some kind of privacy, which was well needed for a reason alone. "Do you suppose he'll have a way to get through even with that?" "Have you seen him enter, to begin with? Better set a chain against the door and make sure we'll hear him if he decides to come." A repugnant thought had come at last, at the time of which he was more than aware that it'd be a rough night, especially if there were some who'd dare stalk them through the trap doors. Dreams in which they fell from above came running through their heads came running as fast as they could think about. They shared much, especially after being so close to one another and ready to take any chance, at least if it meant living for another day. Such depths as they encountered below couldn't help but reshape their entire perception as they came to the conclusion, they were dreaming no longer. Suddenly, they have descended, through the hidden path of the tower, right into the ground, walking in a line with others, tiredly as they made their way towards the very bottom of the world. What waited there for them was a devouring emptiness which seemed to take an unfathomable shape. Most likely, the other for ends were leading towards the top of their towers, but it was likely that they would never get the chance to be used again, at least not in this lifetime of theirs, where they've been caught into this death trap. No one blinked and none were shunned into coming any closer to the point at which they ran out of ideas and would turn around. Something made them feel that way and turn towards a life of self-destruction. Flashes of sight made it look like its true form, a brooding thing which ran for as long as the sight met with the end of all. Small spores were floating, now they have become much bigger and even consciously floated in the directions they desired rather than be forced by the wind. Some flew in clusters forming bigger spores only to be caught by the nets of an invisible form which prevent it to move to take any sort of action as long as it meant they'd spread. It was highly unnecessary to say a thing between those strangers, but it certainly meant that they have been caught somewhere during the night, at unawares. This changed a lot, as they could call upon their very own senses and the obvious, they both turned around. Rather than to go straight into the trap, they saw one another, at different points in the line, attempting to shout one another's names, finally getting through. The stairs weren't wide enough for two at a time, but those who seemed to follow the stream desired to end up there either way. The greatest disturbance caused by them came, as more and more men fell from both sides, pushing in every direction rather than to give up and accept that there was no reason to act in this manner. Far more than could be said, there'd be problems with what waited above, through the horde, through which they went. One shout from below came, a dreadful cheerless laughter which was mad. The man hadn't known what to say or how to act. But in that silence everyone suddenly turned to watch the one scream and try to get away, only to end up being in more agony that he had expected. 'What have I done? He didn't want to die down there either.' Mordecai, let's go, the entrance is getting closer to being locked. We'll have no other choice if we're caught inside. He looked around only to realise that it was beyond any desire to be caught in there, a place as dark and shallow. While he was ignoring what he's done, there was a murmur, of something much bigger coming around, making the dark spores from above the ceiling shake in fear. 'Do you wish to find what's that? Or will you live another day?' 'I'm coming to Grendle, don't you dare abandon me here.' His lids were open, he came right through, ignoring those who screamed, at last, getting himself a chance to remain alive. It was all that mattered to him, at least before the small door closed, in an utmost organic way which seemed to have had a lasting effect from that point on. He'd fear it otherwise if it weren't for him to be there. That was a close one. 'I'm afraid that not only it isn't over that that we may be trapped in here, the two of us, all alone.' 'You couldn't mean, this can't be happening.' 'It's the last tower, so it seems, and there's nothing for us left but the darkness and the lack of knowledge of how to open the door.' 'But we're blind, it's unfair, how can you be so happy about all of this?' Had the man truly lost his mind? Mordecai only wondered after hearing that dreadful laugh echo, only realising after a leap that he was lost, far beyond saving. In a corner, through no light, the man stood alone, swearing he could see a blue light emanating from the card. He'd save them now that the light was being restored, the children would be the first to be taken out of the ship, while Mordecai waited outside for them. That would guide him past any sort of doubt as well and no one will question him again. While Mordecai ran and slammed his fist, there was no way to know to how open those trapdoors. The only whispers came from far away and there was nothing which was said, nothing which made any sense whatsoever. He shouted for hours, yet his walk was slowed, he wasn't even thin enough to get through various holes which led through. Malnutrition would one day come, but he knew that this was the place he would die. The original room was somewhat clean, with the door towards the outside world closed, there seemed to have been a new arrival. An older gentleman, wearing an entire Kashmir suit, he had found himself at a cross of rooms, though one of them was locked and held shut by a force which couldn't have been shaken by the average person. Not in the least, to admit the fact, he looked at the exit and felt the cold running through his insides. A terrible terrible night for him. He could feel the warmth of the inside while guarding himself against the storm, without a single ounce of doubt, his options were clear. 'Is anyone here? Hello?' 'Could that be another voice I hear?' There came the voices of two ladies from somewhere past the hallway which wasn't blocked. He was mightily surprised to see two of them, dressed in just about the same attire, fashioned after being taken away. 'Who are you, sir? You seem just as confused as to no have been the person who came and took us away?' 'I beg your pardon dear?' 'Someone had come and grabbed me and my sister from out homes and dragged us to this place and left us to fend on our own.' 'That sound mightily horrible.' 'Not a step yet, I still haven't made my opinion about your person, it's just that I cannot help it but see how strange this is that we woke up near you during our time here.' 'I promise you that I've got nothing to do with this, I'm just as confused and as long as the two of you are.' 'Sir, I somehow doubt you know what's going on with the two of us.' She said, at last, with her sister behind her back, looking as if through a piece of glass at the man with his roughly untrimmed moustache. 'So what do you suppose we do, my dear lady? Clearly, I've no intention to harm either of you.' 'And I hope you don't intend on following the two of us either, for we're in a hurry to make it out alive and I'd rather not scare my sister with your presence while doing that.' The man stepped back two feet. There weren't many options, other than the one way they seemingly blocked, and two more ways he could choose from. Even though walking alone would be a terrible thing that most would agree. 'Are you sure that the two of you would do just well out there? Because if you do, you have in on my honour that I will leave you alone to your journey. But I am in the same way trapped in here as the two of you are.' 'What's behind the door then? The one which leaves outside?' 'Nothing but cold, a waste of cold during a snowstorm for which neither of us is prepared to embark on.' 'Very well, I think I've made my decision as of now. You aren't to follow, nor know our names, not our whereabouts or anything which would ever bring us any closer together, understood?' 'Loud and clear, but does your sister agree with your judgement, or are you the only one who's supposed to give me the orders and what not?' 'She's agreed with me on everything so far, this isn't the place to argue.' 'I want him to stay.' She suddenly came out of her hole, right around her older sister, almost like a small spider trying to get caught crawling. 'We could make it with the company, especially someone just as strong.' 'No, we're not going to take him with us, we already spoke about it and we wasted enough. Don't follow us, do you understand?' With a grasp over her sister's hands, they both flashed their blue eyes after which they had been dragged inside through another one of which tamed their minds. A hole as such it had become, but he wouldn't follow through a place where he was unwanted. He chose well between the two paths and went on ahead through safety and quiet. His was one of solitude as if he were to walk through some kind of library of sorts. It clearly had become some sort of depository of some kind, through the walls, he made it that he could grab, pieces of the walls which had become, black books, written words on pale pages. They spoke of many illnesses that had been achieved by a previous man. As for the entry, the name said. 'John Carper.' Followed by pieces of stained information, even a flattened cockroach which had obscured a part of the text. 'In memory of a sinful man, I've been given the chance to write what memories I have left before they are to end me still.' He didn't proceed and held it under his armpit, just enough to take another. So many names and so many people formed the very walls which went against him. And each of them, which had been there being works of self-preservation which promised to keep them alive for some sort of while, undoubtedly because their real bodies die. On the other side, alas, there seemed, freedom from the place they've been. 'I told you we would make it through, do you suppose we were followed by that man?' 'You shouldn't have banished him, Lisa, he's done nothing to deserve abandonment, in a place like that where he had no one to help him.' Verona seemed to have thought a bit, despite distracted by his appearance, she had the best intentions in mind, both of them had. Quaintly dressed, in silk brown deathly dressed, this wasn't a place for them to be in.' We need to find out where we are, we'll talk about this later.' She always did that and I've always let her do whatever she wanted, but when was my time? When was my time to decide what was to be done about it? Who chose the plan of action and who decided whom to follow us around? It didn't help the fact that the place looked more like a prison, fashioned out of the land. Threes were bent, the sand had joined them, it looked as if there was no hope in the least, to stop this damned feast and agony plants were set against. Stones had shattered, spikes were made, everything having a rough appearance against which they were set.' There has to be an exit somewhere around the place.' It looked more like some sort of dungeon which laid outside which prevented them from approaching even a few inches closer to the much-awaited freedom.' Don't touch that, it may be dangerous and you don't know what kind of diseases this kind of things might carry.' I know what I'm supposed to do, just trust me for this one time only.' Lisa frowned at her sister but there wasn't any way she could stop her from doing whatever she wanted, especially since the difference between them was quite artificial. The leaves appeared to be tender, fully blown with some type of texture, on which she couldn't place her mind upon. Moist as it were, she kept rubbing her hand against it, without showing any sign of wanting to stop.' That's enough, you're making me uncomfortable.' Just a moment, you need to try this as well, I think something's about to happen.' She blinked twice at the fact, the pain helped loosen her limbs but didn't change what she felt next. That moist texture had become wet now as much as there appeared to spawn tongue out of it which grossed both of the women off.' Let's go, and don't touch anything.' Lisa said, just before she grabbed Verona and pushed her as far away as she could. There was no sign of stopping when it came to the fact that a shuffling seemed to bear itself across the threes around, mostly because that moist tongue hadn't belonged to the plant.' Someone's stalking us, I know it, that long thing, it must've been a human tongue.' 'The ones which licked me?' More than surprised it seemed, that she hadn't dared to think about what might've been on the other side. There could've been others, there might be other men or people such as them, but until proven otherwise, everything was dangerous.' What do you suppose he's doing there?' Trying to tail us, just like any other, well, forget it, we're bound to find a way to be.' Her blue blouse appeared to be stained, her long blonde hair dry, thrown around such as a mad-lady would've been, and worse of all was the fact that Lisa was being aggressive in regards to her own sister. There, while it darkened and they realised they'd have not other option but to spend the night into a cage, her eyes suddenly turned out as being that of a pair of cats. They looked in the dark and scanned for any sign, whoever noticed that might've long been gone once they realised that there was a lot of danger involved to such a person, in the least of time, there'd be trouble.' Don't touch the walls, I think I know what we can do.' She had already started picking and ripping out leaves, placing them on the bottom of the floor, right on the cold stone. There was some kind of rest there to be had but someone still toiled around. Covered by the green they waited, all upon the threat had faded, and that is where they spent the night. There wasn't any way to know whenever or not the day had passed on the other side, other than to make it through the dark tunnels and to realise that there might be far too many humans who might've lost their way around. A discovery was important, that was kept, surely no one would mind. As a past-retired archaeologist, he had brought with him plenty of study material for his various roads around the province. It was important to know that he knew there'd be an absence which could've been felt there, henceforth he switched the memoir with one of his own. The results went well as the book cover darkened upon entering the wall, and he was certain that this strange book with its strange language would offer him more than something he had written about hills and many small mountains. At least by now, he noticed an important pattern, which remained the fact that they all seemed to have a biography written down. The name, the characters, everything unfathomable, unreadable but interesting to say the least. Could it be that there might've been others around or was it just an elaborate hoax? Nothing he had seen so far appeared to have any kind of explanation as to why. A wrong turn. He shouted as he fell, slowed down only by the fact that the hole in which he ended became thinner and more organic, such as a small sack might've been, able to carry him slowly to a point where he couldn't properly move. 'Help me, anybody, please.' Immediately he reminded himself to breathe as deeply as he could, unable to fathom just what sort of creature might hear him then. He was slowly being lead after all, through the small sack, which turned out to be more of a tube, in which his slippery body was being pushed further and further away, until that point where there wasn't anything he could do but relax and let everything follow its own course. It was long and he heard a noise, paired with sounds, as he was taken to a small flattened cylinder of a chamber, with a closed door at the end. There wasn't any perfection related but drips of the substance still found its way from above. 'Hello? Would any other man or whoever be able to come around and offer me some assistance? I seemed to have lost myself in.' No answer, this was clearly a place where no human being had gotten inside for at least as far as he could wager. Worse than that might've been the fact that there wasn't any single way he'd fit inside that thing if he had thought of trying to get back on his tracks, even if the chance arrived. He was aware of his own entrapment and did little to prevent his nerves from failing, on his knees he wept and shouted. Everything which had been said appeared to have remained in the same chamber, where no one else would get to hear him again. Likely this place was either abandoned or inhabited by something which should've starved if chances were for danger to be present. Most likely not since there were not many traces nor any kind of clues whenever or not something licked them clean and ate them afterwards. Calm was on the way but he was more than aware that his presence was known, his body was pulled and thrown against that gate. It suddenly bent against his entire form and let him get through with the least of resistance displayed. On the other side, things changed, for starters, it was clear enough that the many pools around the bridges ran through the various room, with their walls already under construction, evenly matched, everything became slightly clear. This was yet another room under construction, on which he stumbled, uninvited. There wasn't any other option left for him to take, other than to jump in the pool and forget himself, something was coming. By the sounds alone, a dreadful thing with many feet, making distinct sounds as it came. Just in time, he had dived through, breathing heavily and almost in a natural way through the pool. Inside of which, he felt every single drop from above and looked at the flooded pair of rooms which had previously been. It had been a problem, this fact, as the first corpse made him reconsider. A man, wearing clothes which had been broken down, not entirely a skeleton, as the skin had been fairly preserved. But a large chain held him to the bottom where he starved, alone. Others were clearly visible in other rooms as it seemed. With a sudden realisation, he swam deeper below. Something made itself be known as a pair of long openings were pushed inside and started sipping in through a big puffy revealed hairy ball. It dragged to a big body which was hard to look upon. Past the fear, he was aware that there wasn't any way to see, but something about those trunks which came from its back, that released all those legs below. It made weird notions while it rested, waiting for the rest of the body to return from this sudden break and come back to work. I need to get away from this, he's starting to move and feel my body wagging around. That thought alone of the creature diving inside with him made him in the least afraid, worse than that would've been the fact that he desires to go farther below while being unaware of the effects of the pool. While he was as far away from being called a fool in human form, he was mightily surprised over the fact that someone would dare come through and run. There wasn't any certainty but someone came through the opening and got the attention of the creature in his presence. A frightful scene arrived as it viciously pulled all its tubes away from the water and made it for the intruder. I knew you were a guardian, and this confirmed all of my suspicions. Now that he could freely move, he went deeper below and started getting closer to them, to see what they've become. Poor creatures almost seemed to have suffered in there, still caught in that state of fear and distraught, but now it was forever. The awareness gave in at last and appeared to have governed over his expressions. He was in control of what he showed to the people there, and with a pull, he accidentally beheaded one of them while proceeding to throw the head in a different direction. It showed no sign of rising to the surface as of yet, more than likely something was keeping it below. A worse source called on him, farther through this substance, his breath had become more shallow at this point. In the chamber he had entered, there was a dining chamber, long, in a room which had paintings and carpets, even magnificent crimson and sienna paint of the walls. A whole scene to be called upon, though this would be their last dinner, left unfinished, the food was spoiled. Looking below, all of them had been caught and chained by their ankles, unable to get away as well, but it wasn't the food nor the starvation which killed them. If so, why was the food left there, almost untouched, if it weren't for the rot and the spoil? Even more dreadful was the fact that some of them had tried taking small utensils and getting rid of pieces of themselves to flee. Cuts were minor, the pain had stopped them, it was obvious even from the first looks that they didn't stand a chance. Looking upon his hands, he wondered whenever or not he'd become such as they have. Dirty, tainted, filled with that substance which preserved them well, at least enough to say that the material around their clothes hadn't been destroyed. As well as the fact that some of the women around were still kept in their prime and true forms, the suction of the skin is merely a few inches in. Pale skin and plump, there was one, in particular, he had thought of having. In this places, no one would know, and it seems most peculiar to pass on such an opportunity. Upon touching one of the women at the table, he realised that their bodies were still warm, far too warm to belong to the realm of the dead. To say that the thought had passed his mind was an understatement, with danger underway, he only thought that this would be a fine moment. A very good opportunity to begin with, at least now that this would be his last chance to experience such a thing. During one shared moment, he closed his eyes and blocked everything else from reaching, floating through but keeping himself, still closer to the ground with his hands. A dreadful scene was underway and he wasn't surprised at all by the what he was proceeding into. Of course, there had to be a cry, somewhere from far away, inside the same complex he was in. Without even having to think, he deliberately turned away and started swimming toward the surface in a dark attempt and as he leapt from the bottom, his skin was covered in black, leaving nothing but an interrupted stream dripping away from him right on the floor. That was a mess and he already felt lighter than he should've felt in that commotion. Without a doubt, there should've been a notion of self-worth which could've driven him away or to return and try escaping, but that scream certainly was something he desired to look upon. This was a true lair, without a doubt, made by the creature to guard upon those pools. Seeing how the other ways were sealed, even from above, he'd have to cross the threshold in order to continue exploring the grand bellowing pools. Right around the corner he peered and saw nothing which would've made him think of his foolishness as well as the rabidness which that creature provided. There wasn't any distinct sound, no movement he could make out, the place was twisted from above, for certain reasons, he chose to be alone. Down there, no one would disturb him from what he'd see, without having to deal with the fear of being caught or any other sort of thing which would go wrong. 'Are you done there? Just make some splashes, I think I've heard you scream.' In that tone, he tried, perhaps too much softer than he had anticipated, the set of legs started making those loud sounds again. From behind it came a great shadow which was propelled by a fire, revealing some bulb of a body, thick and huge, perhaps with some bumps everywhere around, hardened as they were. The extra weight was placed into those tiny long legs in order to be able to carry that thing.

And even from the shadow, he noticed that those which had been missing grew up instantly. 'There was a struggle.' He said, while thinking that he had to be away, riding through the waves, he dived right through and looking above. It somewhat slowed down where I have dived and after looking at the whole conundrum, I've realised that it might've been aware of my presence with all the splashes and the pool. Some large legs were shoved inside and flickered to no avail, there'd be nothing to do as of yet, nothing which would change that which crept inside his every aware sense. Somehow those legs vibrated inside the pool and produced some sort of migraine-inducing bubbles. As dreadful as that sounded, the process continued for at least a few seconds as it roamed around the pools and tried doing it over and over to no avail. It refuses to dive in with me, this is the perfect chance, I'd say. 'On the next opportunity, he saw that they came inside and as they have, he pulled on those small legs, feeling the pressure and the force. It felt just as surprised as he had when he was suddenly pulled into a struggle, right atop the water, holding onto it as it saw an opening but couldn't act on it. For it face another direction than those of which he was set against, one snap would've been enough to have him slammed with his face against the ground. But somehow, it only tried to twist around in circled as to get him much closer to those dreaded mandibles. It was too pointless since he had grabbed those large trunks on the back but in exchange, he achieves a great view of the whole body it bore. Not only had those bumps been there, but they had been under the skin, transparent as they seemed, soon it was revealed by the struggle that they were the skulls of his previous victims. It was now he shouted, struggled upon this beast of a march, as the tubes came out from both ends, sharp stuff and plenty of other elongated sharp wires which had to serve for the most insane purposes. But the struggle had become a pointless mistake as the creature had twisted itself on its back while flinging him away against the other side of the wall. He bounced like a heavy rock, just before heaving himself inside the pool. There he struggled and upon reaching the bottom, he started shimmeringly walking way, as fast as he could, without the least of a doubt about what he desired to do and make. No mistake came upon the realisation of the fact that there were others around who had shared a worse fate than his. Clear marks laid on their foreheads as well as multiple parts of their bodies. It was swift, the creature acted far too quickly for him to have stood a chance, but he recognised that voice again, there seemed to have been a shout. Meanwhile, they seemed to come back to awareness, both sisters looked at one another, highly shocked to what appeared. Fruits had been brought for them on a plate which was left through the small grates of their

cage.'Wake up, come on up Lisa, look. Someone brought us a present while we were sleeping, isn't that quaint?'Wait, don't take anything yet, we have no way, let me think.'She hadn't even gotten the chance to come to the realisation of where she was or what was bound to happen. Words flew out of her mouth almost mechanically despite the fact that she had little to no clue of who seemed to be out there or for what purpose. And worse of all was the fact that her younger sister acted more like a fool than any kind of adult she had known.'If it's poisoned Verona, we may be in great danger since there's no way to find any medical help around here.' Without peering twice, she at least looked menacingly at the grapes. While being more than hungry, it turned her into caring even less that she was needed in order to satisfy her sister. This expectation didn't last long, at least not until she felt the food come near and be brought right up to her mouth where she felt the texture. Teasing her was quite pleasant, though there were doubts even in her mind. Who was watching them from the other side and why was it so important that they avoid what was to be done about it. Undeniably, they needed the strength to carry on, without even doubting what had to be done. The need for this came before any perception her sister might've had about her, without even having to wage in that. In a way, this felt like it was exciting, right as she joined her after witnessing that there was no change in her state of health. But she still had the better view, looking directly into those globes from far away, realising that he was watching her, eye to eye, trying to get a closer view even then. Such a thing never occurred to her before, that there'd be someone who'd manage to excite her, just to disappear when Lisa turned around. 'Do you see anything you like out there? You seem awfully excited for one reason or another.' 'No, I'm just finding this amusing, that we found ourselves here and managed to deny the only help we'll get.' 'I've already told you that I didn't trust the man if you grew up for once, you would've understood that it was the right decision and you'll thank me later.' Her nods seem to bore only a bit of false excitement as she came close to finishing the bowl of fruits. 'Well, are we to leave it here or bring it to us?' Lisa asked, right before seeing that her sister pushed the bowl through the metal grates, with a thanking motion, she seemed to have taken the lead. At least to say that they had known where they were going was as much as a mistake as there was. This cage of theirs was bigger, taller and wider than expected, stretching to encompass a small storehouse, in the middle of the section. With proper care and examination, they would've understood that this was made to keep them outside, not the other way around. The opposite as it would be called, they were protected from whatever harm had come to be. Inside of which, the door was open, late as it had been abandoned, a candle laid on the desk. Though it hadn't been apparent from the outside, the light made it seem that way, that there had been someone right there before they have arrived. 'I guess this could be out mysterious kind one, right?' This candle wasn't lit for that long. 'Lisa felt around the books, they were warm as well, as much as the stove and everything around. Could it be thought that it wasn't the mysterious stalker who peered upon with those beady eyes? Even with the tea kettle on, the danger would've been being, it had to be taken off the stone.' 'We have expected it appears.' Two cups of tea laid right next to the table, a blue ultramarine coloured tea came to fruition, which could only be related to the taste of blueberries. In this manner alone, this exploration of there had granted them enough of a leave to invite themselves in and search the place. Everything was rough and there was little to time to react. Most dreadful appearance while Verona busied herself in the distraction which ran around the room. One strange creature dwelled around and seemed to have tried creeping into their line of sight. It was more such as a hairy man, but those long teeth were all wrong and he was much taller and seemingly more aggressive. A shimmeringly hot breath came out of its nostrils as it came to leaning against the bars in those fruitless attempts which prompted her to close the curtains. 'What's that for?' 'Nothing, it's just for the cold, I wouldn't want my young sister to get sick, would I now?' 'Look, it's what you were looking for?' 'What I was looking for?' Versona appeared to have taken a small box with a medical sign on it, most likely that belonged to someone but they needed some of the supplies. 'Put it down now, it isn't ours to take.' 'Wait, you don't suppose that man we met is the same man who lives in here, do you?' 'I don't know, it's none of our business and could you just please stop changing the subject? You can't just look into someones' belongings like that.' After an intense glare, she placed it on the floor and pushed the box away with the back of her foot and smiled. 'Are you happy now? Can I just drink my tea?' This younger version of herself didn't do much thinking, Lisa supposed, as she appeared to be more interested in this kind of fiction with its creatures and the men trapped behind the other side of the wall which laid between them. 'Why do you suppose we're separated?' 'Should we turn around and leave? You are getting fairly too interested in that and nothing good can come out of it.' 'Come on, what the worst that could happen? They're trapped out there and we're trapped in here.' 'We got a way out, it's just behind.' 'Where there's another man you refused to take with us. Perhaps he's the one who left the tea for us, quite kind of him not to wake us up either.' Deterioration laid in her eyes and all of the sudden she hadn't felt as shallow. It was a clear sign that she was being affected a lot more than her and this wouldn't do for either of them. Could it be that something was in the tea? Some change was beginning to manifest in her as well and it was unclear as it was to be. Her vision was almost blurry but not exactly entirely blinded in terms of knowing what was around. One thing was quite annoying, that she was to be more affected, as she saw Versona walk through the door while her vision stopped her on the floor. Heavily breathing, unaware that she had made it out already without a plan to return, she stood there and waited for a sign that her sister might return at last. After a single knock and a slam from behind, the realisation came that there was another person with her inside the room. Without a doubt she would've screamed and made some sort of noise to alarm anyone in proximity but now that she was in the condition, there was little to nothing she could do, but feel as that dark force that felt human run across her, making her shiver. Those weren't just hands that ran along her curves but something else, pointy, which twisted and hardened as a bone. Another one of those things seemed to run across the body with little to no care about the disturbance she felt. Not even now, after realising that she was being used could she had known in what state her body was set. Right after being turned around, she saw the assailant and it was nothing but more of a golem or some kind and of a twisted mind. A deformed face with horizontally set eyes grasped as the mouth was stretched. Those many pointy organs should've been his point baby hands, which winked at her as a woman might, in front of the benign. Bright as the room had been, the candle was no longer lit, as the wind blew by, the benign's creator was nowhere to be seen. And such a decrepit act could never have been stopped but as he waded at the thought alone, Verona forgot herself, merely half-dazed from a few sips, as the others fell from her mouth, down her chin. Without merely thinking of her own intentions, she had forgotten about her sister almost entirely, being drawn by those beady eyes. They kept following, as she had, looking behind, everything was dark. Could it be that here there was little to no sign of day? 'Are you there? I know you helped me and picked up the fruits for me to have for my own but I don't know how I could reward you.' There was silence but just as much as it was in abundance, there was guidance coming from that fiend, that damned who jumped and leapt, guiding her by the reflection in its eyes. Verona was transfixed by it, following in the most damned sense, unable to control and see what made her drawn by that thing alone. Her senses were somehow mixed in terms of what she thought and knew. Unable to look right into it, she had almost skewed her chances and joined hands with that thing in the dark. Suddenly she pulled away, as the realisation came, rough manly hands which didn't belong to a man but to something bigger, more frightening. No, this couldn't be, those beady eyes are full of kindness, why should I suffer one more moment to be set apart. 'How can I join you now? I'm merely here against my sister's utmost wishes, bless her heart. She's gone to a place unknown it seems and I am lost, but you are here. Nothing could've gone more right as I'm aware you know, I have something for you in my chest, it grows.' With each pound, she felt the desire to see it and finally heard its sound. This came as a dreadful muttering of a primitive creature, who had never known compassion or the word of man. Without a second thought that came as a pleasing thing, to know and be aware of the danger and carry forth. Her slender arms just came right through the bars and approached, slowly towards his face. Even more emotion sprouted from the eyes of which almost came to weep at the sign of kindness, less of the distress was faced. But alas, it couldn't be, just before her hands could reach the face, it grabbed her and started shaking her violently. Startled as if by the realisation that it wasn't a man there, right as its eyes closed, she screamed and shouted. 'Let me go, please, I've done nothing to deserve this, please, just let me.' She cried and understood, once she was released and fell on her back, that there was nothing which could be done about this creature who felt like a man. Her arms had become red and while caught weeping she had no desire to return and face the anger which Lisa would've shown her. 'I hate you, animal, I hope you stay there locked and never have a chance to see me again.' With which she made it alarmingly well, keeping track of the spoil, the rain which had fallen from above. Without a doubt, whatever place she had gone, upon looking behind, there wasn't any scene or any kind of way to see from where she had come. The cave of structure should've been tall and be visible even from where she stood, but instead, it had disappeared. No more games, she thought, just to make sure this was where she wanted to be. More than enough ahead, this was revealed to be such as a garden would've been, with many ways to go and twisted paths, connected to some sort of castle at which end, the architecture was ancient but the iron grating wasn't. It was somehow clear that whatever happened there inside, the man of the castle, or those who dwelled there might've been aware that something had run rampant in their garden, as travellers would be unprotected. 'But what if they're as vile as those in there? What if they're the jailers of those forgotten beasts?' Thoughts came, and again compassion, could it be that they're even fed? Was that an act of desperation which had been performed upon her? There wasn't any way of knowing, nor of even being able to tell, let alone communicate with such a bore of many kinds. Now that she realised that it had been a mistake to not think of her sister's fate, Verona thought her sister might be in danger, even worse than that, perhaps caught in a place where she couldn't escape. Could I do it alone then? Finding and rescuing my sister from some dreadful foes that overpowered her is far beyond what I could do, there's nothing here helping me the way I see it, it might be true. Enough of bothering herself out there, she had approached, those beady eyes now laying in pairs, they tried blinking from afar and making some sort of nasty movements that didn't bode well enough with her general senses. To look upon it in a different light, they moved from the bottom of the top of her view, as if they had been climbing trees. One, two or four knocks came upon the sturdy door, there wasn't any doubt of the intent, even from the star. The woman who had opened it was slender and pretty, with her dark robe and brown hair. Her pace had almost been a placing and her crooked smile almost gave her a feeling of dissatisfaction before she even decided to drop the smile and have her in. 'We're not really used to getting guests insides, especially during the night but I guess we could make some sort of exception.' 'You need to help me, my sister, you see.' 'All in due time my dear, how old are you, are you alone?' 'No, it's my sister, she's been lost along the way, somewhere out there, in the, in the.' 'She wanted to desperately say that it had been the cage there, that she had to have been dragged inside. Verona could've told her about those eyes which followed but it couldn't be. Was she awakened from a spell which had been cast upon her? It seemed as if she wasn't trapped in some sort of prison but has stumbled through the garden, right through the property, confused. 'I'm sorry, I think I got lost and ended up here. You must excuse me and please pardon me for I am in need of finding my dear sister, the poor old thing must be worried.' 'Wait, my dear, I see in you a soul as young and as afraid as had been mine at your age. Don't leave yet through a night like this, it wouldn't do, at least not if you do want to find the sister of your way back home.' Hand in hand, she took her and brought her inside the house, making a sign for her father to go away rather than introduce herself. Step by step around the stairs, she was brought to one of the finely made guest rooms, where the candles had been turned around and there was a little square window from which a cold wind came. Had they never realised that the dreadful heat had never gone. 'You stay here and I'll bring you some tea and something to eat.' 'No, not tea, I'd rather get a cup of water if you don't mind.' 'Very well then, a cup of water and biscuits it is.' Said the frightened girl as she barely recollected herself from being startled. The room was clean but painted in brown and darks just like the rest of the room. Some fragments of the gothic remained in the building, most likely this could've been centuries old, or say the last years. 'I wish you were here, oh Lisa, where have you gone?' 'Here you have it, the food and the water, and the pills, you need to take them on the program, right before you go to sleep.' 'What are they for, again?' 'They help you relax, nothing more, something like that, do you remember?' 'Please, I'm just trying to find my sister, she's lost because of me, I ventured too far and I think I lost myself along the way.' There was something which had been hidden, but she accepted either way. Without the least of concerns, she was aware of the fact that she was being led to believe that something happened to her. But sleep came soon after each bite, on the biscuit and the pills that came with them as the lights came into play. One blow and she was gone, while the woman went downstairs back to her father. Seeing how he was working on his grand creation, he tried paying little attention and hide his concern. 'She's stable, father, but there are some dreadful things I've heard her say while she was talking in her sleep.' 'Such as what?' 'There was a man, it seems, someone might be stalking around the premise.' 'It won't matter, I'll continue as it is, you should go and rest as well, I won't have you become ill either.' 'I wouldn't burden your father.' And not a second dreadful more had she waited before trailing back upstairs, right where she made her way through the maze and right to her room and soft pillows. It appeared that the girl had sleepwalked again, somehow she always ended up going on her bed each time, sleeping with her like a frightened child. Far too sweet to be banished from this spot, while she was far too tired for anything she went on ahead right next to her. Too much time had been spent inside the pool before the man got up and started walking. No sign of anything which moved it seemed. 'I am Warren, forty, professor, no, I used to be an archaeologist I think I studied it or taught it, I'll remember.' He looked around and seemed to have his senses right in check, just as his mind continued working, he appeared to have all the right information inside his head. Most importantly was the fact that at least he could say with all certainty that he wasn't dead. At least not yet, but his body, while covered in that pool water hadn't looked the same, at least not when it came to his skin. Some of the layers appeared to have been bruised, at least those that were outside. A blunt look revealed many important things, such as the fact that he was light on his feet, most definitely if he were to remain down there, there'd be nothing left for him but another pair of warm bones and some skin to cover them. Something was different than the others, Warren felt like his body alone had gone through many other changes which weren't intended to happen. 'I'm coming, don't worry, I'm coming!' He couldn't keep straight but he said it after hearing another shout coming from deeper inside the cavern. Without the least of doubt, he wanted to wager that something in that plane of out there must've begun to devour or torture the innocent while he listened in despair. Once that thing was to be done with him, it would come for me and remember what I've done with it. Rightly stopped at a corner he looked as there were others going from one wide end to another. They acted like guards, block access to other sides and would most likely attempt to stop his passage if he tried. Luckily, there were still the pools under in case one or two of them decided to follow him in a moment which he was not prepared. His steps were alarming and made both creatures tensed. So far neither of them decided to leave their posts but rather go on ahead to take on a most dreadful appearance, even more so than before. One in particular almost split itself in rage over the fact that it couldn't help itself but stay in that position which each attempt to make a move made by Warren was enraging. He was infuriating to watch, even less to be called upon for his actions. By the time his steps ended, he had gone through another arch and found himself standing above, two levels below held by arches which were in the pools below. Such a difference in height from the previous room left a balance through the shift of the pool, but someone was coming. There was no way to know how deep the pool was, neither what would happen if the drop was hard enough, but instead of doing it, he hugged one of those long sliders which held it above and slowly decreased his slide. One large creature, which might've been a mother, carrier, a sphere bulging from its back revealed, many eggs which were kept in that transparent bag. It was being led by two others which, to his surprise, held weapons of some sort, almost spear-shaped with pointy ends made out of mined prime material. A dangerous thought came to him as he realised that there was some intelligence and they weren't just some mad colony of creatures on the ground. Dangerous as it had been, he couldn't hold himself still and landed in the pool confused. Without a doubt, it was here that he realised that there wasn't any way this could happen, as a matter of fact alone, it was some sort of joke played on him. Such as he found himself not even the corner of his foot inside the pool, this was a damn. They had found a way to pull all of the substance out in order to seal and construct their maze. Worse than that was the fact that they had some intelligence and they saw him go right past them, some might speak, others might move their beaks. Oh, that beak was tainted, the carrier of children had grown it from its front side. It would be worse than a thought to think about the ways that dark horn which opened, tried taking away pieces of him to feed the children as he watched. 'Well, it seems that I'm at a loss.' Nothing could've become worse than at this moment when it entered the room. It was a being in its prime, scales and out carapace, which wasn't upon others. From this angle, it looked as if its worse an armour and some sort of shield, one spear in hand and almost lifted itself on two feet. The scouting had ended and the man was found, standing on his back, head tilted, thoughts away. Another man would've called him a drunk who stumbled into some place where he hadn't belonged. One fever dream leads to another, as he found himself, taken by sight and dragged. His body was stung and paralyzed but as it happened, something in his mind brought him away. There was a pain in the process but he found another body in another place. Many spires descended from the gloomy red earth, twisted like some kind of animal bone extensions of the same very moulding red the ground was made off. A pale green and hazy ground laid and as far away as he could see, there was a destroyer walking along the desolation, breaking and cracking. The vision had something to do with the taint. He could see it almost break off while he was being dragged by the many-legged creatures in its way. One moment later he was back in there, free to move and do as he pleased, while the sun had turned into a small pair of highly pointing yellow spheres of grey and green, he looked upon the grand spires and realised that they were the last monuments of a gone civilisation. He knew that it was the destroyer or the ender of this world or plane, just by looking at it alone. Without a doubt, if it came to it, while it was marching, it wouldn't hesitate to end the latest addition to the formation of line. Warren was pale and felt like there were no bones in his body, only a pair of broken wings which dragged along. He couldn't fly and barely moved since he had no mass just a juice inside of him keeping him alive, as for him to consider. He didn't crawl the same way an insect would, since there wasn't any way tell what was going on around. There might've been others who were too afraid to come out of the various torsion at the bottom of the stones. Broke through them, there seemed to have been dripping from the inside of them, the justice, the ooze, flowing through from their hiding spot. Such rocks were red, tall and mighty, repurposed for their hiding. At least he had become somewhat aware from which hiding place he had erupted and might've paid some sort of special attention when it came to that dreadful fate. Without being able to think he recited something he once read, it must've been a long time ago since he had looked into one of those things, but books of dread had filled him with wonder. 'Let me go you dreadful beast.' Warren said, and as he looked beyond the carapace, for a moment there he was fully aware of where he was and somewhat realised where he'd be taken. Moving was pointless as he realised that it only made this new body of his get closer to that tall standing beacon of mighty and heaviness. I must at least try to understand what it is and why is that it keeps crushing them. Even from a good amount of distance, he could see that it was destroying rocks and crushing everything under that might of danger. Something went terribly wrong that he had awakened in one of the spires, almost into a flight which launched him into one dark rabid hole which pulled him inside. The interior might've made him shudder, or any human who was there. At least a creature of many wonders as himself could understand the beauty of it. But the things which were disturbing had been the depictions and the twists at the bottom of the floor, everywhere around being taken by supremely dampened and moist substances which seemed to push the bones below. Embed throughout the spire had been all the visitors who had entered the spires and stayed for too long there. He was aware just as much that standing in there would eventually result in him being trapped inside just as much as any other being would. It frightened him at the thought, as much as we wanted to flee through the same way he came, it was obvious that there was nothing for him to lose as he was as close to the top as he might be. A morbid sun laid outside already, blackened in the middle, crawling worm-like apprehensions of sanity just pushed around as it went below on its own terms. That darkness was felt everywhere around, as the land became paler by its leave. But enough time was wasted as he was aware that a few centimetres of him had already been gone, pushed to leave a mark at the bottom of the floor. Oh, the face and the marks he'd seen, somehow, among all the many creatures which had become trapped inside one of the spires had come to be the likes of a man or two which belonged to the human race. The eyes couldn't have been affected, leaving a black stare of violet and red, which had been the naturally occurring colour. Despite having known what was going on, there wasn't any second he wanted to turn around and look at the men he passed. Would it be the slime which turns in here or my real body?" That he couldn't know nor tell if it were possible at all, he was mightily exposed right away and aware that there'd be something to lay at the top. At least, to have known peace of soul, he came to the tallest point, something of a stretching starved creature which had paid its wage to the tower. The top of which being a small platform on which he stood, clean with no sign of someone having been taken, that being so if someone else had ever reached the top other than him. Looking around, he could see just how far this world stretched, the magnificence and the dark inverted might. Bloody rivers, blue trees, even the mountains had their strange shapes. In the distance, they had rebuilt some kind of facilities, if those weren't remnants of a long abandoned civilisation. But it was a strange fact that he hadn't noticed, one of the worm-infested suns had actually followed through the same way that facility was. A coincidence, to say the least, he was now lighter, the wings were stronger and he had brought to the attention of a destroyer, the creature which had turned as if to stare at an insect. No expression laid on the construct as it seemed to be the embodiment of perfection, or at least it would've been if it weren't for the fact that hairs still popped out of those legs which were somewhat made of meat rather than the same material of its outer shield and body. But they had been cut, he was aware of that, no matter how dark it had become or how much of a waste there had been, he was aware of it. That creature had been hurt and it was suffering in silence, without a single way to express a sound of any kind or to signal the fact that there'd be danger somewhere inside. He pitched it and watched as it turned away and walked in a different direction. 'Only a couple of suns left for me to see, at least until the beast might take me away.' To which point he couldn't have known, but this was the only time he had flown through the air and glided through the sphere of impurity, spreading his malignity as he headed towards the working facility. The more he approached, the easier it had become for him to realise that there was some sort of activity going down there, large junctions pumping in and out, without much trouble. Why has that small plant in the middle of nowhere been left there in its full shape? There wasn't any sign that it had even been approached or touched in its form. Those junctions and the smoke could've been there for centuries from what it knew and it only became apparent once he had approached, from his aerial view he knew, alas. With a small of black wool, organic inside machines, it was some sort or being which might've been tied to the tall destroyer. Was it working for it or just a slave? He couldn't answer nor had he cared. A fragment of woe, the true unknown had seeped inside and tried to pull him down. Two or three sets of long slender fingers, stretching as far and string attached to a kite came from below and grabbed him from each side, stopping his gliding motion and getting some control. He wouldn't be allowed to roam so easily from this point on, that was as much as he had become aware of. Even in the world outside, he was stopped, as to open his eyes from time to time, laying on a table, waiting. Heavily panting in the background there were some things which couldn't have been explained by his primitive mind, that's why he decided to close them again and return. It was once again that he found himself past any kind of control, looking into some sort of way out, which might make him get freed from their grasp. So far there wasn't any sort of way, in which they could see or look at them. A mark was bored upon the fingers, going around them like slender cylindrical wires. Most likely they had been pushed inside at the ends of long shiveringly heated knives or primitive tools from the likes of which they appeared. But at least now that he was guided he could see that all those slender fingers came from different window holes from the factory he had been planning on visiting. They were inside tall houses, robust, dirty coloured metal that sometimes looked as if it was of dirt, rubbery strips below where the steps would be and it was only then that he realised that it might be less of a factory and more of an establishment they made. Small being, hard to see, perhaps tall enough to have crawled from dark holes in which they hid for long periods of times and waited. Faithfully it looked as if they came, at last, the thought of which couldn't pass, he knew that others would look away if no to see, the strange creature which was captured and dragged inside. The fingers let go, one by one until there were only two which had managed to wrap themselves as a cloak around him. Everything became clearer once he approached, he could see the streets with their metal railings on the bottom of the floor, and the steep or the incline which went a long way into the bones of the world. It was obvious now that this world was alive, as they have uncovered a giant bone, ripped from the earth which acted like some sort of protecting layer. Veins of dirty dripped with the mouldering moistness which had been its blood. And from this point, he saw an excruciatingly disgusting embalmed twisted of shapes of which rank he couldn't take his eyes away. It was thick enough to be damn bellyaching stip of a ball, but then it opened from below revealing that the fat was merely for protection. What laid below was a set of rolls around limbs which included no less than a couple of arms which slip at the bottom but kept on revealing grabbing morbidities of tense long strips of flesh. They were the same colour of the carapace, a tainted pale brown, which was unlike any other inhabitant which laid around. At least this one was much bigger and it hid more than he had known or was aware of. One thing which made the difference was the fact that it turned to look upon Warren as to see. 'Don't look at me you creature, devil, beast, whatever you might be, I've done you no harm to deserve such a stare of which vileness corrupts me even by the looks alone.' He shunned himself and laid afraid, shaking in his boots while thinking he would be taken all of the sudden by surprise. What laid below it was the body of an almost serpentine home, if it weren't for the fact that it seemed that three instead of one had taken the job of eating the poor man. It bore three distinct tails which pushed its body forward, maybe some extremities were hidden as if the expectation came that tiny legs would erupt from inside his body any moment. Without delay, he was taken in, from the sight of which couldn't have been any better. It was revealed that it was a being or a damned creature for which those fingers belonged, but rather that it had to belong to some sort of machine with a small rolling handle. A decrepit thing to say the least, as it was still attached to a modified hand, from which the fingers came. Thoughtfully he looked around and examined everything he could without delay and without giving a chance for repose. Gently he was freed and let to his own accord. What must I do now in this room, why isn't there anyone? A knock followed and another one came in. A beak laid long and a pair of wings from the sides and back, leaving the poor worm-like body unable to fly in the least. Such a poor miserable mongrel had no place anywhere in a place as damning such as this. He would've been aware if it weren't for the fact that he suffered dearly at the thought of which, he couldn't see nor could he be introduced properly. Another beak extended from behind its head and in a moment, such it came, it leapt from across the room on four pillow shaped bottom feet which had no way of moving and it spoke. 'Greetings, dear one, it seems as if you're lost.' It tries rationalising with the fact that he was there as well, without thinking of the exception that the ooze might not be an intelligent being. Could it be that in truth it might've seen what his true form looked like? There wasn't any way to tell as well as no one could pass the blame if one were to push a rock, one of which just laid above. A simple trap which he noticed, just to walk off from the device which laid below of him and

he'd be flattened.'Oh that, do not mind it, as long as you answer me I will not trigger the device, I say. You can trust me, oh strange creature, now say what you are, for I can see through this guise of yours.Would you be a spy then, of any sort?'His lips were dry and he knew that there weren't any English words which came from his mouth. Nonetheless, it was either an attempt or the rock.'I am Warren and I was taken by some sort of guardian in a colony below the bottom of the earth."Very well, Warren, so what is that happened to have brought you here then? Have you escape from that one who dragged you below?"No, I believe I am still trapped and that my body is still there, covered in something transparent while I'm being prepared.'A curious nod came into being and there seemed to be nothing in the right mind of things. Both of them looked at one another as if they were strangers who had just met.'I see.' The creature said while looking through those bulbous pieces of glass, right through a set of deep reflections which guided him to where the body lay.One tight chamber and it had already begun, the carapace was placed upon his body, an old thing but it just happened to fit.Organic chains were dragged from above and seemed to have shackled his limbs as if to prevent escape at any cost. Without being much distracted, it suddenly twisted the finger device and slowly lowered the rock, only to throw it out the window and watch it bounce in an utmost deranged manner.'I think I see where your problem lay but you must follow me unless you wish to pay the most dreadful of the prices.'As lightning came through the doors, the windows bashed, inside the house there came a cold wind and a grasp.The girl was afraid, looking for her sister in a dream, seemingly unable to pass through, not even in the morning when she woke up and arrived at an empty confusion which lasted.'Where am I? Lisa, Lisa are you there? I need to see you, Lisa, to talk to you, can't you answer my call already?'There appeared to be daylight coming through the windows, which had meant for her, that the storm, all of which woke her up throughout the night, might've been a dark phantasm and nothing else.'I seem to have forgotten myself, at least in this place where I've got nothing but myself.'Another set of knocks arrived, and all of the sudden there came a sweet voice, kind of old, which had reminded her of something she couldn't fully grasp.'It's time for breakfast, will you just open the door now?'Immediately, a recollection of their meeting had arrived, it was the woman who had brought her inside and offered her a place to stay.The first thing she's done was to run towards the window and look outside, full of awe.It couldn't have been a dream, but there was nothing of the sort out there, no cage and no building from which she came out of. Could it be that it was all just an illusion? She asked herself while walking towards the door.The atmosphere was ill as well, for, outside their world, none could tell if any of the souls which had been caught in that lobe of sorts was alive or not. None could try or attempt to wager whenever or not the mass and the light inside of the got extinguished, at least not in the same way either of them would've expected it to go. But something had grown on the outside, as it spread its tubes towards the ground.From the perspective of the watchers, this was no longer a controlled environment of any sort, rather a strange thing which didn't settle down with either of them. Such was it that the other vessels that were brought had been suckled of their essence and left and husks of their former selves to be melted for spare parts into a paste.It would've been a lie to say that faced against what it had become wasn't intimidating, especially since since as close as twenty feet towards it triggered some hormones inside the brain. Whispers of long forgotten or dead ones would come into being, slowly evolving in hallucination or madness. Nothing would stop the victim from marching at the point where there wasn't any self-control to feed himself to their great deity below, for that is what it had become.They have attempted to starve it but not it seemed that it fired back, as to make it stronger and devours its brothers for as much as it needed in order to survive through this experiment. Something didn't bode well with any of them, especially with the realisation that it might breach much further with those tubes inside the ground. The militia was announced and on their way. Heavy machinery would be ready to be brought as if to cut it down from both sides and contain the spreading infection which it brought upon itself. 'What will happen to me?' The girl asked inside, she could feel ill as if affected by the overwall feeling of dread which floated everywhere. She was still inside the chateau, with the woman she had barely met in the presence of which she felt shy and suddenly slowed. As if a headache had managed to crawl its way inside the head, there wasn't any doubt of what was to happen then. She would be confronted by a woman on the other side, just as soon as she was able to open the door and make sure that nothing which happened was a fever dream. With at least another twist of the key, the door was opened and the woman came, a plate of biscuits and some tea laying on her plate. 'Have you slept well?' Though this woman appeared to be rough, in her familiarity there seemed to be something which made her likeable even at the second glance, when all was said and done. 'That dream again doesn't tell me, I know all about it, with the garden and the eyes.' 'How did you know? I, I thought it was real, everything which happened last night, meeting the man, running through.' 'That's important, that wasn't there before, who is this man you've met?' 'Well, it's not exactly what you think, more like someone who I wanted to talk to before my sister came and pushed him away from following us, that's all.' There wasn't any ponder but she doubted anyone stepped on the property, again, no signs of any forced entry ever since she checked. It was a dream unless she knew better. 'Could you describe him for me, over the tea my dear.' Verona was guided over, right through, towards the garden in the back, where the view was breath-taking and everything laid within a sphere of calm. The two of them appeared to have gone through a ritual which had been brought to a vile start. It was that door which led down towards the basement which disturbed her most despite not know how to explain it. 'That my dear, isn't for you, remember, that's for, well, the man, Theodor, yes, Theodor, he works down there.' 'Is he your?' 'No, no, no, he's not actually, that would be repulsing in the most unnatural manners.' Verona mightily blinked before being lead towards the garden. This look allowed her to see more than the sky, but something she couldn't speak about even if she tried. From the far top of the sky, there almost appeared to have been a red curtain of some sort, not the type which might've been found in a bathhouse, nor one amongst the windows, but rather an opening and an end. Something of a pair of black balls floated in the sky and ran faster than falling stars in their finite places. Obviously from her eyes, as she saw the dilated pupils, she was seeing things again. Without realising that she had taken the pills, she sipped from her drink and looked. 'Verona, are you with me? Can you understand?' 'Yes, yes I know, it's nothing. I seemed to have been taken by the view, nothing more.' Poor lass had been staring for the last fraction of an hour, too pure to have been disturbed by the trance she was in. Worse was the fact that she had become aware that she was being stared at by the woman. 'What was your name again? My memory isn't what it used to be, I'm terribly sorry for that but.' 'Elisabeth, it's Elisabeth, you should've known that I've told you.' 'Yes, well, I can't remember things lately, ever since that night when it happened.' 'I know the story, word by word, please, you must tell me about this, if it weren't a man whom you met last night, how is that you remember seeing one this time?' 'I don't know what you're talking about, this conversation is making me uncomfortable.' 'Verona, wait, it's not what you think.' 'I think I know very well what this is, to think that you would bring a woman just to mock her with your high airs and in your mansion.' 'You're overreacting now, I'm only trying to help, that's all.'But she misstepped and trapped behind a bush of stone, luckily, her head fell on a pile of moist dirt, as the effects of rain came into play, neither of them was enough to prevent her from falling into another trance. Poor lass never stood a chance.As for the man, in his wild feverish dream, his body, as his hands and legs were split in many, pushed before. He felt no pain and he wasn't human anymore, but something new, unlike the others. His mind was ready, he concluded, after telling his story, his mind got muted by the powers out there.It felt as if the tall pillar or flesh had listened and decided to give him a chance right there, in the place where he wouldn't like to be.'I see, now that you've settled on this, I'd like you to know that there are consequences for leaving your body just to come and live in this.You were given something of an ill construct, none could tell what might happen to your mind once your other body dies."Just look through my eyes if you can, this is what my fate is.'He did it and observed as he had been repurposed and set ready to live in a strange kind of slavery by a leading unit which attempted some sort of mind control.There'd be nothing preventing it if weren't for the fact that he managed to be entangled through the waves of psychic link, the means of which allowed for his escape.'Perhaps you might evolve and grow bones and organs on the matter, you might even be an addition too.

Well, if you can't be stopped, I welcome you and bid you wager. You must not leave the room until the transformation is complete and the mind had given upon on the previous meat-shell which kept you unaware.'The strange twist leapt a few steps and closed the curtains now, looked over its way as it darkened its scales and went back into the lair in which he had been cast. Fairly so, the room was dark and he waited in that place, with fear for his future and thinking, just as he closed his eyes.His death on the table was soon to come, just as his mind was being taken care off, they couldn't have another drone which wasn't as effective and obedient after all. Influences were already strong, as they crept inside and made some sort of dreadful notice in the head.Feeling rather like a walking corpse, he finally gave in through the other side, only to observe.It looked as if, for starters he had been taken already and pushed to the limit, at a point where he couldn't tell what had happened, who he was. Where was he and why was it that he had to pick some cruelly made tool and mine out there. He only kept his consciousness because this, this wasn't his body any longer, but the one far away, being an ooze which was growing bones, that at least he could feel and see.As long of a process as that threatened to be, it looked as if there was some sort of an exchange he wasn't aware of, being made.Looking through those eyes which had once belonged to him, he realised that the bottom of the place, at least towards the lowers sides was filled with many of the so-called slaves which ran in their circles unaware that they were taken only for this dark purpose.He was one of them now, unable to tell how many of them had been men, hearing nothing but disdain and harsh murmurs as they passed one another by.Such a time as for a checking had arrived, when at once, a beast of high worth had crawled and slipped from one of the holes above. Obviously, that thing was the only one who could take them outside since they were unable to climb themselves and it could fly.Inner wings, outer ones, two big tubes and different ends, it only kept a piece of their appearance but otherwise, the creature seemed as if it had evolved from them.As a matter of fact, once he had been thrown in the hole, he had a slight access to the memory. Warren could see past everything which laid above, and through the various holes, it was obvious that there were others of higher ranks than him.What was that one doing there then? Neither of them could communicate, despite the use of tools.'Interesting, I seem to have been watching you. Still, you've not let go of the other world you've been trapped into.'The words rang in his mind, darkness fading and a light revealed the winged totem of meat and eyes, its beaks waiting, forming some sort of twisted smile that showed some twisted teeth inside, which rang from side to side. Once the small source of sight had come into play he wondered at it, why is that I keep defaulting there, must I be a slave rather than be free?' As I've said before, if you want to gain free access to our city and leave the room, you must give up on your past life before it will absorb you.

We cannot afford some entity of which control, regardless how primitive it is, to spread around and try converting. Now, that you know in what you've set yourself into, why don't you just let go?" I've tried, I swear but it cannot be. That body down there, the abomination I've become, it's what I am, it's what I've been." I looked through your mind's eyes and observed a man, a human, a primate of the sorts, unnerved. Now all that remains if there is even a fragment of what you were, nothing but a tainted slave, a twist of the colony which plans to replace. There's no face for you to see, just a snatch from which multiple eyes come into being. No mouth to feed but openings from which to beg from those who come from above to feed you. Worst of all, your mind had left, whatever part of your which remained there is now dead. Without a doubt, you're next to come, if you don't let go, of you, there will be none." With that said, he went out of his being and seemed to have been lost, just as Warren was set again in the dark. Let go, just let go, don't follow and don't allow it to feed you in the least, you're not a beast any longer but a human, a man, still. A discrepancy between his knees made him feel the pain as strength faded. Something primal had made his hunger just continue in its way just as it was told before. Nothing would go better than that, especially if he had known. Once the feeding tube sealed, the outer shell it bore hardened and his head was slapped, slammed and cracked. He couldn't have let go of it yet as he noticed his world split in half, not dead yet. But the obtrusion from which he saw now looked in two different directions, most importantly, the holes in which the food would be shoved inside now laid brokenly open. Forced on the ground by others, the tube was shoved as far inside as it could be, force-feeding him in the most dreadful manner, in which he couldn't help but bleed from the fact, with its purple and green demeanour, as well as the blue-ish which came from his inner harmony and breaking organs. It was painful but he couldn't puke, there was a self-sealing manner which brought most of the moist walls inside his body to keep the feeding substance from spilling out of his body. Such a taint made him look down and cower in the end. When the one who flew out was done and the others returned to work, he stood there shaking, lifting itself slowly, there was time to work and he would be left behind. Another punishment would be deadly, as he thought of it, as hard as he had known. His body was stolen and got thrown. Without the outside help, he felt that in the room again, the pain and cruelty, mostly the shame remained, to have been exposed in the most dreadful manner, and forced to eat like some sort of dumb creature. Some of his wills were freely fading in the favour of keeping his original body there, making sure it wouldn't be destroyed. It was his first, as it had been, and he was aware that this practice of replacing bodies and repurposing was something which had been used through countless generations and plenty of other races. Just looking at their faces made him realise that it was more than that, there was an element of mindlessness and degeneration which came from some sort of bigger mind, some power which governed over them and whispered. That voice could only be heard now of all times as it attempted to shove images of others, past empires built through other kinds of beings, taller, bigger, stronger and more primal. Other kinds of brutes have been used in order to make different kinds and mostly this was shown in order to draw him in to stay. Without the least of chance, there would've been a conversion if it weren't for the fact that he wasn't blinded by their creations, but rather that he'd seen some sort of agony through which the slaves had gone through. Sooner or later he'd go through the same thing whenever or not he had any desire of living in a place such as it claimed to be. 'I want to leave this body, just free me of these bonds.' He said, with a grin and a dark expression on his face, the man, or what he had been, looked as if he had won and was ready to leave it still. But the whispers continued and told him to stay, that if he would leave, there'd be something for him to pay. Dearly as he had been, he could see the other side decomposing, the human skeleton not fully formed. It was something of a plan which backfired right in front of his eyes and he was aware of every single passing moment of it. Not only he would suffer, but also he could be forced to the point of having to see that there was something to it which couldn't have done him any better. He was to be set against the slaves while the decomposition continued, a painful process which wasn't even close to the dread he was to feel, the lightning outside, shining like the buzzing of an eel. It was deafening to hear the voice, but it had stopped once the being leapt again inside the room. Its head had been a slip and what remained of its eye was barely functioning in its condition, apparently, there had been a fight. 'You need to hide.' It barely spoke, even though it couldn't see that Warren, the human was just as gone as he had been. There was nothing to be seen no longer as a brutally torn mandible came, with its body composed mostly of bones, primal in its approach, carrying a dark touch of grey fire. That thing had enough spines to form a small wardrobe in which it could place and hide its trophies, for which it noticed. At last, it leapt from the other side of the room and shoved two fingers inside the slime, pulling the skull, as dirty of ooze as it had been and throwing the rest outside. He had felt his body dissipate in the air and among the outer blocks of ill material that ran there. Worse was the fact that he had now a view of the creature, as he had become a part of its body, even as the slime found its way through the bones and straight into his orifices, there was little doubt of his intentions. Especially since the bones were charred, his skull came even closer to popping out, looking mightily like the head, the piece which was in control. None would tell, whenever or not this was its head, just as it returned and revealed a chest, under all those bones, the skin was a deeply coloured red, with magnificent forms outside the skin. They looked like bumps of tumours, hidden by the outer armour, from which there popped eyes to see, luckily the armour had been specially made to make sure there'd be cracks everywhere. It gave as much of a sight whenever it went, seeing in every direction, without least of a mention, he wasn't aware what was the deal with it. Could it be that it wasn't actually thinking but rather some sort of instinct-driven mongrel? Whenever this was still a choice laid up to debate. He could feel himself weaken from the work out there, the pain dwelling in his body, then, the pain that came after, seeing those defenceless leapers be taken down. There wasn't any way of avoiding what was going on, some sort of creation he had become, to see them tortured in the least, before the feast. Most bodies had been dragged outside or thrown from the windows in a pile. Other building had been entire sealed, as it seemed this was only a breach in this industry of work. Poor creatures stood there, split from every side, unable to fight back, skulls and heads cracked, faces smacked, a decrepit thing to look at. He wanted nothing more but to close his eyes and waver after seeing that they have all been placed under a net. There'd be a feast this night to come if ever came a day again. But with their spoil, they took the toll and went on the road, no loss of sorts, but he had known himself to be, the only man lost, in agony. But as it seemed, the other side, which was, a woman in her youth exploring, still confused. What was this place, the garden and why did it all seem so conveniently familiar in her eyes? Even the scent of roses, and as far as through the farther parts of nature's wooden labyrinths. 'Oh, you shouldn't go through that way."What's your father doing down the basement?"It came as sudden as surprising as it seemed to be, the eyes of which spoke of the best intentions even though there were things a young lady shouldn't be forced to know. There were things which she remembered happening during the night, things which a lady, again, shouldn't be aware of. Those dreadful sounds of electricity which ended back under the ground where the forces which he delved in didn't belong. More so, she has brushed away to another subject, not likely that she'd ever get the chance the fight back the dreadful, not to be fed with those things which made others suffer. 'It's just dinner, that's all, you need to eat in order to get down on your feet, unless you want to return back on the bed, standing on your back and being ready to be taken ahead.' Nothing of the sort, I think this will suffice for now, the fish is tasty but I cannot find myself likely to touch the chicken. The same old girl which always refused to show compliance, that she knew far too well to ignore or to say no more. Sooner or later she would have to be seen, but already, there was a plan which had been set inside her mind, one which would help her escape this strange place, where she felt as if she didn't belong. And every now and then, she tried glancing below as if to see, right through the pavement, where her father was down, experimenting. Somehow, she could do it, even through mere transparency, and a dull imagery which may or may not has been real. Could it be my imagination? Of that, I could never be sure enough, but I'll try to keep my head clear just in time. To see the man who had brought from a circle, right onto the table a body to look upon, which was freshly dragged from a place which didn't belong to the human world. To say the least, it appeared to have been some eel-like aquatic creature, full in bulk, oily at least by the looks alone. It had four heads at the end which made it seem coloured and formed like a stingray which had wrapped itself against a giant sea cucumber of the sorts. Worst was that below it there was nothing, just as flat at the bottom of a barrel, perhaps to a mere depression. She could see him rotate the plate and pretended to look at the flowers, meanwhile seeing the morbidity the creature displayed when it moved from time to time, hiding something inside of it. The doctors had noticed that and suddenly backed away as if he had become afraid. What were other things there in the dark? The hooks and the way he tried to run and hide made her realise that he wasn't under control. 'Are you feeling right Verona?' 'No, I mean I am feeling right, it's just that, just that I'm trying to.' Her mind was blank and felt o suggestion of what to tell her or how she might finish the sentence if it came to it. Alas, there was little to no distraction when it came to it, at least she was aware enough that she'd be taken back inside her room when it was all over. 'I'm not trying to be rude, but I'm trying to get my space, you know? I've been separated from my sister and I can't seem to be able to set my thoughts straight when you are near. I can't explain the reason behind it, but every time you're near me, I appear to dread every moment and want to be afraid. Something is lost on me and I can't explain what.' Verona's explanation seemed to have stung a little but she understood. Elisabeth was to take the dishes and head inside the house to take care of them alone. 'If this is truly what you want.' There was a level of guilt which had been left behind, more so for the likes of being some sort of jab at her. Nonetheless, it had shown itself to have worked quite well, enough that she would look even more depressed than she had ever been. One deviation came, from the mind, as the creature which was blind and beyond its bottom floor, in the ocean no more. It was some sort of bore to look at it struggle, that's when the doctor came with an axe-like spear, having no fear. It came to like some sort of stab, a cut and a battering as the blunt backside of the weapon started being pushed around each side of the body. This had quickly become a vivisection which had started pushing organs inside, spilling the dirty liquids in its malnourished foul mouth which had barely formed. At the top of the head, it had revealed itself as a smouldering, boiling hole, undoubtedly the way it used to hunt and kill its prey. There wasn't even a doubt of the effects that boiling agent had once it was submerged underwater, or how far the jets of hot blood it threw into the air. It was dangerous enough that the doc back away and let it continue to waste its blood, it had to be depleted sooner or later and seemingly so, it was harming itself more than anything else. He watched as it used its own jets of burning blood cut through its own body in an attempt to end itself and put a stop to the misery. Soon enough the Jets had lost their girth, it was the moment when the birth had begun. From the deepest ends of the body there came, as a defence mechanism in order to protect what came out of it as a sack of skin, pushed forth, more than half of its composition or body mass being pushed forth with whatever else it had inside. It was a last minute attempt to try and save its child, without realising that they would soon come to suffocate. He remembered water, but he wasn't aware of the composition which was required for this type of creature to breathe in. There was a disconnect as he ran to the nearest sink and started filling a small tank he had at the bottom. They would squirm in the sack for some time, as it appeared to have had all the necessary liquids to keep them alive. Sooner or later though, there would be a need to put them in a proper home, one of which wouldn't have them slain or taken away in another stack of corpses, left to rot near their mother. The substance was unobtainable by a long shot, leaving him with nothing but a crude attempt to get at it. The sulfuric or chlorohidic acid which might've done more harm than anything else made him aware that there could be another element which was unknown to humans. Regardless of which, he cleaned the tank with the acid and carried the small tank towards the ankh which laid in the corcle. He wasn't too keen on doing the ritual again, but it hadn't ended and the line between reality and that cruel other world was near enough to be crushed by the hand. Without a doubt of fear of making a sort of mistake, he pronounced the incantation and seemed to have opened something of a small bubble in the dark, the dirt having become soft enough to have itself be released under his very own eyes. 'This is it, open Bahlinor, give me the chance to enter your world.' What came after were some words of which couldn't be written or set down, as not to reveal something as dreadful as the visions the incantations have set. With the least of senses kept out there, the bubble was poked with a long and sharp fire iron, which left a small stream of the water-soluble thing in which that race had to swim. Time was important and the end was coming as near as he was aware of it, leaving little to the imagination as for what came next after the portal closed. It was heavy enough but he managed just well enough by himself, unable to show fear. By the time he reached the table, it seemed that the creature had been sucked off a lot of its own fluids and that the bubble in which the children laid expanded. 'Well, it would seem that for now, I'll have decided to try and feed you to your own. That is to say, living specimens of your own race are far more important and helpful to my research than a dying old breed which almost managed to harm itself and its offsprings.' That was the perfect spot as well, on the table, without a shimmer of doubt, that a way of perfect extraction was unattainable.

He had to cut through with a butcher's knife, leaving a grand noise come out of it. Distressed wasn't enough to describe what it actually looked like, at least not in the way he had thought it to be. To say the least, there'd be a feast of the sort as soon as they entered and they had been thrown, a piece of their mother was already gone. Bastards ate it all with the least of shame, the tentacle and the tubes had been gone. Little monsters had not even the decency as to prove him as the instinctually opened themselves and spread their degeneracy everywhere around the body upon which they attached themselves to. That was, to say the least fascinating, to look upon a newly discovered species and to somehow guide towards their own kind spreading. It was dreadfully close to looking real in the way he thought. Enough to make him carry their mother in the cooling unit along the others. A small room, which was cold, not enough to freeze everything but enough to keep it long enough as for the meat to last for months or even years. He had nightmares of that room, there had been plenty amongst the days he closed himself inside the laboratory. Even when eating and surrounded by the sight of his daughters made him feel uneasy as if to think that either of them would attempt to enter his laboratory and harm his poor mind. Worse was how either of them would come close to being lost, being so at any cost would be dangerous as if to hear a moan. It disturbed him as well as them, when they met around the garden, the moan was heard. Some big animal, though it couldn't be, that he was aware of the portal being closed, he had done it, at least he knew, but now he was met by two pairs of sights he couldn't forget. Sweat was running past his shirt and as he tried to say a thing or to excuse himself, Verona started. 'Are you feeling all right? What is it you're keeping down there? The sounds that I hear come not even close to an elephant in pain, a dreadful moan that both of us have heard.' He was being interrogated, at least the way it seemed to have left an impact on him made him rather uneasy. 'I can explain, I think, it's a misunderstanding of the sorts, I tell you, there's nothing there, other than the sounds of the basement and the wind tunnel underneath. They are caves you see, under the mansion, and their walls as so thin that wind travels underneath at an unfathomable pace.' 'I see.' Answered Verona, seemingly drawn to the idea that there was more to explore below than there had been everywhere around. After all, they had been surrounded by nothing as far as to ask. 'Is there a town where I may walk towards? Elisabeth seems to be so secretive towards everything that I cannot say whenever or not there's something else around or not. At least to be called as such was enough to wager some kind of thoughts exchange for the others. That's great enough of an idea my dear, be a kind spirit Ellie and take her to the town.' 'You mean on foot, all by myself?' 'Do as I say.' The doctor said with somewhat of a decrepit tone, he looked worn off and hadn't the time to argue in the least. From the least, he knew there was some kind of beast which had escaped there and his time was wasted on some kind of banter. 'Very well father, but if something happens and somehow she'll get lost, it will be on your hands.' There were pity and disdain, but it was something to be accepted far longer than she had been awake, ever since being a child, there was something which made her more anxious, especially near a lot of people. 'It would be worse for you to stay, remember that as well when you make your way back to civilisation.' His eyes were weary and filled with damnation, little doubt being in the manner of fact that there wasn't any way for him to do anything else about that. As soon as they came out of sight, he returned to his senses and went towards his destination. More than his lips remained dried, including his deep guts at the thought that he forgot to take the idol away, meaning that any kind of abomination could've crawled inside without him knowing, either of which would've made him even less than aware. He was there. One look it took for him to realise that the portal had only partially opened then closed, beheading another one of them, who stood there without a body, meaning. Such a gentle body, slippery and clean, with a white-coloured blood, spreading across the floor and dissipating in a disparaging way. Clearly, there was little one could do to ease the pain, leaving only but an option to get through, the slaying of the creature and the feast. It wouldn't take long, though he had little desire to harm the carcass, he analyzed and managed to tell, something wasn't in there as well. Other than being the same species of the previous creature, this one seemed to have been taller and wider, perhaps a male? 'I will be gentle, just trust me in this.' His voice had the calmest tone, almost serene, before long he realised that this half of creature wasn't dead yet. His thoughts came into play, thinking well enough that there might've been a malformation, some mutation which kept it alive. It had shown no signs of dying as of yet, that much was clear to him, little to which could've been unknown to others. Stretching along, he came by the side, trying to avoid direct contact and being in danger, he pushed his foot and kicked the small idol, the ankh, that dreaded symbol which opened the portal to the other world. He now saw himself in the reflection of a sealed side. It looked as if from behind, as it stopped bleeding, there was some kind of opening of tubes and wires, all of which were deep as well as they were part of the organism, waiting to be connected with something as well. 'Worry not, for I shall take care of you now, just wait as I bring you what you need.' With the moving table within reach, he placed a second pair of gloves on and used the metal incisors to grab around the creature's waist and place it on before realising he had failed. It bounced against the ground as the weight revealed itself, leaving but another hard moan which echoes across the room. 'Shh, Shh, don't make that no more, I'll try to be gentle then next time I'm taking care of you.' But it wouldn't do, as he had noticed, even with the table stretched and rotate to face the ground, the heaviness would make it slide. It had to be at a feet level, but there wasn't anyway. 'There's no need for this any longer then, I shall experiment on you while on the ground.' As it were, to be said, at least, there was to be an opening underneath the creature, which would open as soon as it was turned on its back. That was dangerous because the agents the race kept spewing in the air. Though something still crept into him, mostly being the fact that it appeared to be well, unable to struggle because of the lack of air. It should've felt its effects by now, but that wasn't going to happen any less than now. When the moment came, he pulled a barrel, glass replaced, the morphine-like acid, deep inside, laying there after being re-boiled in the morning. This should counter whatever agent it had inside, if only he had it replaced and numbed the organ which produced that dangerous weapon which laid beyond any of his awareness. This had to be done farther from the circle, just in case something may come out of this experiment, the circle had been too hard to create and way too invaluable to abandon. He looked into the many revealed eyes that it appeared to spread, as long globes, the skin tightening around, but showing no sign of dying. It was far too pale to be considered living, far too lurid to be considered an animal and receive any kind of mercy. After a small hook was taken from a small machine, from which laid a chain attached, he shoved it inside, right into the underside and pulled one of the chains as if to start the machine. Slowly it was dragged on the ground, pulling a hard muscle, leaving a trail which bore with it a stench which was unrecognisable to the human senses. Somehow it had been open and he had to know, as he quickly turned it around, without care of the danger which laid there, he realised how much lighter it had felt. More than that, a dreadful reveal, as the opening had inside the ribs of a man, a human, a primate laying inside, keeping some pseudo-human-aquatic terror hybrid on the bottom of his laboratory. Those eyes never stopped turning and adjusting, clearly watching him as if to see his every move and figure out whenever he'd do something dangerous which would creep inside his mind, leaving him with some dreadful injury. 'Enough of his, I need of you nothing but compliance, no more.' But he touched his forehead, without realising that he had touched the creature. In his mind, he realised just how sloppy he was and threw the gloves, went to the sink and rubbed himself with alcohol. Some of it was burnt off and he could feel the heat just bursting across his face. Somewhat unable to resist the substance, it gave him an idea of how he might subdue the fiend in the best of ways. Whenever or not that was intentional, he couldn't tell, nor had he cared about what was to happen once he left the room. But that carcass there was living as he knew it, and even those breeds of the same race appeared to be frightened by the moans. Never ending, oh the noise, it was just as disturbed as to look upon its body with its own dreadful eyes. It had become more human than the previous experiment, that much was known as well as it was written in his small book of notes. Right under the previously acquired specimen, the offsprings of which might have to be documented later, once they have been thoroughly analyzed and documented separately from the dead. But this was different, at least from any other, it looked almost as if had come not through the summoning portal but through the same way that visitor had arrived that dreadful night. A hairy beast which seemed almost intelligent, the fear of which damnation could never have been stopped if it were for it to attack. As a leper on a strike, he wrote endlessly, that he noticed, now in the way it acted moved. 'And remained alive through the course of my experiments, which included but not in the least booked out the opportunity to attempt unearthly types of substances which shouldn't have belonged to no man. That list included acids, specially conditioned that they would sustain some kind of prolonged injury when applied to the skin and inner tissue. Everything got worse with the decline of an attempt to mix them up directly into the body he had. 'With little to no creeping inside the matter, he had become conscious that he was watched now after he had poisoned and in a sick disturbing way to explain what he was doing, tortured the being, his every move was followed. Many of those eyes seemed to have produced something which might've been called tears if it wasn't for the fact that there wasn't any proof whatsoever that there was some kind of tear duct canal. An involuntary reaction to pain, though it was getting late, that demonical piece of meat and bone had to be chained, from around, before the real experimentation could begin. Though it had been cold, both of the women had worn their jackets, leather that couldn't be felt through the cold, rather than its warmth and bond. 'That's where we're going to, just please, don't mention anything of what you've seen to any of them, you know how people tend to react to stories. And whatever you do, never leave my sight and don't try speaking to any man in the vicinity, as long as we're here, it's expected of us to behave. 'Such a bore, the woman felt worse than her sister, much more so since she expected me to follow every single command. Some air of authority which emanated from within seemed to have dictated her to do as she was called onto. But what was wrong with this small town? If it could be called this way, the wall for starters was dreadfully high. There were chains and metal rods at the top of which, it seemed to have guided many types of formations of steel, that would chill the air above. 'Was that supposed to be here?' 'No, I presume not, people have always been reclusive here but not in that sense, or at least not at this level. 'After a glance, there wasn't any guard, but a post which had been left there to be watched and grasped at. With little to no regard for her own sake, she took Verona by the hand and came by the wall inside. The dirt was still there, after the rain, the buildings looked still more primal as if they had belonged to some village which, in its place belonged to some distant lord living in its castle. Worse was the fact that a lot of the people around recognised both of them, especially as ruffled as she appeared to be. 'Greetings, Elisabeth, Verona, it's been a while since we last met. 'Myse, you're here, after all these years, I thought you would've left a long time ago. 'I thought that myself for the longest time, but that was before I woke up and found myself bearing a child, you know? It's never the same once you go that path, there some things you can never run away from. 'Her dress was a dirty grey and she wore a white apron, her face still managed to shine like the diamond it was, with her pale green eyes, red locks and smile. She seemed forlorn, caught in awe that she saw both of them together, reunited, but was saddened by the fact. 'Is she still.' 'Yes, yes she is, I'm afraid that I've lost all hope now, there's nothing I can do to bring her back. Neither I nor our father.' 'Is he still working on the inventions down there?' A simple nod was enough, but she had become alarmed by the fact that people had begun staring at both of them. Somehow both of them were in the heart of the city, dreading every moment, before being offered an invitation. Properly so. 'Verona, would you like to visit my home, as a guest of a kind? I don't know if you know who I am.' 'You're the lady with the flowers on her chest, I think. When you were younger, you used to wear them until they would crook and wither.' Both of them were surprised at the fact that she remembered that, more than that, she actually spoke. There wasn't any shyness nor any attempt to hide away from the first person who started the conversation. It was nothing but contempt over the fact that she had somehow remembered despite everything that happened. With a pleased smile, she signed to follow. But something more so disturbed them so, the presence which had signalled danger in the town, that giant tower from afar, which brought the memory of something much darker, henceforth ignored. But she couldn't stop thinking about it and what it truly meant for her, there was something beyond any kind of hope which came, something dreadful about it, and how it threatened to sprout legs and move. That was it, the image was clear, as she hung to her life dearly. There had been previous nightmares the nights before but never had she felt the fear she had shown now, especially since there was nothing more frightful than what she saw in front of her eyes. A mad perfection of black stone which raised to a perfectly shaped pyramidal top. As she went farther to the woman's house, it would've become obvious that the tower would somehow manage to block the sun and take her sight away unless she showed a sign of restraint. The pain went into her guts, she couldn't move at one, bleeding from below, approached by many from everywhere around as it to see. 'I'm a doctor, make way for me at once.' Elisabeth seemed just as shocked, everyone looked surprised, not only because something bad has happened but also because they recognised her. This woman was some sort of known being, taken from under, touched by a colder hand, it was something which couldn't be helped. 'Help me take her inside, there.' The doctor pointed at one of the closest houses, at least one of the ones he had visited and helped. 'I'll speak with the man of the house, he owes me a favour, I'm sure of it.' With that, they followed and done as they were told, not one of them ready to fold or to leave the girl lying there, like some sick animal bursting into tears. I know you're the one causing this much pain to me, oh dark tower, I've known you since I came into this world. You're going to take me and drag me down into your world of sunken dreams and misery. At once her thoughts were taken away as the doctor was done speaking and got her inside, fresh pillows on the way, there was some sort of pain inside. 'Where does it hurt my dear? Bring hot towels now, and something softer for her knees. I'll need you to cooperate as well, as her sister, you're the closest thing that she might hold onto.' Her ears rang, and it almost looked like her eyes seemed of a new kind of confusion. They were almost entirely white, the speed with transparent shades around the pupil. It couldn't be that this Elisabeth and Lisa be the same person, as it were, yes, much older, much, much older than she had remembered. As a matter of fact, a lot of what she remembered of her had remained in the past, lost from any sort of grasp. 'So you're my sister, huh?' 'The one and only.' Tears ran down her face once she realised that her only sister might be approaching something of an abrupt end, for which there might be nothing to be made. 'Why haven't you told me sooner? There's so much I would've liked to know.' 'I couldn't, my dear, you were always caught in your own world, and in moments of pure sanity, you were the most vulnerable of all. Oh, I was afraid that telling you anything might disturb whatever fragment of your mind was there.'Unluckily so, it seemed to be, that pain had reached her body as well. It was unexplainable, what the doctor had seen, some sort of symbiosis, a black whelch which grew inside and spread from the rear and the main entry, sealing her entires but leaving the blood get through.'Stop stooping and bring me what I've asked for, this isn't a show."Will she live dr. Glissard? Can she get past this in one piece or is it just a waste of time?"In my thirty years of practice I've never seen something that much alike, my dear, I'm afraid that the only thing I could try doing is manually removing it, if not I could only ease the pain as this goes on."But what if this doesn't stop? It cannot be that I may look upon myself again, knowing I left my dying sister that way."There's no need for the four of you in here any longer, please leave, we need to let her breathe.'It was clear enough that only the man who had still been gone to gather everything he needed, himself, and another woman other than Elisabeth and Verona.She would act as one of the nurses since the sister was far too gone into the thought of losing her to be useful in any way whatsoever. It was a matter of life and death and the patient laid no sign that she was fighting back this growth inside of her.Another slam against the rock and the slavery had begun again. He was tainted, as a man would be, split into two halves, neither of which was human, to begin with.His skull had grown an eye, eerily watching around, trying to shoot a glance from here and there, being brought to their functional home, a throne of mighty being, carved in some kind of stone.They built it by themselves with tools of steel and completed the construction under the giant bones, remains of their greatest God, and as they made their way to the most primal, he saw that the bones weren't white but dark and orange, stricken with the green of famine. That thing almost looked alive, ready to strike at him, with its two giant green globes of green, not to be seen by no human being.Yet he felt that he was losing control of the mindless creature which laid on the other side.Without a way to recover his body, he was cursed to live the rest of his days as a watcher with no arms or legs. Nothing to feel with, nothing to be content about, only the memory of that warm morbid corpse he felt.The misery of which brought him much distaste for he desired to be in its presence again.To feel that embrace, not to be under the fear of a land of dark stone, above a desert dom, which spread as far as to the sea, which was in sight, ready to be taken by the dunes. They spelt under the shades, unravelling all their bones next to them, as they slept in the small holes that had been dug inside the stone. It was a surprise to see their slender and weak bodies, especially after seeing how much damage was done and how many things they stole.With tails dangling and arms and legs just as long as their bodies were, it seemed like their brains would've been limited to their size. But what they couldn't handle in their mass, they made it through the ferocity that they displayed. It made him wonder if these things even though, for in their current passive form they acted mightly neutral, with no sign of aggression, especially against one another. He was surprised but remembered that every place had some thing or creature, object or machine which controlled lower lifeforms and enslaves them. Could it be any different out here?They all went to sleep, including the slaves on the other side of the world, which gave him the perfect opportunity since he felt none of the needs for survival. His bones attached immediately down the neck, to a spine which had belonged to another creature, same with arms, the claws and lack of real wings as they were replaced with long bones, sharp, but they moved.A pair of legs which attached gave him the impression that he had become like them, or at least would've if it weren't for the foreign elements inside.Worst of all was the fact of what he had become, a winged skeleton which couldn't fly, unable to return because of the fear that retaliation might arrive.He came to run down the slope, not towards the dune but towards the unknown.The sight before him was strange but better, he could see through the dark much better, but something stopped him there, before. He couldn't just leave them alive while they prepared to go forth. He hadn't paid any attention but they have eaten one or more of those fiends, especially since there wasn't a thing that could be said about it, none got the chance to enjoy the rest. During the night, a bone of spear came from above and took their lives in silence, without giving them a chance or a making way for them to be defended. But that wasn't what he did alone, as he made sure some would get punished. I'm only doing this to prove a point. He said as he started carrying boulders, heavy as they were, placing them upon the holes and blocking any of the access out. Soon they would wake to realise the lack of air and without a doubt, won't be able to escape in time. It was dreadfully fair, but he was done, most of these creatures, weak as they were got punished, even if something hadn't felt right. Without the fight in return, he felt guilty, flapping his long spears behind, trying to see if there was any chance to achieve flight. To no avail, he felt like a small demon, a creature of bones which had somehow done something wrong, that it wasn't their fault. But who is it that controls them here? Who has taken, if it may be true, controlling their minds, listening. He had become aware of something big and leathery jerking, instincts kicking in despite not having a functional brain on this side. He bows and took a vile position in the pile of bones and watched. That long twisting flying worm of many faces, vile forms turned into a triangle, then into a sphere and floated madly before taking the form of a dark succour of mightily long and thin cylinders which stretched from a flat circle. Small openings came from each of those forms and moved in every direction as if to check what happened, all of them were dead. He'd been right all along, he wasn't mad and it was coming, all the while to the point where this creature was terrorising the poor mongrels in their factories, alas. Now that it was settled, he looked strangely at what he'd done, as pumping some sort of liquid had worked and turned their head into big shallow, hardened points of meat, which made them obey even after their deaths. It was unclear whenever or not something happened between this exchange but moments later it came out of its hole and seemed to walk up again. Despite what it seemed, this creature didn't look passive any longer, but rather aggressive from the get-go. From inside of its spine and back sprouted another tail, coming out from a cluster of bones, mutations which shouldn't have belonged, but this was their version of revival after all. None could complain about being brought to life, even if it meant getting on with the defects. A plump fat one came from the hole, growing another deformed face and multiple long legs across its body which made it look like a mutated grasshopper. One, in particular, had been too slammed to be pushed to the realisation that something worked inside. Pieces of its skin grew inward, there had to be a cut along the head, which wasn't needed any longer, as well as some other parts discarded. Out of all of them, this had become the worst, an abomination which grew tails from every part removed. It was a wonder how it kept on working despite every defect which pushed it to be what it was now. A frightful approach came, as the boulders were shoved or thrown by the side and the small creatures adapted and survived. It was some sort of dreadful miracle for what happened next came to a danger which couldn't have been. For started it had taken its original worm form, crawling with its brown rigs, twisting and mashing its form, extending and pretending to not have been aware. It was so close that it almost felt as if it could hear the thought. Perhaps it had, though there was no certainty to it. Too much of its time was spent upon trying to see whenever or not he was alive, unable to notice, the littlest twitch which happened, for in its mind, he was already dead, no longer alive. He had become some sort of creature beyond the living, much more so, hidden inside a skull he laid such as a slime would, trying to stray from the powers that thing had. It was done, no more checking as he had escaped, without a chance to be seen, as his fate had seen it through, suddenly his skull was bashed and it was done. For now, at least, he had been awakened in the slave body, sleeping among others in the small hole they had been set. Some of his minds were left there but other things in his brain, he did forget, the hit was heavy. Even now his ears rang, a piece of his brain must've flattened, though he heard to whispers of control. He wanted to feel more than that, but there wasn't any way for him to escape, as he had become aware, the ledge above was way too high, and without help, he wouldn't be able to climb. A dreadful thing he had done, with a small tool, its sharp end came, he didn't proceed to kill them yet. No, this wouldn't work, don't think about it, they're not as defenceless and you won't be as quick as you think. Professor Warren felt like comforting himself in the least as much as it helped him cope with the fact that he used the metal pick to pull their bodies and push them closer to one another. It didn't have to be perfect but at least one had awakened. His pincers started cracking as one another and his poses had been slowed. There was a clear amount of danger and a threatening pose that creature took, as it to defend its territory, strangely, it hadn't picked anything off the ground, no hammer, nor a second tool. It acted like an animal, trying to move back and forth and look as threateningly as it could. 'Suffer.' He attempted to say, but his voice sounded barely close to it, though, despite the distortion, it came out as a human would, creeping in through until it suddenly retreated in a corner. It was much to his awareness that it would return to fight him back despite every muttering, for what he was doing was highly disturbing to it, to look upon a dissatisfied stacked pile. Nonetheless, it was time for an attempt, as he slowly touched the hard areas, avoiding the soft ones, he had come to the point of shoving the pick inside the edges of the hole. 'This is it.' Warren said, and it was almost as if he had called his magnificent pet, for he had come and grabbed him by a few of his legs, trying to hold on. But this wasn't as much as an aggressive move, more like another attempt for him to escape as well, struggling way too much as he had done. Other woke up immediately, making it seem like there wouldn't be another chance. Each and every creature started imitating the crab-like behaviour, pushing their long extrusions from behind now and pushing out sharp stones around. It was a dreadful thing which cropped the cave. For what were this purposes now? Small stones had been expelled from their insides, which planted themselves and crushed the stone at an invisible level, dropping at least twenty feet below into a dark hole he couldn't see through. This violent end had been caused by him, who sat there, holding to the metal pick. Below of which, the creature stood and waited, just as a patient. I need to escape, no matter the cost. He thought, seeing how it barely held to a few of his feet together. Just in reach for him to act, he started chopping with his pincers, first few legs and it already lost balance. A painful string of sharp and dull pain came, without a doubt, the result of being almost taken down. His body started pulling pieces of itself as well. This is when his behaviour started being imitated but for a different reason altogether. The creature knew it was to be abandoned as it thought it would bring both of them down, as it proceeded to do the only thing which showed a sign of understanding and a fragment of intelligence despite being too far gone. It started cracking and smashing cutting at the joints with the piece that was free. Soon enough, the outer-shell and its protection had fallen into the abyss. There it stood, nakedly trying to hold onto him, without realising that one of its pincers and all of its legs had fallen. Oh you dreadful thing, couldn't you have realised that the shell was holding your body together? No longer had it stood there that it seemed to have fallen down the line, taken by the blind sea of darkness and right into the damp hole where he had gone. Now it was his chance, the victory, trying to climb, little by little, inch by inch until he got inside the tight hole from which he had been thrown. From there, it was tight enough around for him to climb and walk forth towards his escape. Without the light peering in he guided himself by touch, soon enough he would find himself going through mazes he didn't, he couldn't have imagined in the least. The pain, as the woman screamed, it was almost as if that dark globe inside of her started as the doctors as more of them had come inside the house. It almost seemed like a conference than anything else, each of them equipped with a certain tool, looking forth. Who was this girl and what was her worth? That was the main inquiry as they had wondered what had happened to her to have reached this level of being filled with the fuel of damnation. Some previous attempts have managed to push pins or long metal strips right through the infected area to no avail. The definite intervention had to be made, in a way which might break the woman beyond any kind of repair, leaving but a single chance to make things right. Nothing could've signalled that there was something bright. But there was something inside, such as it was never seen, generating some light when poked, a device most likely. It was strange, beyond that, to look at what happened, but the first of many conclusions which had been reached became. 'Someone must've planed a device inside of her, which generated all that black sludge.' Said doctor Eugliass, while cleaning his only monocle with no shame, with the reason of taking another look at what was inside. He reached another one before his fellows even got the chance. 'I might even conclude, on my behalf that the device inside of her might somehow be alive as I managed to notice some twitch of a kind. That would be all, as far as I should know.' 'But how do we remove it, how can we save my dear sister? I've never seen this type of thing before.' 'Calm down, sister you say? You don't suppose you could show us yours as well, for a strictly scientific reason, it could run in the family after all.' They laughed as if something amusing was muttered, some unable to hide wide grins while she remained peeved at the fact that they were not treating her sister with the respected she deserved. Hours passed until they brought, two metal reachers, from which they forced inside with the strongest grip, from which the woman woke up in a scream, surrounded by a group of moustached and bearded, an eccentric-looking pair of men. The natural reaction was, obviously as it went on, for her to shout at loudly as she could, shifting around in her chair, looking over, only to find Lisa standing there, all young. With her sight deluded, she found the others grabbing and holding her down. 'No, let go of me, Lisa, Lisa!' Gagged her with a piece of cloth wasn't the best idea, but neither was the substance which dripped on her tongue and directly through her throat. 'What have you done to her?' 'Nothing harmful, I must assure you, rather something to calm her down so she wouldn't disturb us with our removal. It needs only the most minute accuracy in order to push it out and the patient must go ahead and be put to sleep.' 'Degenerate old man, she thought, as it was obvious that it wasn't the piece of cloth which made her lose her consciousness. He stung her with a needle, but the reason for which he hid it away was unknown to her. Other than the substance being illegal, she was aware of the mark just inside the armpit, making it seem mightly reassuring that she wasn't about to wake. They all looked content and gay about this entire problem, without doing much to help in the first place. 'Aren't you going to help in any other way?' 'We'll leave the blacksmiths for now take care of what's inside of her, after which and only after, we'll be able to find out whenever or not something went wrong.' A procedure that took over an hour and took everyone by surprise, from inside of her, there came out a small idol, followed by the black pool which had become from the solid sludge which had managed to clog her every entry. 'What's that then?' Both the blacksmiths that came dropped it on the floor once it started moving a few steps and fell to the ground. One of them managed to grab it and feel around. No, it couldn't be, I saw it moving, but now. It was obvious that the legs had no joints, neither a way to move. Everything which had been witnessed had been a play of their minds, more important than that being the woman, who had to be covered by a blanket as her sister asked. 'You two, get out, as well as you and the others.' But what about the experimentation? I mean the testing for which to see if she's going to be fine or not? 'Only one of you stays now, I need her to be well, not to be laughed or peered at by a group of useless men.' 'Very well, lady, I for one will take my expertise elsewhere.' 'I haven't needed to come here in the first place.' Said another, just as they pushed their way through, quite peeved of all, before leaving the three of them alone inside the room. He had been the only one to bring a small box of medical tools, among another kind of stuff. 'Do you deal with this kind of problem often?' 'I'll be honest, I don't think I've ever seen anything like that before, I don't think anyone of the medical worlds has even heard of such a happening. But if I were you, I'd stay away from that thing as far as possible, no touching, no gazing, as a matter of fact.' He pulled another woollen blanket and threw it on top of that small idol. It wasn't something to be looked upon or even interacted with. There'd be trouble for as long as it leered there, threatening to crawl away and into another. Just the thought alone seemed to bring a disturbance in his work, but he had to look anyway. For once it could be said that she was clean, pure, not even the slightest hiccup when it came to her condition. It looked as if she hadn't been touched at all, or pushed and pulled or even dealt with. 'Your sister's healthy enough as it seems like her body rejected it entirely.' 'Are you sure she's well? There's no chance another one of those things might?' Another one had she said? The words surprised her as well. How could she think of such dreadful things now? It was the first time her sister had shown signs of being well and there wasn't any way to tell. 'I can only make sure she's stabilised enough to get through whatever this thing was, as long as she doesn't come into contact with that thing.' Though she was aware of the dangers behind the small statue, her instincts couldn't kick in fast enough, as she said. 'No need to throw it away, I'll take it and make sure no one will get affected by it. Trust me, I know what if something happens, there's someone who'll know what to do with it when the time comes for a chance.' He bobbed his head and didn't try sugarcoating it, at least he wasn't sure there wasn't any reason not to be afraid. Soon enough, both of the women were transported alongside the idol which had been hidden in Elisabeth's pouch, alongside the road and back towards their house where they belonged. The road was weary and the truck in the back of which they stood was old enough to be called a centenary machine. Black smoke coming out of it, and from the sounds of which it made, there came a fever day-dream in the poor girl's mind. She stood there with the image of a great tall block of metal, standing like a tower, walking in the distance. There had been a lot of noise which grabbed at wrists and seemed to have taken everyone at unaware, despite the sings of 'beware' which laid on both sides of the road. Neither of which had been there nor was the sky a pale desaturated yellow. It felt as if all of the sudden they had entered the zone of a civil war. Some old artillery laid far away, partially destroyed, for its attempt at annihilation had been long-delayed so it wouldn't cause any harm whatsoever. 'Let the Delta regiment fall in, fall in!' A man shouted and there came the sounds of drums, of bottles of rum, but most importantly of firing guns. The bullets flew right through the planes which had taken off, from the looks of which it was determined that not only had the pest won, but man against man started fighting one another. Such were the likes of which, dragged them by their wrists to push forth what was much worse. The end of everything was at the head. 'Let go of me, they'll take me next, I won't be able to escape this way. They see us, can't you see we've been noticed?"Two towering malformations followed them as if something which had belonged to them allowed for their sight to somehow come into their world and see everything they saw.It was an uncertainty whenever or not they could interact with them, or whenever or not it'd be just some mad vision which crept into her mind.The dark pools from below started rising from many holes which had been dug from the ground. Nothing could make them be that way or be able to say anything about the control which had occurred.The minds of men didn't belong to them. It was something which crept inside the great box from which the many voices came and were locked. Many things inside of it seemed to creep, but most of all, as the worst had to be called, was the fact that there was a dreadful way to show the pain.Verona suffered and tried to look away, convulsing violently so that the car had to stop and she was to be taken off.By the side of the road, she didn't only empty her stomach, but managed to get a cruel sting against the bushes. The dirt was pale. She couldn't even hold it between her fingers before realising it wasn't dirt. What she had between her fingers were the ashes of fallen men as well as the stones coming from the ruins. She slapped herself in order to prevent hysteria, immediately snapping back to reality. Old unfinished buildings rested in the distance. Soon enough, she realised there was no danger. Only that tower which crept in the small village, worse than that was the fact that she realised that there were two twin towers there.Since when was there another tower? Verona couldn't handle that fact alone, as it crept into her mind. The mist and the slight rain, the pain, but she was close."Thank you but I think we'll make it from here."Are you sure ma'am, I wouldn't want to be responsible for."I said I would take it from here and thank you but I couldn't ask you to drive through this weather, not when the road is so far worse ahead. We'd only put you as well as ourselves in danger if we were to continue."I understand, well, I wish you luck ladies, with, whatever this was that happened."They departed from one another in a strange manner, awkward at best, to look upon the future which had done much worse for Verona than anything else. No injury could've been taken from her, as they walked, arm to arm, shoulder holstered, with little to see.'It was a night like this, I remember when I lost you, Lisa.'Again, the voice, the tone, the name, everything matched. She tried doing something else but only watched.The confident manner in which she held herself almost screamed at what had happened but somehow it felt as if she returned.Her sister was there with her, both in the body and in mind. It felt as if she had lost her vision a long time ago and only now she had become no longer blind. It was a sign, she was sure, but the mist was moist and distracting, they followed the fence of dark wood, never glancing back. Something was dragging itself behind, and for a moment of focus, Elisabeth realised that it wasn't the man who had returned that followed them. Nothing was said to her sister yet, as she was far too hurt for anything to be done about that.Clearly, something was wrong, neither of them was strong enough to face an enemy of that calibre alone, that was certain.Surely, no one would dare follow them through the holes which just stood there.Elisabeth thought as she took a wager with herself, after all, she had to know and be aware of her surroundings. No, that was out of the question, there wasn't any way for her to see past the thickness of the mist.Without a doubt, there was less than enough information which laid around, to truly know and to have grown out of it.Neither could she wait still, for that mystique object, the dark form was approaching without warning and with little to no voice.Only its lurid sound could be heard, the wetness that splashed as it dragged itself closer to that point where she could do nought but succumb to the worst of dangers. Be absorbed, something called upon her, and once the realisation kicked in that it served more like a warning than anything else, she came to be content with going into those holes. Conveniently so, she took herself and her sister under a bed of branches and hid there. It took a while of looking from under this so-called veil of mist to realise that it wasn't so. Under it, past a level of comfort, everything became clear as well as it had become bizarre. Above her sight, there was a flatness, a layer of misty grey-like as well as the wormish type of disks that floated and overlapped upon one another. It was the first time she had glanced at the thing which ran below and kept the greyish worm-disks from falling below. A dreadful mammal, which dragged itself with little water, from its body came to those dreadful disks, as an opening in the back made it even more clear that she had cared to realise. That thing had created its own moisture, only to survive in that dreadful world and to make certain that there was no one around to peer upon it. Two, perhaps three more of them followed, slapping each other with their farm forms, pushing their dreadful manners and eyeless sharps around, for their legs, if they could be called so were deemed to be inopportune to their true form. More holes laid on the sides, and the joints as well as the bones still laid at far ends. Please, let this madness end, does not make them come any closer, I wish I would stay away from that which creeps inside my thoughts, to be able to go beyond that of which bring the dread into action. Danger rang, something was wrong, and another one who was much stronger came into play. The others feigned at the sight, and it had become clear enough that the one who walked on two legs like a man had taken upon himself to a sickening approach and sip their disks with its overly thrown exposure. They would suffocate if it kept on, little to no denying was left into that, and none could tell him otherwise. Why must we watch this so closely? Elisabeth asked herself but knew that she had already reached the end of that hole in which she stood. It wasn't so to be called, but the hole got moist, for a river ran under, or to say the least, there had been some source of water underground, alas. There wasn't anything to say no more, as both her shout and the awakening of Verona came to be. It wasn't the fact that they suffocated which had made it bittersweet, but rather the strangeness of it all, which crept inside her guts for one last moment of her life. Why have I taken the idol, it's all because of it. Her last thoughts before she saw the dreaded beasts for which she thought they might've been dead. Without a doubt, there was at least a chance that suffering would end. Not yet, though, as it arrived in its own hole, after feigning to be dead, that creature pushed itself inside and opened its body, splitting in half as if to encompass her with the spiral which had been dragged for far too long. It had become fat and sharp, but a span in a loud manner, which took it upon its own to destroy its surrounding. This was its own plane, its own field, there was little doubt about the fact that there was a chance of having to strike. For at least the likes of which they both had their hearts failing, there was the little answer as to what happened next. Such as the so-called mist dissipated and their shouts and screams had never been heard. Many of the nests were hidden and showed no sign of reapproaching, at least not until they finished the meat they had shared, non-human was spared. Even more dreadful had it come to be, that Warren was slowly being taken over on the other side, his mind was little in his control than it had matter, despite being able to drag himself as far from the hole as he had been. Without help, there was little to tell about the strangeness he felt, as he had become unaware of his surroundings. What had happened on the way here? He found himself struggling inside the pool, with no one to drag him back towards the top. Surely drowning alone wasn't what he was planning but little to no danger was what he was aiming for. One last thing before he had to come to be, there was one person he had dreamt of in his nights of dread, that much of his morbid curiosity which needed to be felt. He saw her through his vision and glare, standing there at the bottom, unable to float there he attempted to grab as many of the pieces of furniture which laid at the bottom, as to come. Closer by the minute, he pressed on, knowing that the skull had been shuttered on the other side, he was discovered there and he had known that whatever force governed here, it communicated with the worm there. It had to be, he knew that might've been the answer, for which there wasn't a thing to be done, he'd be gone otherwise, he couldn't tell otherwise, taken by surprise, he took it upon himself to take the grandest smile. A grin to be certain, without mistake, something to take wasn't as well as he had thought of what would come next. Perhaps his wish and utmost desire were fulfilled and she had been brought to life in order to comfort him for the little he had. It had been far too sudden that he knew it to be true, he'd been crippled and already reached the bottom when the force that's been dragging him stopped. There wasn't a chance for him since the beginning, now at the mercy of a corpse which remembered, there came a reckoning of some sort, it was unfair for him to be treated this way. 'I've done nothing to be ashamed of and I refuse to be a slave.' One small push in the hole from which the sound came and it had been covered entirely by her finger. This was it, what he desired, looking upon her majesty, her rotten body, now revealed. It was a corpse he was after, and this couldn't be, but it truly was, a tainted body, not as strong as he had been, but the force and the current in the pool restrained him. He couldn't say a thing, he wouldn't do anything of the things his morbid curiosity imagined. There was a restraint, followed by a second where he fainted. There could've been some sort of thoughts, the dreams of which he had with her were without question, of the stance, his mind was in a trance of sorts. Worst of all was the fact, that he couldn't help it, now that was that. His body laid on top of a plate, right in the middle of the dinner table to be served. It felt decrepit to look upon all of them rising up as if from their graves, dead people, taken by surprise, at the mere fact that he had become the main course. Worse than that, he had been turned around the table as to see that everyone was awakening, even the candles started burning through the liquid. The rest of this prison had darkened as soon as they closed the door, there wasn't room for more but a decrepit thing which ran through him. A knife, a butcher's dagger which had come from behind and managed to remove the shell in a most dreadful manner. It came from each side and sliced it as a cake, cuts that came skin deep and managed to hurt some of the layers of muscle. Looking at the guests he realised that their plates had been empty for a while, they were starving before, if anything worked. This is what they've been waiting for back then, instead of taking the body of a man. No, this had to stop, he had to float away, but he had crippled himself, by the time he tried his pincers, they had already been cut, with the pain which dragged it having pushed it forth. No more cuts followed, as the seasoning came, through the liquid, slowly as it fell and touched the meat. It pushed itself past the pieces of scum which have dragged themselves along and tainted it even farther. His thoughts had been numbed by the fact that his brain had been exposed. He could barely remember the exposure which came after his skull was torn apart, but he knew at least that there wasn't any protection. Danger wrong, the outer rims were strong, and there it came as more approached, no spoons or forks, they carried no knives, for it was soft and tender inside. The first one felt like a sting as the stretched his bony hand and ripped a chunk out of him. His vision faded for a moment before returning to a red glaze which pushed forth towards the blind spot. More blind spots as more chunks were taken out of him, rendering many of the eyes he had acquired in this new suit as being useless. They continued to devour until there was nothing left inside of him, no brain, no bodily function, nothing but the carcass which had been picked clean of meat and threw by the side along the others. It happened quite often enough, that one would stumble in the wrong way and in the manner of which there was little to say. It just happened that some of his consciousness remained as a piece of dumb slime which had nobody, nor eyes, but felt dripping and moving nonetheless. His death was pointless, that had to be confessed. But on the side, the mansion, the home, after a night of sleep, the doctor realised that his daughters had never returned. They were nowhere in the garden, definitely not in their rooms, the closet, the many things which spread across the structure had been already checked. Could it be that they have fled away, from his experiments and home? Elisabeth, Verona, where are you my dears? I've searched everywhere for and I can't find you, if you hear my voice would you be as kind as to respond? There wasn't any interception of his voice. With little in mind, he would remain blind for the duration of the time he was there, unable to leave the house until the dark came again, he would have to wait, locked in the basement with his experiments. That dreadful creature had been dragged the way it had been inside the cooler. He wasn't as disturbed by what happened in the past, other than bearing the resentment which had to be properly given to those alone. From the looks of which, bones had formed and grown around. Could it be the idol acting up again? The doctor asked himself. Parkison though of the cause, but couldn't explain what was the reason for this sudden anomaly which had been brought here beyond his control. It was written down and noted as another one in hopes there'd be something to be said about it. Nothing could be said any longer about what he had thought. They had to be wrong after he had communicated with his colleagues in their laboratory, he wasn't sure any longer whenever or not his sanity was safe. Something in the laboratory has crawled in his mind and might've made him see the things going on there. How else could he explain the grown of bones, the Idol still being on the table, damnable bird with its jaws and claws pushed forth inside the wood and slowly rotting. If only he hadn't lost the other one, grand mistake as it had been. No one had seen him do the things which were going on. He wasn't sure himself about what could be done. At least to say that this was a mistake, it was shortly an understatement. Crudely enough he left the laboratory and grabbed the morning light inside the small pocket device he carried. It looked as if the weather was going to be much worse than the previous day. Much, much worse, as the sky darkened in a most unnatural manner, not in terms of dark sky, but smallpox-like red bubbles forming against the blue, growing like some sort of disease, spreading like a tumour through the organs. A dreadful thing was the fact that he has given them the proper note and came to the conclusion that they had to be right. The more he spent down there, the more he'd start seeing things and in no way or manner would he go past the gate alone. Unable to see another way, he returned and searched, desperately trying to find the cabinet and fill his pockets with drugs. He had taken at least two antibiotics inside the side of his neck, worse than that, the pills he'd taken weren't even supposed to be inhaled the way he'd done. Crushed into the dust, they'd end up in his lungs, not for long though, as his bodily functions would make sure he'd notice soon enough. Fuming out of his mouth made him think of the unnatural reactions he had been pushed towards. He wasn't a man no longer, he wasn't a father, where were his daughters? What a bad moment to remember them when he himself was unaware of the fact that he couldn't cope with the painkillers and those others tablets which were supposed to keep him calm. He kept looking around, paranoid, what if that thing in the sky had been real after all? What was? Another look past the window, and it appeared, finally, what he kept reading and hearing about. That haunting tower which seemed to move in the distance, it had waited for the perfect opportunity until it could sprout about and start walking in the distance. An embedded fear laid inside his mind, for he couldn't cope with the fact that he had himself tied in the house, unable to go ahead and run. Laying there motionless made him unevenly tainted in the head. His thoughts had lost control and he couldn't even yell for help, who would hear him? Tears ran when realising that his daughters were out there, poor things, this had to stop, he knew the way but dared not. Not after turning his gaze as if to see that grim red bright light spreading from under the door. A glazing piece of red blanket which crawled and spread as fast as it could. Where he had failed, no one else would take it upon themselves to grab that idol. It had to be him, there wasn't any other way to look upon the problem, other than dismay. His legs started giving in before he started walking, unable to comprehend what pushed him forth, or whenever or not the tall figure was watching. He immediately knew what it wanted and where it had the need for it to be thrown, and with a blast, he slammed the basement door open. The torch which had been left unlit came to life with a pure red glow that wasn't fire but rather some spiritual effigy that went beyond the natural world. Each step took away the feeling of a laboratory and turned it into a crypt. He was to approach his tomb, and it had begun being rather cold. It took a while to put two and two together before seeing the cold winds rising, to know that the freezer had opened itself and the slabs were moving beyond his sight. The idol laid somewhere on the right side of the room, right next to the circle he had created and from which that terror was summoned. He had no clue which of the creatures had survived but the best guess would have to be the newer one who had been split in half but somehow survived. 'You think of dread, where have you taken the idol?' Before his sight, right around the corner laid the broken table and no small carved statue on the pieces which laid on the floor. Somehow it managed to slam and crush the table, taking it to the nest. It had become even colder and the exposure was becoming vile. Parkinson himself was unaware of how much longer he could stay there and not suffer the consequences of being alive. There'd be much to pay and nothing to say to others once he was done. From beyond the grave, it seemed to have moved there, having taken a good care of breaking the small basin and eating the children of his own species. Remarkable, he thought it to be, at least seeing it have no shame, no dignity, unaffected by the cold. As a matter of fact, the cold moisture in the air and the warmth of its own body appeared to have cured it of whatever it had going for itself. Nothing stopped it from noticing him any longer, as soon as he stepped on the floor. That dreadful cold was unnerving and tainted to the very core of his soul. There wasn't any saying for the reason of which he acted that way, in the least of sense that his joints had lost control and wanted to get outside, to shift and get away. His toes crooked inside his shoes before he could even take another step. It was awful and strange, the freezer wasn't supposed to be that strong, there needed to be a stronger influence out there, just taking effect. Perhaps his mind had been an effect, but one couldn't help it but swear that he peered not into his own cooler but into the Antarctic. Most importantly, in the far distance, it seemed that the idol laid far away in an altar of ice. Not only was it far, too far for the human eyes to see, or the mind to comprehend, but he felt it, heard the calling which came with it and decided to follow without bobbing ahead forth. Nothing could've been worse than that, he was aware that something would go wrong but he had to return upstairs and take a backpack. As the list progressed, he had observed the towering thing approaching towards his property, even from upstairs where he had his best view there was to be had. It was a glorious form which brought a vile action with it, which would damn him if it were to enter. 'Clothes, equipment, a coat, fur, let me see.' Parkinson started going ahead and making sure everything was in order, with everything taken with him, no one would make a mistake whatsoever. He would get inside that portal, that door, the freezer and return victorious and close it behind. All he had to do before it was take the idol and close the doors. Could it have been a mistake that he had thought of it? The doors weren't closed yet? A slip, perhaps, something which dragged at his mind. He had been upstanding in society as he thought, but no one could change that. They stood there and weren't closed, bearing at his mind, images that were vile. 'Let me check again, equipment, here, something to keep me warm.' As an extra matter of protection, he had taken with him some sort of formula he had worked on. One shot of the concoction and he'd be ready to get through any kind of environment, be it cold, or blisteringly hot. Nothing would stop it, now with the goggles on his eyes, his suit fully equipped and most importantly, the old harpoon gun took with him for this occasion. By the time he returned, he stepped down the stairs and looked to see where the fiend had gone. It wasn't there, as it had done eating the offerings and leaving behind their remains. Nothing appeared to have changed since that moment passed, nothing more, everything made of meat was gone. It was somewhere out there roaming in the cold, the sole guardian of the idol waiting for him to come alone. He'd only get one chance to strike at the fiend, to take it down before it got away. There was still that chance that it would attempt gobbling the idol and pushing itself farther into the cold Abyss. He could look through it for hours, at least now that he knew that there was something wrong, it made him much stronger in his mind. While stepping there, he realised just how deep the snow was, a sizeable boot indeed, which dragged him even farther depending where he stepped. Nothing would make him think less of the vile object once he would acquire it again, but where could that thing be? It must've stood enough out there to be covered by snow again, waiting for an ambush, having him be disturbed over the fact that going around was unnerving. 'Reveal yourself you dreadful thing, why can't you seem to hide any better than them. I say you should cower and feel insecure while I'm here for I'm the one who's going to put an end to your existence you vile undead.' No reason for it to respond to its provocation, he had to believe that it knew what he was saying as to make himself feel much better. Worse than that, it wasn't safe for him to move away, other people wouldn't do any better if they were in his place. He was alone, prone to do something which would drag him down into the cold tomb he'd end up in. Not even a second chance, or a glance once the room would freeze and the mansion. Too much would be sacrificed for this, he was aware, but he was already half-way there when he noticed the idol and the glow it had in its eyes. It was then that he knew that he needed it at all cost. Without it that towering destroyer would invade him home and crush him, perhaps worse, it would come here and bring destruction to all in its path. As if it should matter or if he should care, he returned to his tracks and prepared. It had to be somewhere around and he had a sharp hot-like needle ready to take it by surprise. Little was to be known, frowned upon by his own thoughts. Only one shot would there be a need for, and he would take the life of that creature wherever it was. A dreadful pass which came to be, he wouldn't even know whenever he would see another day. But there it was, digging holes from below the slope, it had to breathe like any other creature out there, just like he did. It had to be more of a great shot than he desired if it were for him to succeed. First, he had a need to see the skin before aiming, a good shot would get through the skull and the body of the fiend. He had to stay alert while walking through the snow, alone, the cold was slowly getting through his mind, his body was being frozen from the waist, almost blinded by the frozen goggles. 'No, these won't do any longer, at least not for this shot.' There wasn't any echo in the snow, or where he'd grown. At least from this point of view, he would be happy to see it through. Unlike everything that ever happened, this would be his best attempt, there'd be no one stopping from any longer, rather, he would prefer going on all four and striking it up close, like a creature. He got on all fours, and held his launcher right under his armpit, ready to shift at any time.

Without a doubt, holding himself still would give the creature the much-needed advantage it would need to get away. Worse would be, for the alertness faded from his mind when he had become aware that there was something wrong with him, the blind fool. He lost his tracks, unable to see properly with his two eyes either. This had done too. No more holding the launcher passively, he stood almost partially erect and came to a few steps of his knees to see the holes dug in the snow. This was it, the moment he had waited for. It stood right there, ready to spread and warm itself with its soup of liquids which had kept it from freezing before. At this moment, its body was utmost vulnerable and one couldn't say whenever or not something would go wrong. He had become arrogant, as to approach too close and feel the shimmering heat which melted the snow and almost ignited his coat and furs. 'This is where you'll stay.' Before another chance came for it to close down, he shot right through the main growth which had all the tubes resting inside. The glow and the heat faded, it had no fight in it either. As to see how it was out there, he knew it wasn't fair for it either, that it would get trapped. But beyond that gate, despite not being able to see, he still felt it approaching. Parkinson came to the table and grabbed the idol, feeling the sudden breeze of cold end. The snow-storm had ended, with little to no delay and it was then that he knew that there's a lot of trouble to pay for. One would think twice before having to get through the same things he went, but there was no time to waste. He had to reach the road of salvation in order to prevent the door from shutting with him inside. With the launcher and the beast both caught, he finally saw the swarming sun rising from the north. It was wider than his girth from the distance, a strange form which almost came to remind him of cell splitting, not to mention that its dreadful colour seemed to have crept inside the sky. Now, it was the time, the right moment for him to run and be less than aware of what was going to happen. No more mistake, at the pace of which, he would try his best to not look back. The gate stopped working and it looked as if his cooler vanished from existence, just as the door slammed behind him. It was far too close for his own regard, but the red light coming from above and far away wasn't gone. His feet started giving in, but he tried his best to keep with it, without giving in the least, knowing that it was time to face the beast. The damned one, destroyer, that of which brought its names with it, right into his thoughts. He would get through, cut right by the fence, following the road through his front garden. Obviously, most of his plants had faded and seemed to have been mightily corrupted by growths that shouldn't have been there. No one would spot the difference if it were in his mind, so why act like a madman now of all the moment? It was the grand finale, the end of his experiments involving the idol. He walked slowly, seeing how there was much more time than he had anticipated. As a matter of fact, he had come to the realisation that he was far too close and it had stopped right in front of the road. There wasn't anything else to be done about it, other than take that moment to appreciate what had happened to him. It made him shiver and smile, simply thinking about how he had dared face this creature, this God he had come to call. Never had he stood a chance at all, ever since the fall, hearing the mighty screams and shouts, his eyes did waver. Ever since they started going away, he had become aware that there'd be hell to pay for what he's done. Right through the shades, he recognised something his mind had refused to comprehend, to take in, rather than face any consequences at all. It was time for him to stand for himself and give it in. 'This is what you were looking for, isn't it? I know that this has brought you to this world and what will banish you, though if I may say, the experiments would've continued if it weren't for your interruption.' Despite being aware that he wasn't being understood, there still was the giant metal grid between them, that of which would easily be passed. The mist which laid around, it seemed to have stopped right at the gate, merely and crawling around the bars but no forth. 'Well, I guess this is yours.' No grand finale, nothing which had been thrown like a mere rock, it was given by the mist and had slowly floated through the air. It wasn't anything in the midst of being fair, but he had known better than to judge its strange behaviour. After that, when everything faded from his eyes, the colossal form and that dark sky, there was something left on the road. One trail which dragged blood, from the end of his fence, right towards a blind spot which shouldn't have been there, but his keen senses dragged him over. Unable to tell whenever or not he'd be safe doing that, he decided to do nothing else but focus on that sole thing, going alone as strongly as possible. 'Why am I pulled towards you, are there more of your kind I need to see? What could this dreadful feeling inside of me be?' There was almost a shock at the sight, nothing bright shone any longer in the sky as the stars faded to dark.

Despite being covered in nothing less of tree bark, they were there, both of them had been there for the entire time. And he was as far away from them, unable to say a thing or do something to help them. He had been way too busy going on and attempting to do his rituals to know, down on his knees, realising that both of his girls were gone. 'Another one seems to have been consumed by it, sir, are we to.' 'Yes soldier, you're authorized to bring in the next batch and made it quick this time.' Certain arrangements appeared to have been made this time as the vessel darkened and grew an outrageously vile and outlandish appearance. It most likely had to have had to do with the fact that it had managed to drain whatever was left of the other vessels which had been taken and brought in its presence. The vileness of which crept into his mind, leaving it binds to the place it was in, where have they been. Dreadfully as it were to take care of it, he had a perfect need, a perfect being in his head. 'General, general are you with us, sir?' 'Yes, yes, I'm here, soldier, what's the god damn delay?' 'Haven't you been informed yet, sir?' The general looked at a soldier, a young fellow, maybe in his twenties, broad shoulders, red-haired and blue-eyed. Something still appeared off, it was his uniform being decoloured from washing and some sort of scar he wasn't able to see but feel under his inner thigh. This kid could go on ahead and die today, that's what he thought at least. In a strange way, he wasn't certain himself, why or what, rhyme or reason. Something beyond that wanted to have him take the kid and knock him down, just so that he wouldn't head down there with that thing before they had to bring in more sacrifices to the vile machine. 'What is it I haven't heard then? It seems that news here travels slower than those poor civilians we're using as food.' 'Well sir, there's been a problem at the docks, one at the mountain-hike zone and one at the urban area. We've got reports that people have taken some sort of precaution once they heard that people were disappearing, not to mention the sightings of the Government which didn't help them think that we were involved, sir.' 'So where are we supposed to..'. His eyes faded past the glass, it was apparent that those weren't the healthiest specimens he had seen. There wasn't need for an echo a long as he made sure to raise his hand and prevent the kid from speaking. Damn weak-bodied people taken from the hospital, the likes of which had no other place or they were most likely promised by their Government some secret type of research which would cure them of the most incurable afflictions. Poor sops were placed inside the vessel at least eight or nine of them instead of three or four, only because their bodies had become as frail as to not be able to fit in more space. It was a disgusting thing what the Government had approved of, but that was it, the "researchers" left the room and the vile one do its thing. A separation between his thought and mind came as soon as he was ready, then shifted in his chair with a hand swaying across his chin than his forehead. 'You're still here, aren't you?' He had closed his eyes but the kid was breathing in far too heavily for anything to be excused. At least he had been aware that his teeth would've been kicked in if he were to continue doing it under his gaze. Those had been the unspoken words carried between the two of them before the young man excused himself. Somehow the room is warmer than the mine wasn't as outrageously inefficient after all, having been paid for by extra sources. 'Well, am I to go on with it and follow through?' From under his desk, he had taken a small batch of files which documented most of everything which had happened there, minute detail, with each of the men and their exact addresses, mug-shots and everything. No one would dare do anything about it if it came to public notice, no one. Deep inside, there was still dread, nonetheless, as it just happened for all of them to be in the same place. Once their weak bodies have been covered inside the vessel, there was something mad going to happen there. Just as it happened for them to be alive, their bodies were dreadfully fused together, promising that it would eventually be their eternal demise. Bonded at their hands, nothing but long joints and mazes between them, picking and dreadfully being connected with one another. They have picked up on some awfully sick smell before dragging each other on the floor, wailing like dumb beasts. Most of them were men, they were supposed to be strong now, on their way to healing. But in the outdoors, in a place where pieces of the ceiling had been clocked in the sky, floating, where they would suffer their nakedness to be seen was more than bizarre. It was a thought which would never go away. Even as their voice started coming out of their mouths, it seemed like there was still something which would drag them below. 'Careful there, I'm in pain, don't stretch too much.' 'Don't talk, please, I need the silence to think please, I won't enjoy this unless you reach that peak of quietness that I need.' Another of seemed to have attempted to push himself away and destabilised their entire form. Now they fell on the side, this circle with a single line-like worm. So this would their torment for what had happened in life seemed to have tied them together inside the vessel, preventing them from dying, at least. 'No, no, he's not moving, he's not a breather any longer, just look.' 'This is a dream, nothing but a dream, he shouldn't be, this couldn't be, how many were we?' They counted and for a moment it seemed that they hadn't had a clue either, regardless if they had seen one another in the past, their memories had been dull. Most of the patients had been old and terminal, at least in the last year. Something didn't add up either since there were two extra corpses that didn't belong. One of them was dead, while the other seemed to be active just catatonically, having the brain brought to a stop. Partially alive, maybe? At least, there was a chance of sentience and that it could follow some kind of rules and guidelines, if it were to be pushed forth, without a chance to die. 'Let's move, at once, we need to get up.' 'Don't touch me, you fucker, there's no need for this.' 'Why must I suffer?' Their voices seemed to blend, soon the confusion would make them attend at their own rallies. Now, what could it be, who might be able to see what was wrong with them? They were in the heart of the complex, dark-brown or reddish marble, one couldn't make the difference, but rather ask himself. Why was it made in the shape of bricks below, across the walls and the various buildings which laid there? Who might've been the constructor, the builder, that of which made it in such a way that some of the men had become mesmerised while they were being dragged? Their empty circle appeared to have been pulled by the three men who laid in front, eventually being the ones who managed to lift themselves and stand tall. Nothing would rekindle their fall. At least this would the way. 'Listen, we need to stand together and coordinate ourselves if something can be done. I do not think we'll be able to survive together otherwise. Somehow, it couldn't be wrong, at least not in the way one thought. He'd be at least in the manner of doing things right when he truly tried since he was the sanest of them. Rightly so, it seemed that destiny had placed him as the first one of the front, tried from an extrusion and a meat-like blob coming from the back of his spine, right through the chest of the old man behind him. Obviously, he had taken to himself to be in lead, more than any other, since he was the brightest there was. 'Well, are we to take notice or should we pay some more attention? Let's mobilise already and walk. Do you hear me? At three, I'll drag not only the two people behind me but all of you on your feet. All of you need to listen and follow my flow if you want to be back on your feet with no other way of doing it.' Some grumbling in the back came, but for now, they were obedient. The damned old man appeared to produce an air of authority which made the others remember, at least in some cases, their time in the army. Many wouldn't know, or wouldn't even try being dominant in that manner. Either they should go on and follow instructions, or no one would dare say a thing. They came up on their feet immediately and held each other tighter, making the circler even more unbroken. 'Great, now may we move?' 'Sir, were you in the army? You remind me of my old officer from when I served in the 'Navy.' There came a round of voices which debated between themselves. 'I think it'd be better to focus on the way ahead. Whatever this sick experiment had done to us should make it that there's a way to unbind us.' Definitely better than all of them, at least in the mind, he was miles above every single one there. It was the sole reason why they even follow, for he reminded them of the war. Nothing would work better as a leader than their command unit, or their officer. 'Who's holding the dead bodies?' 'I am sir, and umm.' 'Jacob, Stalltrot, I served as a marksman sir in my young days, I was used to getting down and dragging one of my fellows down the line and through the mud. A darn thing the war, taking someone past the trenches.' 'Can you handle him, soldier? At least a bit longer until we find a way to get rid of the extra weight?' 'I sure can, sir. But I don't know about the other, something seems dead inside of him and nothing seems to affect him.' They looked in a manner which brought too much distraught to be expressed in normal thought or by means of speech. It was a deep fear which refused to go away from the sight it bore. No one knew the reason behind this proper corpse as it should've been called, one that behaved and was only dead on the inside. The body seemed fine, as a matter of fact, it moved with the others, but something just didn't look fine in the eyes. Empty bubbles kept forming inside of them, most likely some allergic reaction which bore far too many problems as there were. Bottom line remained the fact that the creature laying amongst them wasn't even close to human. It was some sort of look-alike, which followed. They proceeded nonetheless while carrying the one man on their working shoulders and what not. Nothing could go wrong, at least not yet. Walls moved, but that was what they were used to in zones which had been ravished by destruction. It was more like one of the effects of disorientation which occurred once a bomb had dropped too close to your year. 'There's a wall in here, fifty paces away, careful that neither of you trips and falls over, we can't have any more casualties.' First thing that had to be brought to mind was that it was cold, too cold for a bunch of old men to be running around with nothing to bear. About the same time of the day, it had to be offered to them. From a stranger on top of the wall. He looked human, at least his body did, but he wore that strange mask you find yourself thinking about before going into your deepest sleep. One dreadful contortion which twisted and needfully stretched. It brought something to mind, the word sea-wench since it looked like an old crone with the fake strands of old hair and all. He dropped a few sets of robes, crafted too well to have been standing there or to be given to random strangers. By inspection, it looked as if they had been made specifically for them, and that was good enough. Not that it answered anything, but at least the feeling of cold would be over. Everyone was being covered, even the corpse and the dead man walking. Being instructed in the need of dread, he would suffer no one to sit without a word. 'Who are you and why have you helped us?' The sea-wench smile, dripping salt water from her suit, all around the wall. Could it be nothing more than a sick joke portrayed by a bunch of the men who have brought them there? It would be unacceptable, to say the least. 'You won't be wearing the mask once I'll see you face to face' He shouted. That wouldn't be long since he took it off to reveal a face that missed a good chunk of it in the shape of a sphere. A perfectly round sphere, not a mask to cover. His uniform was immediately recognised after, for his dark suit was the saddened version of the common uniform used by the cops.

Even the insignia was there, depressed in the chest, turned upside-down and then regretfully painted the same colour. Something had to follow in order for them to succeed. Nothing could've been better than that, luckily most of the others in the back had been far too busy to notice the display since they were desperately trying to put on the robes by themselves. 'Help each other, come on, it might be easier that way.' His accent broke in, clearly regional, something farther south. Doing this thing was worse than anything he had imagined. A stalker at that, each corner in which they followed and were dragged into, someone appeared to have found the ripe time to complain about every single thing. 'Well, what do you think we'll do?' I don't know how much I'll be able to keep silent with them around, most of them saw me naked. They saw me naked. No one should've seen me exposed, I've betrayed my wife, my children, myself. They saw me for what I am, and I can't do anything about it. The man shivered at the thought, it disturbed him beyond any moral point. His facial expressions were flaccid and flawed, this man was broken beyond any reasonable point one could tell. 'I won't give up, you hear me? I wish I could return to my home and see my grandchildren.' 'Settle down, we need to cooperate in order to get through this, only this way.' 'No, I'm sick of being told what to do. I for one, am not a soldier, I've never served. As a matter of fact, war is the thing I oppose and I cannot be forced to walk with a bunch of old murderers who walk freely.' 'Or not. Perhaps this was the hell which was promised and they all walked in their trap.' 'Wait, wait, halt, all of you.' The crimson edge right by the corner. Each man grabbed hold of a side of the walls, everywhere around them, as to fear that they would be brought to a sudden end which wouldn't do. Neither they nor the one in charge had planned for it, but it was obvious that something could be done yet. Not a word, just looking down at the walls which turned crimson once they reached below. It felt as if they landed in a prison in the middle of infinity, a stretch of natural and unnatural growths that had nothing to do with them. Going down was at least impossible in the midst of all the trouble. Working towards something better was much worse than they had believed it to be, though this could end at a leap. 'Could we get down there somehow?' It almost looked like, for once, looking at the pair from the distance, they would've looked like a small crowd, staring at the trees below, throwing glances, past the unknown rivers and floating bricks which had started the process of assimilation there. Soon the wild-life would become some twist in this maze, prison or hold. Whenever it was, nothing of the sort mattered, what was important, was the fact that they needed to escape under any circumstance whatsoever. No one would judge them for that, no one at all. No one would judge me if I were to jump and fall. Even if it were to drag the others with me, who would be alive to know what I have done? That was important to note, for nothing mattered more than that. It was quite obvious that there was a need for a greater strength than one man to destabilise the group. If only he could push the man before him, but he had no hands, hence no force to go on through it. While watching is despair made him unable to figure out whenever or not it would be fair, there was some kind of compromise then. Another voice from behind them called. Well as it had been, no one else had heard it other than him. 'Let's all push together, we may fall.' He was wondering whenever or not he had gone insane, at least, from the looks of which he had determined that there was no one else who could've said it. Everything around them was silent and he was glistening there beyond his sight. It was the silent one, who bore no expression whatsoever, but it had to be him who proposed pushing the others. If it was for the two of them to go ahead, he was certain that they wouldn't have been able to do a thing against the oncoming slaughter. The noise came, and all of the sudden they looked at the moving wall. It was approaching quite suddenly, without stalling, crushing woe and harming anyone beyond their throngs. No one would forget their wrongs. At least from the likes of which, there was some kind of determination which pushed the others instead of treating them like brothers. None would deny the look of gibberish and slubberish which came from the cracks. Upon the reveal, there would be no appeal to the sight and the magnitude of the machine. It pulls the rocks inside and crushed them as if they were nought, making sure no one would make a move, it stopped. The way behind was even more dangerous but a fall would be an even easier way to go since their hearts were frail. But the concoction of steel and metal bars appeared to have pushed forth into a supreme account of the stop. Some of the things which shoved the concoctions of steel up and down, in the throng of many motions haven't succeeded into any release for the stress they felt at the sight of it wasn't even justified. That vehicle, if it could be called so, didn't look functional. It bore four small rolls with spikes, moving in motions, with long sharp spears from behind. It was even more clear, for as much of the dear sharp nails that laid around it that it had been built not for this place, but to bring as much misery and damage as it could. Especially in a place, no one would. From above the tools of death, there was a seat, from which the knight raised himself. Oh that dreadful armour, springing forth, shoulders which were tall, up to the girth and rib cages on both sides of the wall. A dreadful thing that almost seemed to be black or dark green painted leather. It blended in the dark, almost, if it weren't for one red eye while the other pushed forth a blue glow. Somehow, under the helmet, they all knew he smiled at the sight. It wasn't a simple circle, it also had a long snake-like figure. 'Well, well, you've stepped into my bastion and paid little mind to announce me of your presence. I am disappointed and it's been on my mind ever since I laid eyes on your wicked form that you should deserve to be taken in the deepest of my dungeons and be slain. How does that sound to you, my curls? Your form is an abomination and an insult for my halls.' 'Wait, before you think of anything rash, your majesty.' 'I'm listening.' He immediately slid into the seat and appeared to have relaxed ten times fold. No one would dare say otherwise but he would listen to the song of their demise. 'It's not our fault we're here, as a matter of fact, we're looking for a way out as well.' 'There's a long way towards the exit and I'm not sure any of you would be able to handle the way and what comes with you. Tell me, oh great one of the bunch, what reason should I have to help you? Am I not in my own palace of growth? Have you not gaped enough throughout the world to understand that there is no hope out there? Sooner or later that would just happen to be my world, no one else's.' There was a cautious nod, one of which had his eyes open and kept on him at all times. 'Then we are humble servants who would be content with serving you while hiding in the dark.' 'Wait, who said you could talk for me, I don't wish to hide.' 'He's right, I'm not going to stand and take it either from this fellow just because of his grand machine, I've seen better.' 'If someone should be preaching about hiding, why not him though? Look, he's hiding even now under that suit of armour. What could be the reason behind that if not because he's vile and repulsing?"The last one appeared to have hit a sensitive spot, by the way, his eyes and the lights contorted into crescent forms, it made him shiver in the form. He had been the only one not to add mockery to the one he knew as being able to bring them all down and kill them.'Silence, you need to be judged. I thought you've brought your own accord to this but I cannot tell whenever or not I should stand here and take this in my own home where you're nothing but guests.Nay, you are intruders, vermin, and vermin should be annihilated!'He said with a cracking voice, seemingly having a hard time taking care of the machine.It was hard to understand why it wasn't starting, at least until the sight of the piece of brick which laid between the wheels seemed to come to mind.Push them down while they're distracted, make sure you won't die the most terrible death a man could have. Look at those rolls and at their spikes, that death is horrible and inhumane.Neither of you will have that chance again.'We have to go, he's about to turn on the machine!'At the sound of spikes starting to swirl around, as well as the annoyance of the creature behind the wheel, there was something really bothering.No one could tell whenever or not one would be smothering the other while walking abashed. One couldn't help it because of the stress and bash the other with a brick off the ground.Were all these men mad or conflicted? Why were some of them waiting as if to say or talk to the man behind the machine?'He's no human, it won't make a difference, let's try dragging them out of it before he snaps it on.'Obviously, there was something which was bothering both of the ones in front, the commander and the one with a rank much lower than him watched surprised how everyone would be ready to face their own demise.'Have you all gone mad now? Is there something in the air which has driven all of you to despair?Can't you snap out of it and fight back?Come already, we need to escape before it starts.'With a poke in the ribs, one had already started. Soon, the ones in front started pushing everyone from behind, going as far as possible without having to take a think off.Rather than that, there was a chance, at least now they reached the corner, out of sight.'It will start sooner or later, why are we waiting?'Shut up and wait there for a moment, I think I know something about creating an enemy. I should have a good idea of what he's going to do next.'Obviously, he isn't going to change us with our way ahead, there isn't a chance for that in the least. If there was a chance, that would be the way of the beast.'Look at the mark on the wall, isn't that magnificent?'Someone must've left it there for them, a grant line with a bunch of circles, filled with cuts that formed images such as the stages of the moons would be. But that wasn't enough to distract everyone from the fact, that the damning thing started making sounds again.It was hugely distracting from their own thoughts and appeared to have sneered inside the worst of memories. A bothering thing had it been, to take this gamble and turned around the corner.'It's safe to go, and if I'm right, he'll attempt to meet us face to face where we'll have no chance to turn around and flee."What about that sign, chief?"Ignore it, I think surviving is the best thing we can do right now and we shouldn't bother with anything else.'They started the run, this time he felt in control over all of their feet. Not directly but he could push it so they would all feel a tingling sensation at the soles of their own fingers and flatness of their behinds.It worked but it got worse.'He shouldn't be here, this was a god damn mistake of the administration.'From his chamber, he looked at one of the files that came, which contained every single one of the men which had entered the vessel. Out of everyone, this one took the twisted cherry on top and squeeze it morbidly alive.It was a decorated soldier in the army, with too many honours to count. He hadn't just come in hopes that he would find a way to stay alive, on the contrary, he came because he knew he was about to die.Nothing stopped him from going down there, heading right at the vessel.But he couldn't, that thought meant nothing once it closed and it had grasped him.'An honoured veteran, place there to rot with the others.'He liked to think that perhaps if he were in the same position there, he would've done the same. But something about all of this smelled like the Government all over. There wasn't any way to confirm it without trying to contact the higher-ups, but he knew it. At least now, there was a reason to try to watch the surveillance screens.'The man of the G strikes again, I think.'There was no way to look inside, but he was aware that from the description of those who had been taken out and broken off that they lived in fantasy land.'Well, now what? This room should be fine, he couldn't get his machine through it, could he?'Undoubtedly so.'He could destroy walls, what makes you think that the indestructible machine would be stopped by a puny room?'Perhaps the fact that there's no way to arch it enough so he'd get the force to do it. Haven't you noticed the first time he arrived that he needed a lot of force to stop pushing the fall and finally crush it? "I won't argue anymore, let's just go into the damn room."Two at a time, it looked as if it was wide enough for them to see and close the door behind them, not to be seen.'If he goes in circles, won't he remember that one of the doors was open?"Not unless you give him a reason to look, stay silent and keep low.'The strangeness of the unknown. It reeked of something which was bothering them. Oh, it was a shame to look upon those blasted veins growing on the wall. Some skin-plant from below, perhaps on which the entire structure was constructed. Worse, the chairs signalled something worse than that. There had been other inhabitant here before of them, something which had lessened everything else. Another false flag just came to mind, the marks and the bones left behind the sceptre.'What's that?"It could be a trap, or it might be a weapon, we should take it.'Everyone in the circle just turned their gazes at the man. He was Jhonny, and had, perhaps one of the biggest grins on his face, a devilish grin at least. Oh, the joker, the man, the ruse, he had in mind, you could plainly see on his face what was in his mind. That dreadful thing which bore regret, at least, one that wouldn't face the head which laid at the top of the staff. Such a gaze it bore back and the rubies in place of its eyes signalled the dreadful evil it bore. From the top of the wooden stick, all of the sudden it lifted itself at the peak of creation. Some sort of supreme damnation crept inside of it before long. Everything was wrong. After that, there came some strange thing in the eyes of which, signalled its desire to be followed throughout the outer reaches of the dreadful entrance. Nothing could be said about the sanity they bore. Neither of them wanted to live, nor did they want more, at least not any longer, since it left the room. Their bodies grew dumber, fingers had come to be numb from one side to the other, not to mention their toes. Perhaps their wills to live came after and they have become aware that all of that was the result of something which had been dragged inside the skull, born out of spite, with no sign of might. Neither of them would be right about what could happen, worse than that, they were afraid of what would happen if they stood more in that manner. With no way to live, no other possibility to breed, they ran together, pushing through. For one reason or the other, the skull had waited for them, even if they could hear only the cue. The strike, there laid no might, but everyone had been right about it. Worse than that, considering there was a rat which walked on walls, soon they would feel themselves be pulled to the left side. They were walking just as easily as the rat was.'Look at this, what an interesting thing, I think. But where's the skull taking us and what does it want?'Upon turning around, the floating skull revealed a face that's been made of dirt-like skin which grinned. It was its own before the skull had been twisted behind and even before that, the face had been turned into the staff's holster, unable to see.'Welcome, welcome, dreary fiends, I see I'm not the only imp here, who's bound to walk these halls cursed."We're not cursed, this is just a problem because of the experiment we were in."Oh right, right, I would take on the advice of an old man who's had ideas in his youth, but look around, this is nothing like you've ever seen. You were twisted by the curse of reconfiguration there's inside. It just so happened that I used to be a man who used to walk on the streets and almost lost his hand and body. This is what I've become now, but I can't complain about the fact. There are forces which are far greater than what I am, and I am flawed beyond relief. You wouldn't be able to trust me beyond belief. This is what I can tell you, in the least, if you were to listen." "We are, we want to escape, ignore what these fools behind me are trying to say, please. Just tell us what we can do in order to escape, it's all we want." "Have you paid enough attention?" Asked the imp, with a grin. By now they were all twisted on the wall and this imp just shook his brows and moustaches, coming to an utmost twisted grin, which came close to his chin. Where had he been and why hadn't he cared? Were there other things which brought his mind to despair? Other than the fact that he was struggling to accept what was going on, there was a slight distraction caused by the lack of any solid form of action. Neither of them appeared to care, where they were, why they were doing things. "Tell me this at least, you imp, a creature of the dark. Why is that ever since you were awoken, we started being drowsy and slowed? Couldn't we just regain what we lost?" "Only if you were to leave my presence for long enough, that would heal you of your dumb spell. But would you really go on your own without a guide?" It had become dangerous already with the threat that just had happened. Tiny spikes and horns, many of which were twisted, sprouted from below, at cornerstones which pushed themselves through, from both side of the wall. Starting from the depths which now laid below, there were revealed to be farther ends which had to be taken. But the skull hadn't walked farther forth, for the path ahead lead like a dungeon, far deeper inside of its own structure. "Ready to follow? Or may you return to his domain?" They all turned around and looked, it was him, the armoured man with his machine stopped in his tracks. Not even him would attempt to push his own vehicle past the point of damnation. The spikes and the many throngs would destroy everything he had on him. Maybe it would even give them a fair chance to strike at him, after raising themselves enough to avoid the rolling death. "Should we hold a vote and decide whenever or not we should take this idea on? I could go either way, but it seems as if suddenly we're stuck in this choice." "If I may go ahead and make a suggestion." The imp said with a tiny grin on his face, after stopping on his own pace. There was some dreadful thing which bore with him, one which crept inside. A mole-like thing which came out from the soles of his own skull's eye. "By the time this mole might reach the machine, that's when you'll know that it will start and there won't be a chance for either of you to make it through. I shall await you on the other side, whenever or not you've decided to make your choice or not." It was a short race and everyone was far too busy talking to themselves or among one another to care that whenever or not that creature was to get there, they would all suffer. A dreadfully close thing, as it came, the winds were tame and the temperature had made the lot of them sweat as much as a bunch of gallons. Soon enough they would be reached by a bunch of metal talons. They'd rip them apart, right after crushing the mole, which may as well be that catalyst or the moving fire which brings destruction. This brought the call of action, closer than it had ever been, no one would've seen it coming, when it spoke. No longer was it considered dead, when one dreadfully cold arm lifted and the pale expression seemed to have changed. The catatonic walking corpse just said, as if spoken a dark word in a forgotten language "Walk." And that was it, his life and essence immediately came to some sort of stop. Yet another pause in this walking organism that was partially alive. The silence was only momentarily as to signal what came next. "We need to get away, the dead one walking's right. This is our only hope, I don't even know why we're still debating."It's almost as if that thing which held us back went away only now, it must've been the skull, I wager!"A lot of them started acting in anger, and the mole was already getting closer to the destination it attempted getting at.'Well, can't we at least try to make a habit out of it? We should try doing this at least once in a while.'But the time for excuses passed, they were falling on themselves but managed to jump just in time as the dreadful sound of those engines inside the machine came to be. There were a crush and a wham, but they entered the hole through some unholy leap which somehow landed them inside of there. Nothing confirmed whenever or nor it had reached the end, other than the doors slamming behind of them. Most of which stood on the stairs wondering at that.'I wasn't even aware there had been stairs. But where might be our light?'A few more steps, and thump, thump thump. The air had a bad scent of cinder, no, ashes, something which tasted like mercury inside the mouth? Was it copper? The simple explanations couldn't appear to come any closer to what was going to happen but it came. Exactly what they had wished for. Right from behind, the light suddenly appeared in some sort of flash. It was that dreadful machine, with its metal pins rolling and crushing everything down below. Despite the place being tight, it fights right through, one step at a time, slowly advancing.'We need to run, escape before it gets us.' "Your grave is near and these tight tombs shall be your resting place.'It felt like his voice had pushed the walls back and forth in various attempts to mask the echo which bore his guts away. No one would mind if one of them would be willing to pay the price and push the dead meat inside. If only they weren't all connected and strikingly close.'We need to be faster, he's getting to a spot beyond the comfort zone. We're going to be prone to be taken by surprise. That's what'll bring us the mighty demise.'Despite what was said, there still were turns which led to straight corridors, which slowed it down considerably.'Do we keep going down or should we take it as straightly as we can?'Another set of thumps, could it be that there was something else? Of course, it had to be that floating skull, coming into the most dreadful manner. It grinned even now as it turned to reveal those high cheeks and musky moustache. One would call him of some sort of ancient royal descent, the kind of sir. But this behaviour and mockery at a few men which were trying to escape their doom were dreadful.'Look, what does it want?' "I think we should follow, but.."As soon as we come close, we'll be struck again by that dumb spell and fell into despair.'Said one of the old men in the back. Out of all of them, his voice appeared to pay most heed and a lot of attention towards what was needed and what could be paid towards. He was to be called a man, of his own words. Oh, the mighty lords just watched him act, ready to take him as he would abide by their laws in his paganistic way. As if to say.'Go ahead, we'll meet you on the other side.'Right as a set of hands just grabbed the edges of the long corridor, they'd walk through the spear with death behind. Neither of them was blind as to the echo which caused an almighty push which had the skull hide in its miserable chamber while they wept and started feeling the effects.'It's gone, so why are we still feeling ill?' "I said wait for us on the other side, no tricks either, not by the door but not too far either. Somewhere that will get us to see you, that would be the best place to hide, don't break our ride.'There seemed to be some casual glances, a few trances which bore some sort of despair around, one which would bring everything to the ground. As no one cared, no one dared to take a look behind, at that might've been the most dangerous of things one could do. But they knew it had entered the corridor, the spear, despite being winder, it tore through the walls and ate the dirt and the air, this sort of mechanism was well known. This distribution of power and heat turned the dirt into small pieces of gems and glass, in the way beauty would make this room marked into a most dreadful manner. The shards cut through the machine slowly, getting ready for the time of malfunction. Its guts were spilt, thus having been revealed that there was some foreign element inside the machine, something hidden which had no place to be. As for it meant, the destruction of the fiend was important. 'Look, it started bleeding, it won't be able to run any longer, just push on.' Yet the walls felt like they got through lighter, even closing in far much tighter than it would've been normally expected. Some forced directed something from the walls, the air maybe? A toxin laid inside the crystal, just as one got cracked, the armoured creature just stopped. 'Get it off, get it off.' He yelled as he pushed the helmet off, thus revealing that underneath there was yet another cursed man. With a yellow face which laid in distress, the back of his head remained exposed. Just another skull which laid exposed for others to see. Nothing was clear, and no one could be less aware of the consequences of what he had shown or said. 'It's this cursed place which forced me to do it, you curs. Do not look at me that way, I used to be a man, I used to be.' His voice fell off a few octaves and it seemed to be appropriate not to provoke, not in the last moments that passed. The face just started melting and most had been aware, that once it disappeared, he would be dead. No longer could that corpse stay with the living and he fell. But that wasn't as pure and as for right as he had thought it'd be. For once they had become aware of something important, truly important, unable to see why that came to be. The corpse fell on the controls and in full speed, it came looking for a tool. Nothing would be spared from the range of destruction, not a human, not a function. As it approached, there came some dreadfully similar song they heard before, right beyond the gate. 'Just push forth and don't take in the smell.' It was starting to spread inside the hall, and luckily for them, there was something going on which others didn't care about. No one thought of what could go wrong or right, no one cared about how tight it would be to follow on the lead. It was getting close to having only one person ahead, while the other had to scam his body, unable to get through with the dead. One couldn't help but focus on the little things, as the weight which dragged it down, the floor which started breaking apart and revealed their awaiting grave. It was a bed, a hole filled with sharp crystals which curved in utmost unnatural directions, and they still moved. Some looked at it as if they had been mesmerised by their beauty, glow or by their motion. A dreadful trap to have been caught in, where one was to be told that he had to be called by others by their name. 'Stop looking and push now, the walls are being forced into a tightness, we'll be crushed if we don't try fighting against it together.' Not only had the machine been crushed almost entirely, but the form of the wall hadn't affected the creature inside. Something about its morphology appeared to have left its form to interact as it spread across the wall. It would've been more than fanatical, the joy, to think about the machine falling below. But this didn't happen, as they had been aware, it was some kind of misunderstanding, to call it as such. It abandoned the rest of the hell but kept the rolling cylinders in its mouth, rolling with the spikes. Unable to fall, it followed, now making a dreadful sound which crept inside. 'It's getting closer.' 'How do we open the door now? Can't you see it's close?' 'Keep pushing the walls I say, don't look behind unless you want to share the same fate as the rider did.' 'We're all going to do die.' 'Open the door, open the damned door you lousy skull, I was wrong, we need your help.' A musky scent in the air. Fear rang between each one of their years as the crystals turned purple, dark, revealing the gas, which was to say, revealing its true natural look. Worse than that, this was below some rat, ignoring most of the fat which laid inside some dreadful creature in the dusk. There were others living below, and they had been tightly pressed against the wall. 'We could fall below, it's our only chance.' 'Being impaled by those things or cut in halves won't help either of us, at least not in the way you think they would."Just let us end it, death is near.'By now, the old men had nothing more to say as they waited in fear.A dreadful look, a grasp of wind came to be as it pushed and pulled them inside, without any sort of warning, the creature attempted to turn around and fling itself inside to follow. An attempt which was followed by the closing of the door and nothing more.Only a few thumps could be heard from the other side. Others weren't as important as they had been made to feel. But to say that there was someone there, in the dark watching.'Do you think it's gone now? Could it have been crushed between the walls?"No, I do not think so, I don't think either the knight or that jelly is dead, merely pretending in order to return and reset.'The others looked surprised and almost caught by a snoop. Even their leader look at him in surprise, unable to tell whenever or not he was serious or not.'You survived, that's good. We wouldn't want you to be hammered, not in the least. One couldn't look away from the beast and think they have defeated it in any sort of sense whatsoever.But you managed to hold yourselves quite well.'Said the face on the backside, the floating thing which seemed to have brought with it a skeleton's neck this time.'Beware, for I do not hold any grudge whatsoever, but if you wish to get as far from those who wish you harm, I bid you farewell for there's no way to protect yourselves from what's out there."Wait, wait a minute. There's a way, there needs to be away formed."Break us apart, man-head, break us apart, I'll tell you what's on all of our minds. We wish not to be in this manner any longer. This is sick, we shouldn't suffer being tied together.Men weren't made for this shame, especially at this age."Silence and let me think.'It had grown tired of floating and for once, it had fallen off the floor, leaping from tile to tile. This place was serene, well crafted, a hall, one would wonder what's outside.While it thought of what was to be done, they walked towards one of the windows, only to watch the other side of the world.They were apparently on a long-sealed bridged, magnificently crafted and not only that. It was even more obvious that the other side which wasn't corrupted seemed to have crept around.Well enough, this wasn't what was called for, mostly because there was a damp thing on the floor. A river, but moister, a substance which oozed and moved much more slowly than expected.It was dreadful to watch the fish wriggle, even from the distance, but that wasn't the entire river which was affected. Mere whirlpools formed, most unnatural, which dragged that area of water and some of the smaller fish which hadn't had the chance to swim against the current.Along with that, the pines seemed well, except the damned creatures which hid But nothing was affected or reconditioned for as far as he could see.'Think we'll make it down there at least? There's a chance it might be the safest place there can be."I don't know.'An even more silent voice already seemed to wager.'We won't even get close to it, can't you see that we'll never stop being in danger?This place must've been set as an experiment for soldiers and we're long past our expiration date. Unless we find a way to outsmart whoever created this damned thing with its visual tricks and small automatons, it'll be our grave."No, but how can we even try to face that fact that we've been tied together? There's no way to split us without a surgeon."What you looking at?"The face-skull had stopped, standing quite obscure in an awkward pose, pushed by the neck. It wasn't even facing them properly, having its bones in front and the moustache behind.'You must be blind if you think this was created for you, as you're not the first ones to reach this place."Were there others?"It was sudden, and they have all become aware of the fact that one of them grabbed a skull from off below and kept it by the scruff. Rough enough to hurt, he thought off, at least if he had been human. But this was nothing to it and felt like nothing.Worst than that, there was some kind of distraught which peered in their eyes, blinding some, while others weren't.'A neat trick, but I don't get your point."Look inside the empty eye sockets and you'll see the truth.'That dark and wretched sight for him alone, he looked and saw where they were, all locked there, inside a small type of coffin, he thought.No, his memory had been playing tricks, it was the vessel, they were still in it.He had dropped the skull and didn't mutter a word.From the confusion which spread around, no one else knew or might've found out from his expression.'What's that? Still can't handle what you are? Do not worry, for we'll continue our journey now.'The number of things which came into his head was damning, at least for his mind and soul. His body was thin and he had become some sort of a ghoulish figure compared with the others.His skin dragged, he was aware. A sudden burst of stress just pushed him forward nonetheless.'What did you see there?'It's none of your business, we'll carry on to whatever this bridge brings us to."You can't give orders, we have just as many rights as you have here."Then do continue on your own, but as long as I'm in front I'll be able to drag all of you wherever I want, understood?'It was almost as if they were unable to stop themselves from saying yes sir, making only slight gestures and keeping it low. Someone had to keep with the flow of things around here.A dreadful hope came into sight, the future had no light. At least not any longer since the dreadful face leads them towards damnation of their minds, as opposed to the damnation of their souls and bodies.With little left, the curtains fell and dragged with charcoal leaves, which had come from outside.'Look, there's a fire down there in the distance. Can you see that blow of smoke rising up from there?'Oh, no, no, this shouldn't be happening, it looks as if there's some residue where it shouldn't be."How do you know what's supposed and isn't supposed to be?"It's because I was set as a sort of.. 'Silent at the question, it seemed as if his eyes avoided contact as much of the cost of looking the way it did. That twisted mouth which blocked words, those eyes which retreated into their corner from sight.Nothing would go well and no one would be able to tell what was going on, that's what he thought. They wouldn't, they couldn't, not in the least of a chance.'Who left you there on that pole?' Was it the one who built this place or another dreadful being?'We should leave before it's getting late.'The dark would bring promise of danger to any stranger. Especially those who crept inside places where they didn't belong, something had to be wrong. About it, nothing would be done, other than follow, as they hadn't decided yet.'Can he be trusted?'Haven't you noticed that we don't feel ill in his presence any longer?""Yeah, that's a good point, why is it that we don't actually feel that harm you've spoken about?"It's because I lied, about all of it.'There was that toothy grin coming from the front and the back. It was almost as if both the skeleton and the face had found it delightfully clever.To have kept it this long was both an achievement which could be called as well as something to be proud of.'Why are you so happy about it? It wasn't like we had any reason not to trust you."But you also haven't seen your faces as it just so happened for me to mention what was going on.'And a good reason for that, for in that dreadful hall, in the end, two morbid headless statues laid with their arms stretched. Two giant axes blocked the door, and at the top of the wall, there was some sort of inscription in a language which was long unknown.Still distressed after what he'd seen, there was no word from the one in front any longer. Nothing could be worse than to have had realised where he was, and what happened to him. Worst than that, to all of them, as they were in together with their minds, this machine would drive them mad eventually if not killed.'What are we to give?'He eventually asked, being the most observant man out of all of them. There was some sort of dreadful approach coming from that thing, just as the shivering monstrous thin layer of grey fell from under their armoured feet.It had already encompassed everything from below and nothing could justify for this repulsion, at least not in the midst of woe.'What's this?'It's all over our feet, and crawling upwards, help us, creature."My name is Fyor."Standing for something in particular?"Fyoronomus, the mighty, I used to be called."Wait, but you liar, and scoundrel, you said you were a wealthy man who had a normal life. That isn't a name which belongs to a normal man."I've taken another name upon entering this realm, and you shall call upon me on my own desire. Understood?It isn't like I chose to be this way, I need to get as much pleasure as I can without going mad."And I presume, your name isn't the only thing you've given."Oh, that's become a hobby of mine by now, if only you could see what I've seen, the abominations and those dreadful things that float. The bodies and the larvae, what's being prepared for the world. You would have to find yourself something to help you bear with the things I've seen.Do you see those statues there, from which this thin wind like infection spread?They are both filled with something dreadful, with which I've had the morbid curiosity to be locked inside with.'Somehow there was a sort of decrepit pair of figures inside.'How are they kept alive then, good skull? Shouldn't they eat from time to time? Surely they can't just stand there inside for all time's sake."Oh but they are, right now, as a matter of fact, you cannot understand just how well it's for them that so many of you had come.'As their bodies grew weaker, this time it wasn't a feeling, but something physical, as water was drained, their muscles mass devolved. It was more like a pact, seeing how the axes which blocked the door raised up.With a dreadful approach, one of them was strong enough to move and raised its dreadful weapon in the air, letting it fall like a butcher's knife, cutting through the wood and straight where two heads would've been.They were barely pulled behind by those who weren't shocked.It was eating, this was draining, all of them were retreating from the dreadfully armoured one.'Help us, can't you see that we got no way to defend ourselves? He'll butcher us."There's no way out, remember? The previous room had been crushed, not to mention that hole."You should try facing it at least, alone, before I have the chance to come.'The mad-man, grinning again, where had he got that thing from?It seemed like he had already got some pieces of the upper side of a rib, now floating backwards like some madly-undead stingray. Following them from above, at a range where they couldn't see nor go.'We need to form a plan."There might be one, just look at that. Tired of carrying him for as long as this?I'm afraid that this may be our only chance even if it works."They spoke quickly and did more in the terms of pointing rather than speaking. Neither of them realised it saw or heard, but how much of it was understood, they couldn't know.A dreadful thing, to say the least, most of them realised that there'd be a feast of sorts. Once they would be brought to the ground and chopped to pieces, their knees and everything below already looked as if they had been made of bones. It was time to try to end it, as it swiped to the wall. They approached and threw the dead one under its feet and watched the armoured fiend just slip and fall.The entire bridge shook at the collapse. Just as well as they were all shaking in fear of the fact that it may raise itself again.'Quickly, pull him out and let's see."Three of them were at the corpse, while the rest had attempted to get the helmet off.'It won't work that way, not with force alone, you need something else for that.'The helmet had some sort of mechanism inside of it which was crudely designed for another type of thing. Properly set, they wouldn't have complained about the pain they shared.Even if it was just a reaction of the slam, they felt the stinging pain which came only after the body got dragged from under it. 'It's about to wake, I can feel it oozing and pulsating from below."Help us, please, we can't do this alone."My assistance won't be able to get you through all the times."Just this time, please, can't you see he'll wake again? This trick won't work on twice either.'And from the look of it, neither of them was a fighter. They were scum, worse than that, things of woe, prone to mistakes, shiveringly unknown.Their lives which had been left behind were now forsaken and if he wasn't mistaken, this flying abomination wasn't even a human like they were, merely an abomination created by their minds.'So, what will be it then? Do you need my help?Well, if I could get a promise from each of you in part."One of us is mute while the other's dead."Except for the two of them, I need full obedience, understood? Or the one will rise again and finish what he started.'I will."Mind me, for I will obey as well.'This was the beginning of the short-lived chant, and it wasn't going to last much longer. Although the axe wasn't held, they all went on to sit on its back and on its sides.Suddenly the heaviness kicked in and it couldn't act as freely as it could before.Such was the skull waiting for a response, something which would drag them from the dirt. Weirdly so, once the last confirmation came, it spoke again.'From below his neck don't look but feel. There's a small hole inside of it, in which you should be able to shove your finger, at least I know that since I tried jamming one of my teeth inside.'With a slam of air, the helmet popped and bounced on the ground. It was heavy enough to make a dent against the wall and bounce back. Lost on their tracks, there had been no facts left for them to use.Instability came into being. Obnoxiously, it grabbed four of them, ready to crush them on his anvil-like knee. As he got into position, there was a hardship to be had, at least from the viewpoint of the dampness and the darkness inside.'There's nothing there."You need to look further inside and reach with your hand."It's too far from where he's holding me, the grip is too hard."We need to slip some way, my bones are beginning to feel like they're cracking under stress.'During which there came not a second more, the thing which had gotten them unknown. Thrown against the wall they'd shatter, by now, that didn't even matter.They were against it and as it prepared, the silent one came into play again. He was the only one who wasn't trapped, being dragged and staying in the air. With some force, he balanced himself on the anvil and started pulling himself together, just before reaching the neck and pushing one hand inside.'That's the way, just keep digging until you find what you need.'The embrace felt damning, but he'd done it, there, in his hand. There was the oozing thing attached to one organ which was very much still beating.'End it, as was promised, throw it away.'Many of them were stuck in silence, watching as it had occurred. It was dreadful to watch and hear it go ahead and be eaten.The heart was consumed in mere moments, by the time it took to realise it wasn't even alive any longer, the gauntlets let go, they fell.What was left of the knight was hiding there, without hope? They could all feel that dreadful blood just spreading in their system, like some sort of plague of vileness with which they had been infected. A thing of evil, the essence of which brought only the thought of harm to their minds.Each and every one of them had become vile and crept by the side. Neither of them could help it if that meant making mistakes, looking rather human, much like the corpse it was.For now, it almost managed to imitate and leave a smile, before retreating to his docile state.'What is this creature we're attached to? It isn't human, it is woe."I needed that organ, now you'll have to get me another."From where exactly? We barely survived this thing, why can't it all be over already?"Because I need one in order to get you farther than the gate. It's a point where one without a body couldn't travel through. That's the reason why I've been working on creating a new body for myself and no other."You're missing that, heart, aren't you?"Indeed I am, and since you have chosen to let your mute creature devour it instead of giving it to me, you're to bring me the other one.Listen carefully and do not be afraid. Look there, as you can see that it is no longer surrounded by that thing, the layer, the oozing floating gust of mad.'They looked, not as afraid as they had been before. Many of them had bruises and it was getting darker by now, but they had become just as confident as anyone else would've thought them to be. Not only have they dared to do things which weren't supposed to be done, but they also went through it and managed to survive, all by themselves. The dark whispers said, while they commenced and spoke in their vile tongues. A dreadful type of abomination from inside, it grinned. 'So we agree upon in, you snick inside, flip the helmet off then grab the heart out of its box.' 'We haven't agreed on anything as of yet, as a matter of fact, we'd rather return to the place we've been.' 'Through the sealed, crushed, fornicated hole you barely escaped out of? Rather than try getting another heart which is little to no bother? Hah, as if that would serve you right. I see this place hasn't dimmed your sense of humor, old timer, say, have we met, perhaps in a different life?' 'Maybe on the battlefield if you are one of the corpses brought back to life.' 'It was amusing to look back at it that way, there'd be no doubt of whenever or not one would say a thing. No question about it, they were silent, waiting for him to talk.' 'Are we not going to vote any longer?' 'What's the point? Most of us are going to go ahead and vote the same thing as you've done, nothing wrong about it, but it's more like in the terms of the show rather than to hold anything of the sort.' 'He was right, the others nodded in the dark circus. The weather wasn't improving either.' 'Look, it looks like the sky had dropped a few levels outside.' 'That's the effect of weather in this world, better get used to it. The only way to be safe anywhere else is to remain inside. The only to be safer is to be inside a room with few to no windows.' 'And this bridge was filled with them.' 'What will it be then? Since you are the one to decide, I'd rather face only you, the one who's to give me a response.' 'We'll do it then.' 'Will we?' 'Do it he said?' 'He said we'll be the ones who'd do it, all of us, lost in numbers, memories, connected, dragging a corpse and carrying little to our name.' 'As you may have noticed, there's nothing coming from below of him any longer. It switched back to its dormant state, the slumber from which it would only wake when he came near. That's what he thought he'd come to fear. Some instinct, primal depth told him that thing inside would reanimate and grab at him directly, out of all of them, just in spite. He's done more than well in leading them and for now, the time came for an act, this was the fact.' 'We'll do it, I said, or have I not made myself clear before?' 'They went down, and as if the walking corpse was some kind of strange numb limb which was cast retarded, it somehow imitated their movements and walked at the same pace. The illusion came but little doubt laid about it, that was most likely a reanimated corpse of the sorts. Worse than that, there came a rat, scurrying, with a fellow black cat following one another.' 'This is what I was afraid of since you were trying to think it out for far too long. It's already started, perhaps you may want to drop the whole act and just try running towards the helmet.' 'What for? You haven't spoken about this at all when you spoke of the weather.' 'There wasn't any point to it, I tell you, barely, some kind of regretful error on my part. That alone won't help you either, as you must hurry, now, get up.' 'After coming apart, they ran and wrapped themselves, unknotting the small weakness which laid inside. The axe was dropped from its hand and immediately one of the gauntlets blocked the neck hole. Now the helmet laid between the torso and the wall, staying there then rather be set free. Where the axe had laid, on the ground, it hadn't matter since the mouse and the cat had escaped that rapture. Wasn't it a rat? One of the men asked themselves. It could have been either of them, I know but how could I make such a mistake as to not know whichever of it might be.' 'What do we do now? Can't you see we're out of it now?' 'Undo the gauntlet and push it out, just wrap under the joint as you've previously done with the helmet and you'll do well.' 'They've done it again, using four people to throw the gauntlet away. Immediately a second hand came, while the one with no hand just pushed them and held the others apart. It was almost as if it had planned on having them stretched in some kind of attempt to rip them apart. Obviously, it wouldn't do, for even a second when they weren't working on it, there'd be a chance for them to leap and undo the lock. 'It's too far for me to reach. If only there was another way.' Right at that moment, when it came, there was a strong sense of sound, a vibration in the air, the scent. That deformed skeletal body came, like a stingray, stopping in mid-air, as if to throw its bony-sting against the side of the palm. Obviously, it couldn't cover the entire hole and the sting just came right under the fingers, to no avail. 'It needs to be more precise, you won't be able to do it.' 'At least, give me the chance to try while you focus on not being ripped apart.' It was a tight grip nonetheless, for some of them were caught right by the arm, pushed by the legs farther away as if they were carried. 'He's bringing us closer to the window, I think he'll attempt to throw us off the bridge.' 'Stop him before it's too late. I can see the darkness almost reached the bridge.' 'The next room might be protected, I've never got that far, but it may be our only chance.' 'Are you not safe either?' The man asked but there was no word that could've taken him apart. There it was, attempting as hard as any single one of them to do what was right and put the finality to the matter and he questioned it instead of helping. They slipped their hands, one by one, pushing each other's backs in a slick attempt to condemn what was important, so they'd rise. This was important, no demise would come yet. But they were approaching dangerously close, to the edge of the window, that of which was promised. One came close to the other, despite the fact that at least one of them was ready to vomit. 'I'll grab a finger, you grab the other.' They pushed forward, each grabbing the chest, seeing how it had to go around the other used suit of armour, that came as easily as it might. It walked around with little shame, no wonder why his fellow laid dead there. Each iron-like finger was caught, now they were trying, with little strength, unable to lift, even one. 'We cannot do this that way in case you haven't noticed. We will be thrown if we don't find another way to have his joint opened.' 'I think I know, just my father.' One of them had his wrists and arms far smaller than the others and it was time he made his approach. Despite the others having their grey hair, he stood out amongst them with his almost raven black, to dark grey locks which outnumbered his white ones. He was Carpenter, at least he had repeated his name a few times in his head as a result of his condition. Even in the conundrum, he was in, he was aware of the consequences and the risks he was taking. As his hand slipped inside, he grabbed and heard the hand click. One sudden move and his wrist were snapped, his old hand retreated broken, with a blow which pushed them all behind. The old men seemed to have been lost in through, as the handless armoured fiend turned towards them, a single boot raised in the air. Time for crushing, the butcher would arrive. 'You've done well.' It said, just as it grabbed the organ with its spine-like tail. There was something about this image in which the statue was cast. An iron crusher who wouldn't move, stuck just a few feet away from the other they had defeated. 'My hand, my hand, it hurt, make the pain stop.' 'Make it stop, make it stop, the man continued while crying and attempting to comfort himself. They only felt a shiver of the pain he had and it was more than what a man of his age could take. The organ fit right inside and with the little bones which laid around, he had become a floating rib-cage with a beating heart in the chest. 'Push the door open, there's no time to wait, we need to continue if you want to survive and get through this, I bet, you desire to escape this trap.' 'Is there a way, a true way to get out?' 'Indeed there is, and you make get up and push forth the carapace which holds you in. But you must survive in here before it consumes you, hear?' They got up, two comforting the man with a broken hand, one carrying the dead, while the mute corpse kept walking. Well enough as it went on, there had to be some sort of consideration in which case, the damnation was at hand. With the lowering sky, having reached the window, it seemed as if something of it had crept inside the room as well. 'As long as you close the door behind, it will know it's not invited and it won't creep inside. Not through the smallest keyhole, not through the smallest crack. Push it now before it brings them back to life.' 'They can do that? You've not spoken of anything of the sort.' 'Open bodies laying there? What did you expect? This will only get worse as we get through, now open it.' And they pushed together, inch by inch, trying to get as much of it open, as to get one through at a time. When the time came and the open crack was wide enough, the floating two faced guide went through. 'It is safe, let me lit the torches while you make your way.' The wind was cold but there wasn't any stopping to the fire. Without a doubt, there was a dreadful approach to the kind of woe. Within the hall, they entered one by one until the last one came, and the wind pulled it black close. 'Close it properly and place the wooden bar so there'd be no way for them to come.' It was heavy but together, they managed to lift it above the ground and carry it in its place. Before any sound of battering could stop, they realised that there'd be no resistance. 'What is this room?' A wide wooden floor with dark circles drawn on the ground. Three altars laying around the edges of the room hidden, with a pair of stairs which lead to the upper level. 'What have we entered and why are you collecting body-parts?' 'Isn't it obvious by now? I decided to follow and help you only because it benefits me as well, I'm planning on escaping this place, that's all. And I think I'll manage to do it with your help.' That didn't sound right, neither of them enjoyed the sound of that abomination and the thought of it roaming freely in the outside place. The danger wouldn't even suffice as an afterthought. But first things first, this room stank of ill. Drawings on the walls, spilling of red ink, torches, no other detail other than the gargoyles which looked as if they had been hand-crafted for the stairs alone. It was the type of place one wouldn't look twice before he would try doing what was needed to do. Whatever dread filled this place made itself, or rather, themselves be known. A pair of glowing eyes stared at them from above, leaving a feeling of enduring vileness shine. The endless approach would shatter their hope in time, it was just a matter of waiting. They were fuming red wax, spilling some of their vision on the floor. A dreadful way of looking at it, since they went away, never to be seen. 'Where have you been you damned thing?' 'I've already told you that my name is Fyor, though I presume that your ancient minds have already forgotten it.' By the time he returned, he had placed two candles at the back of his skull, where the eyes laid. At that entry of vileness, he had become a floating lantern, as long as he knew how to point it. 'Fyor, there's someone up there, fuming, I don't think we're alone.' 'Good eyes, as for an observer should notice everything that might help him. But I suppose you did realise that not everything is at it seems.' While he approached the upper stairs, they all looked at the grand reveal. A pair of harmless wax statues, twins, who weren't doing anything but melting. Quite so, they came up the stairs to get a closer look. 'You should be aware, as I'm not as familiar with this place as I have previously been with the others.' 'As long as you'll come here with us, we'll scratch your bones and you'll do ours.' With a familiar gesture, they only shook on it metaphorically, not in any other kind of sense. But the grand room awaited and it looked as if once it had been filled with dancers. There had been statues of wax there, past the door, but now only the soles of their feet remained. Something had either gone on or at least someone got busy. 'Am I the only one going insane here over what happened? I don't think those things were supposed to walk again.' 'We're just as disturbed as you, fellow.' One of which had stopped and rested his feet on the ground. 'I say, we take a well-deserved break, just look on it, the door's closed, there's no way for the sky or the dark or whatever to crawl inside the rooms, we can take everything a lot easier.' The old man had ever grabbed some of the wax off the floor and smeared it all over his face. Though that should've been some kind of ritualistic kind of thing, he was looked upon such as a money who had smeared itself with the most dreadful of extractions. 'We should actually sit down, this trip has only made my heart pop and my back crack from the stress.' With at least the understanding, they agreed, making the circle complete. Some were on their backs, while others were amidst their knees, talking in their circle with the nearest peer. While, in the spot where the middle laid, there was the body which came. Nearer by the likes of which the face looked upward then around. He had managed to find himself a small rod of iron to put in place of a bone. Even if it wasn't a fully formed arm, Fyor could stand on one and still manage to walk, almost properly. From leap to leap, sipping on the side, drinks of air. "Think you could find us some wine, Fyor, or something around here?" Roll down a keg of beer as well if you're onto it. "Maybe something which would raise our mood if you're the one going." He was silent but flew away. Neither of them knew if he would find anything of the sort there. Most seemed to think of the place as being ancient, merely chanced for this mad experiment, alas. 'It's dark, for once again.' "Well, you bag of dust shouldn't have sent our only way out in search of. Nevermind it, we should start looking for a way to have a light without him. I couldn't stand it if he were to disappear again on us like he's done the last time." Or this time. A set of laughter, long silenced as it came. The others were already down, far too quiet, long sleeping with the circumstances on. Such was it with their age, no combat training, no stamina left in their bodies. Somehow though, they weren't human there and he knew that, out of all. Most importantly was the fact that he had come to feel depressions from the others. Unexplainable at first, but as he went down to sleep as well, he dreamed of himself being ripped away from others. A bittersweet dream, where one wouldn't feel that closeness of body they displayed, unable to be dragged down by those who wanted to wait. He wished for no such thing and apparently, he had gotten what he desired most, disclosure for starters. Being alone wasn't only enough but he wouldn't dare approach the point where he'd creep in to cut the others. No, that wasn't him, despite the regulations they had each managed to cut down, they didn't deserve that kind of a punishment. Yet they were dormant and at their worst. Each of them would thank their commanding unit later if it was revealed that it was him who decided they had to be helped and cut apart. Not to mention that it was also the right thing to do in order to save himself from the damnation which waited forth. He could feel that sting, that dread, the misery, not in his words. All of his medals, tokens, decorations removed, because he did the least unsatisfactory thing and let the abomination live. That wasn't man any longer and it took him a few minutes of not being part of them to realise that. By the time he could find a weapon, anything would suffice if it meant cutting the grown that had pulled them together. And that's what it was, he looked at the stump of grown which had laid between the two of them, standing like a worm. He moved away from it and fell back to sleep as if waking up and returning from the utmost lucid dream. In this new realm of dreams, he walked alone, as one who wasn't to be caught in the trap he had laid. A pair of string and a small explosive which would blow, right next to a marked three. Low enough, near the leaves, that's where he had placed it. The three weren't as dark, or red, but he reminded himself that it was war, a few too many flashes and his mind would start seeing things in a different way. Without a doubt, there was something holding him back from going forth. There was a schedule of death to follow and either he was to follow it and murder on time or other might come forth and take his place. A shiny blade laid in his mouth, but there were humans no more. Strange dreams, the sky was blank, it had some blue-tinged on the sides, but it also had giant holes which seemed to have been absent at any other given time. Despite wondering at that, he had to hide and wait for the enemy.'What in the name of?'He almost yelled and gave himself away. On flying sponge, a twister horn which crawled from inside the hole came straight above his position and appeared as if to scout the entire area. This type of encounter was damning for his mind, he couldn't comprehend the form, whenever it be some kind of flying stinger or a new type of weapon he wasn't prepared for, he couldn't tell. The best strategy, for now, was to hide and bide for a time until reinforcement came. And a man was slowly approaching, an enemy to be precise. He wasn't expecting that thing either, as he pointed with his rifle and started raining down bullet against the outer shell of its body. 'This won't work against it.' He found himself out of line again, not another word. It floated in a most benign way, revealing a set of incisors which were pushed with air-defying strings out of an opening. It formed a small net, boiling with steam from the likes of which it launched like a projectile on the poor soldier's face. He was the enemy but even they gave themselves quick deaths between one another. No one had to suffer that much until now. Caught between the helmet and the face, the net melted the skin in a most disturbing manner. From the hole there came another short incisor, launched like a single string-projectile. It pierced both of his legs, to prevent the run, making sure there'd be enough time for itself to create more with the help of the strings and those canines. There'd be plenty to collect, for it seemed to have waited along until the man passed out or died. No scream, just the dreadful image of that bone-like, dirt coloured flying horn as the last thing the man had seen of the face of the earth. Its teeth were taken back as the strings were being retracted inside the hole. Most importantly, it collected the teeth of the man. 'Now it's the time.' He said while throwing one single rock as to activate the system. A bunch of wooden spears had found their wait, cracking against the shell but piercing the exposed part of its body. A bloody travesty, as it is said, there's nothing which could prevent the dead from coming back now. It struggled but it couldn't set itself free. No amount of string or canines could help it now since it had been impaled against the hardened sampling. It would be cruel to let it suffer for so long, but that's what he had his knife for. He approached, making sure no other of its kind would come from the holes left in the sky. That carapace, the shell, looked big enough to fit his arm. It wouldn't do some good to block some bullets, only if for that alone. They might be frightened by the man who had slain a dark creature such as it was. Spikes, and juvenile extractions on its outside, that thing had grown too dark conditions. No wonder it was suffering that way, there wasn't a way to tell what was on the other side, in their part of the world. Slowly he started cutting, aiming for the insides. Looking at that, he seemed to have noticed the incisors and the strings it had collected, trying to bulge out of the body. Just as he was done with the next piece of this beautifully outlines neck, he pulled the head, leaving all of them to fall onto the ground. 'You were made to bring a lot of destruction from the looks of it. Too bad you fell for the simple ingenuity of man.' Noise from the upper garden. More from behind. It looked like there'd be no time to make it out with his trophy. But just in case, he had dared to place a piece of cloth on his hand and wrap one of the strings around a hand-held blunt square. A device which was placed inside, too much pressure and it would go off. Hopefully, it would go off either way because he was prepared for it. Immediately, after the alteration was gone, he saw the blood finally come out, giant bubbles coming out of its insides. The strings had turned red and blue. Were those its veins it had been launching? Were those creatures mad? If memory served right, he had heard of some rare species of lizards that had come close to extinction in his time. They had some system in which they sprouted blood of out their eyes to drive away the predators. Could it be that after the impalement and the cuts, that thing was still alive? Strings were still moving from its inside but he had moved from that dangerous spot a long time ago. There'd be no way for him to give in his position, not now, for whoever was out there. He'd be out of their range by now, unable to be heard or seen. One would have to question where had he been for so long, creeping. That seething repugnancy kept coming from inside the horn. Those were enemy soldiers after all, but it had been too late to enjoy the show. He had managed to come along the by the riverside when he heard the explosion kick in. Four casualties from the times he checked, one dead unless they all kicked the bucket then. More would come towards the point, but he couldn't give in. With an attempt to clean his face with water, he realised that he was just filling his hands with soft and cold, liquid wax from a small wax pool. It was still dark, but he wasn't seeing things, there was a statue there, another one of those gargoyles which blew from its nostrils and somehow managed to prevent from hardening and clogging the holes from which it came. 'What hour is it? Where am I?' He looked around, barely seeing, it appeared as if he had managed to crawl merely a few steps away from the body. Was he even separated, to begin with? A single stroke on the back revealed some long, upturned, thin, extension of meat, which went all along the puffy conception he had come from. This wasn't freedom, merely parole. He was allowed to leave as long as that link wasn't broken and who knew what would happen if that were to be as well. There came the next realisation, that he wasn't truly dreaming, as he noticed a hole in the ground. A few steps from where the act had happened, there laid a wax mark which dragged itself below. Other four wax men stood there on the ground, turned as if to stare. One blink of an eye and he was already there. 'If this is a delusion, all that I need is to run.' He got on his feet and passed the thin river with a leap. Something bad and harmful was about to happen, especially since more of those creeping things started coming from the sky. Well too aware that once he'd be broken in the mind, he'd die. Off to a great start, making his way as well as his part. Only that he had to outrun death which followed, the solitary man who revealed himself, only to be picked, running, shaking the leaves and leaving a lot of shoe marks on the ground. This was his nightmare now, but what about the others? The man was still stuck in the room, at least until the point where he hit himself against the wall and got stuck. He passed out, only to be dragged by the thin and long extension, right where he belonged. About the others, two shared dreams, this time being stuck into one another, and ends which brought most dread. For started he had a tail, two heads, a body which belongs to a sort of deformed creature with seven legs and openings of mouths that weren't in their normal faces but at the tops of their heads. A body laid between the two of them, but they had both human hands and pushing thin walls which came to prevent any possible fall. One great set of eyes laid on the chest but each was kept close as to avoid confusion. Shared vision was already confusing as it were, to say. 'You should close your eyes, I need to see.' But looking at how his mouth had become something superficial, he became dreadfully afraid to talk. Both of them were indeed in need of some sort of walk. Neither knew what happened, but they've seen this world before. 'Should we go on the road then?' 'Keep your eyes closed I said. We should encounter those of which are filled with dread.' On the road they had come to see, a merchant, travelling with his back, not to be seen. A man, a human, much to their surprise. 'I'm seeling corpses my dear sirs, want to buy one?' A piece, apart, the town at hand was shallow. It was dark, it was raining and their skin was pale, the scales were narrow. Just like some sort of wogs they appeared, having been dragged from the darkest depths of some unknown abyss. And this grandness bore through them a desire to creep. 'What do we have, we need to trade something to the man.' 'I know, I know, but let me see.' Intentionally, he pushed a knuckle into one of the extending skin-walls, coming out of a side.

He pierced it and looked at it as if it was some kind of storage compartment rather than their body. 'We're all bones with big fat organs, it seems. But what is that shiny thing down there?' It took a few tries, as it were, looking into your own body, having your hand swim in that amorphous liquid which crept even the most human into the creation of dread. Nothing was being said after. But they took out something which had to be worth a something, after all, it was a token of pearls. 'Straight from the abyss, I count? Well, this should buy you a few pieces of a body, what say you? Shall we make this deal or would you rather take one for yourselves? The town right there is filled with dread, the men and women and the children are afraid. We broke them a long time ago, but this, the meat had been prepared, cooked and salted. A disgusting through, repulsing, the way he spoke about his fellow men. He had to be dealt with as soon as they were well. But what was that and why had they made the deal with the damned one? It seemed like the other one with his eyes closed was listening to his instinct, rather than his sense. A mad thought to have in a world such as this one. But these were plays, nothing serious at all, merely blankets of disguise and thoughts which weren't meant to be alive. Something told both of them that heading inside would bring nothing short of trouble in their minds. 'What have we to lose then? Look behind, there's nothing out there, at least for long miles. Do you seriously think it's worth it, terrorising the poor saps?' 'Why not, if this is what I think it is, let's go ahead and see.' That dreadful pieces of meat did seem quite tasty after a while, only that they have been placed inside the compartment of the chest. An ugly way to look at the manner. Putrid and strange, mightily deranged, one would have to say. More likely, once the day would come, they would be seen. 'Better do it in the dark, let's snick and see what there inside.' He pointed at one of the small houses and seemed pulled by the idea of creeping through. There were two people under the blankets, forming a strange bulk. Was it fair to disturb them during their sleep? Should we head there, might we look the same way at that once we're done with it? With a shattering blow, the lock was off, they entered the house. It was obvious that the bulk had become awake, by the way, it was shaking, it knew of the intruder. There came the approach, a dark light, the curtains slowly pulled against the windows. No one stumbling at night would see, but the problem was for them not to reveal them with the help of a scream. Directly next to them, they both waited, preparing those limbs, slowly breathing. Damned lungs, they made too much noise, too sharp, for far too long. It was a dead giveaway that they were there. Little to no matter, as it came to be, both of them looked at both ends of the bulk in the bed and came to decide, which end had to be smothered. Both ends looked as if they had the heads there, ready to be pushed, slashed, slashed, so on and so forth. Dreadful thoughts started pouring. Both of them were watched in the dark. Awake at the same it, they noticed the creeping mute, standing when everyone else was sleeping. Could it be that it was because of him that they were having those dreadful thoughts, the nightmares and the vileness which was felt? It appeared like that thing was the only one catalyst of their problems. A probe of skin and meat, the gaze, it seemed to be directly pointed at the two of them. 'What should we do? Perhaps we could wake up the others and tell them.' 'Tell them we're sharing a sick fantasy together? Get back to sleep already and try not looking at it.' But it was getting dangerously close to being frightening, at least to him. There it was, a being which did nothing but stare and it had become more of a dark omen than anything else he had seen. A pair of beady eyes and no expression in the dark. It looked like some cross-breed between some mad creature which spent most of its time morbidly observing, with little of the human side in the mixture. One gaze was enough to reveal its malevolent evil and how it waited there for something to be done. 'Go to sleep."The man said, watching the dark, slowly as the corpse went on to surrender to some primal instinct of listening to his commands.Once he was, sure enough, that he wouldn't get up, there came some sort of arrogance, the vile threat is ended. He would sleep without having to be brought to the damning vile visions.'I think we were waiting for you to come. I had no control over the body until you came, and this time felt as if I was stuck in a prison.'"Stop complaining.'But he stopped himself once he thought about the way he spoke. We were waiting for you, something in the lines made him no want to turn.'Make a great stop and turn around, I know it's there.'His head had become dizzy, he felt as if he was in that bed, holding his wife at home, the one who had died of lungs malnutrition a few years ago. A dreadful fate, not even worse.He was there, standing next to that creeping thing which was his other half. Still passively following, but this time free of action. Without that to stop him he had become a corpse which followed.'Ignore him and look at what's important.'His newly found terror pointed and where he thought was to be. It was smothering after all. That alone served as a decider. Not to mention what they'd feel, the temperature raised itself inside the room.It felt like they were close to some kind of burning furnace or a stove which was left on and came to a fire. A feeling which wasn't to be called upon, the dread no longer gone.Was it the fault of everything wrong which happened? Could it be trusted to remain?'I don't feel comfortable being in its presence any longer.'"Then make sure you're done with this and let's get out of it as fast as we can.'Immediately they both grabbed both ends which their pair of hands, extending and stretching their meat probes around, directing brute force without having to strike at all. They had stretched in patches which converted energy into blunt strokes of pain.That alone was enough to end them without another sip of breath, but on the other side, they felt their bones cracking and being smashed by the mere force which had been brought on the table. More than that, the bed had been broken on both sides as well, the force keeping the pumps through various damning vibrations.It kept pumping, unable to stop. Whilst moving his flattened fingers, he felt the entire room shake, unable to stop the motion or the strong vibration which came with it.A cutting edge, like that of steel, started chopping wood bone, melting skin, creating a throng. Some of the vileness avoided the walking corpse, which watched.But from his side, the essence of evil crept in the human, parts of them which were that way raised themselves up by the time he was done and stopped the destruction.Despite being chopped in many halves, the couple released themselves from under the blankets with a pair of unmoving body parts as well as blank looks in their eyes. Prior to this, they would've become aware of something dreadful, especially with what they had become.But now, these people or the pieces of them which stood adjacent, very much alive, with no blood coming out of there stood there.'Move, move I said.'After a command, he had been slapped around, the torso, missing his lower part.At least his wife was headless, with both the body and the head aware of their surroundings.'Is this his fault? It must be, I know it its, dreadful thing which creeps inside, how can you make that claim?'There was no one sane in the room to make the thing clear. Oh, dear.One of the old men thought, what can we do now?What if?He took a second off to pull what had been inside of him, looking rather dreadfully pale, once he opened the wall-like compartment to see the cooked chops and muttons, the man's head staring back at him.Alive in the sense, that it was reanimated and quickly disposed of.'You cretin, that was inside of us? Alive?He could've chomped on our organs, bit us to death if you weren't paying enough attention. It could've been your fault."Relax and try to no get too much attention to us. We'll leave now and leave them here. No one will suspect a thing."What if it follows? That one is tied to us and cannot get away when needed.

What makes you so sure it won't follow after we leave?"We'll see to it, don't worry. You'd better go ahead and hurry before I get a hold of our motor functions.Because if I'll be in charge, I'll never return to this town, nor would I look back for any other thing again."All right, all right, just close those damn eyes, you're giving me a headache with all ten of them brightly spotted.'Thoroughly, they had been forgotten since they were kept close at all times.'You, don't follow!'He said while pointing at the corpse. A strong feeling told him that there wasn't a choice in the matter anyway, and he'd be followed just as soon.Another house had to creep in and so far no madman left at night to stumble in the dark.Expectations were left in place for danger, something which was much stranger than expected.'It looks like a small home, just one person inside, for what I thought."There's salt on the doorstep, see? Whoever's inside, they belong to some paranoid lot which beliefs in old stories of woe."On a good reason that just turns around.'He had opened only an eye to look, but seemingly, this distraction was welcomed in good terms.There it was, standing like a dark mule. In the dark and at the distance, it almost looked human, except for those evil eyes which crept inside.Without the hinges or the sound of the door being opened, there was some extremity of the kind. Neither of them was blind.Somewhat the man-creature appeared there, without having to have opened the door. Such a disturbing thing to think about, that such a creature was somehow unstoppable, whenever or not they wanted to admit, both were crept by it.'Let's just head inside, perhaps if we're lucky, it may not be able to pass the line of salt.'As long as they believed that, they were both getting closer to being safer. At least, from what they have been aware, there was something there waiting for them, in the last. Inside they entered, with a quick lockpicking trick. One finger pushed, and the lock was diminished at a level which laid far beyond the human eye.They smiled at that, entered and closed the door.It was indeed a woman who was sleeping there alone, boney, but curved. Somewhat of a beauty which waited in the night. With at least a window perching, there was none other in the house.Ever so approaching and creeping, there it laid, the corpse, waiting and watching them, stalking as a true dreadfully aware being. Now it was the time to be crept by it, a thing which refused to give in and stay away.With their every action being seen, there was a distaste for what they had been planning on doing next.'We cannot do it if we're watched."Don't make any noise unless you want to be caught."They've done a great job in regulating themselves and their own speech, as to never hear one another tremble to speak too loud. She'd hear, she'd wake up, then shout in terror for the real beast was there in front of her.It felt like they had become a new breed of creeps, assailants.Something which was even worse than what they had done to the poor couple without any consideration of their lives. There she was, someone who was better, a beauty in her own rights.'If she dies, she'll be just as cursed."Oh you dreadful one, have you lost your mind as well? We cannot slay such a beauty, her mere presence makes me more humane.Does it not do the same for you, my fellow?"I feel something but weep of pain, you reek of despair. Look at yourself and what have you become. She could never accept you for what you are, so take it off your mind.'He was right, they have arrived with some sort of dark intention which wasn't spoken outright. There wasn't any sort of light left any longer, just the silence.Those beads were dangling, but both were aware that they haven't moved at all in their sockets. At least they knew that this kind of despair was in their pockets.'I feel ashamed of doing what we're doing now, certainly, there has to be another way. Something we could say."Who's there? Who's making all this fuss in my room, intruder?'Both or the same, took a step behind, having been struck lame.All of the sudden a pair of evil eyes opened and looked through the dark.'Close your eyes.'He whispered, now both of them looked through the many directional, forming openings from which the vision came. A sick thought which just ran by. One whispered to another. 'Let me do the talking. Are you all right ma'am? I couldn't help it but be drawn in here, your door was unlocked, and you seemed to be there, with little of your shivering life floating.' 'Is it morning already? I cannot tell.' Poor lass, both looked and saw just how much her eyes had degenerated, with their pupils missing, white as silk. It looked almost as if someone had poured some kind of bitter milk on them. Evil, vile, corrupt, she must be kept alive. The thought ran and bounced between the two of them but came out dry. She still has to be taken care of, just look outside, it's gone. Somehow I believe that he went to get some others, leaving the vile thoughts behind to rising. But these thoughts were too personal to be heard, there was no echo between their chambers. Mere distraction, as she spoke again. 'Will you accompany me through the town?' 'I will most certainly do.' But there was a problem, he still hadn't the human parts which were needed to be felt. 'May I be the ones guiding you, in case you don't mind?' There was a nod. 'May I get my coat off the wall?' There was another nod, at which the other almost bit a piece of his ear. She's blind, oh, right, poor old me. 'I'll get it immediately.' With which he wrapped it around her, placing the humans which looked and felt closest to being human on her shoulders. Outside, by the time they went, the sky looked flat, the roofs weren't sharp any longer, it was time for a commotion to happen. Some light came into some houses and it was time to bring her away. 'Do you trust me?' 'How couldn't I?' She was shaking, her voice was cracking and there was some mild depression to it that of which made her unaware. 'Well, are you going to do something bad to me? No one would find me if you were to it and leave my body in the night.' An expression of shock ran on both of their faces. Was this woman right in the head? There wasn't any doubt that something was wrong with her, at the worst level possible. At least from the awareness of woe. They both looked at each other and thought the finality of saying. 'No, my dear, I merely decided to take you somewhere safe. You see, neither of us is human, and you may have realised.' 'Indeed, I knew that to be true. I'm only partially blind, look.' Her pupils were small, almost a fraction of what they were, but on a closer inspection, they were definitely there, swimming in the milky pools of her eyes. 'But.' 'I'm sorry for any deception, but I had to make sure of your intentions, of which I'm still deciding what's to be said about.' 'You can only see just fractions of the world?' And such, but it seems like you had a second head after all. 'At which she smiled. They should've thought of something better, but nothing came to mind. 'Let's just head there, though.' 'Wait, no yet. Do you mind, before I am to come with you if we make a stop somewhere? I have some errands to do or something to deliver. A payback if you're willing to help.' Those devilishly looking grins, the whelps, agreed upon her request and followed. 'What's your name?' 'Mellisa, good sirs, and what might be yours?' 'Henry Clarke and this good fellow who seemed to have kept his eyes closed.' 'Plain Murphy.' He said with a thick accent, a degenerative trance having induced both once they realised they have been watched. 'Tell me this Mellisa, do you see that thing there, creeping in the dark?' 'Far too well for my own comfort. Why is it there?' More importantly, why was it creeping behind the fence, as if trapped in someone's garden? It occurred to both that the dreadful thing was merely pretending to be inanimate. Though in the past it had shown to obey some commands with a tiny amount of reluctance, it certainly did follow what had to be done. Which was to say that it wasn't right. Something wasn't and isn't right about that human-looking creature. The long pauses, the way it suddenly appeared when it wasn't called or needed. Worse was the fact that they felt as if there was an unbreakable bond between them, one which would extend no more. 'Let's head away from its presence before something bad happens." Agreed. They said to one another and appeared to have crept between themselves. At least this was safe enough for them to walk around the buildings, wet, as the dirt turned into muck. 'Say, Melissa, are you aware that there's a vendor farther away from the entrance in this town selling some ubiquitous things which aren't supposed to be in his possession?' 'I'm sorry but it's forbidden to talk about him, under no circumstance by the council of this town, youth, elders and everyone with half-a-mind.' Which was what kept them away from danger. 'Just follow me for now, I've got a few errands which need to be taken care of. At least starting with that one, you see it?' She seemed to have pointed at a pole after dragging them through the town, alone. One single metal pole, with a sleeping blue dove at the top, tied to it by a strong string. 'That's how they're used to deliver messages to the other colonies.' 'What other colonies? Exactly, what's going on in here?' 'No more questions for now, just follow my lead and listen.' She barely pointed in the general direction of a pond nearby. A few small rocks laid there, thrown by the pool, too clean, too nice to look natural. Some of which had been carved in a way which would make them a perfect weapon in the hands of a good thrower. 'What do you want me to do with?' 'I believe it's obvious by now, I've been walking by the pond daily for near a year now. Make sure you grab a few of those. You may be strong but you need all the help you can get.' A spoonful of rocks was taken, hidden in the compartment. Near all of them had been so clean and sharp that there was a wonder how they didn't cut through his stomach while inside. Now, they looked more likely to be blunt than anything else. Strong enough to shatter bones rather than cut through the meat. Speaking of which, there it laid resting by the pole. 'I need to you take Emily down with only a stone.' 'It had a name?' 'Yes, Emily, named after the deceased daughter of the town mayor. Is there something wrong?' 'No, nothing, just why have you told us her name? We could've gone ahead without knowing that detail. Its death would've been a lot easier than you think.' 'It had to come since both of them were restless and unsure themselves of what they had to endure in case they failed.' 'What are you waiting for then? Are we doing this or should I look for someone more suited at this.' 'We will do it, just give us a moment.' Some reluctance came but the aim as well. With enough strength, it flew without a sound and blew the head off that little dove. After which it fell defeated, while the rock still laid somewhere in the dark. 'Come here, it's falling.' Both of them wrapped their hands around Melissa and held her as dearly as they could. Some warmth could be felt around those arms, but not the tenderness of humans. 'That's enough, the rock isn't going to fall on my head.' And after a few seconds, the rock showed up, a few miles away, in the distance, straight in the dirt, far apart than any other building in the vicinity. 'Well, that could've been close.' 'And something might've happened to you if the stoned just turned flying upwards instead of going forward.' 'Just take back the rock and let's move on.' She had a set of napkins, ready to be used, while the two of them went to recover the small pebble. Apparently, she wrapped the dove's body inside them, while using a sharp pocket knife to cut the string attached. A clean kill with no sounds, of which neither of them could get used to. Somehow that silent animal felt more real than the pair they had taken care of. 'We can carry on with our list.' 'There's an entire list we have to take care off?' 'Don't worry, I won't ask you to murder a child or woman.' But that alone didn't cover the list entirely, even with her large grin resting on her sides. 'We'll just make sure nothing bad happens, to be certain. Do try to follow when you're told. The night is thin after all, and you should be used by now of doing what you're told.' She was right in a way, they followed, curious as to what she wanted. Reeking of something, they approached a barn. 'You may have guessed after the smell. That's mainly how I'm guiding myself now. It's a vagrant thing, a smelly rotten cheese among others."The food supplies."And we got a winner, we're going to contaminate them. Well, it's more like you're going to be contaminating it rather than me."Why are you doing this Melissa, if you don't mind us asking?"Two stares from one-another revealed that one of them at least agreed to what she was doing, while the other stood, concealed.'It's a payback, in case you're interested. A payback for what was done to me.Look, if you want to get into detail, let's do it later, or sometimes where we're not actually doing something which may get us caught. Because I can assure you that even with your monstrous body and silent friend, you're still no match against an entire town on your own.That much was true, and neither could deny the fact.He'd been taken by surprise plenty of times now and against an entire town, there'd be no fight.'What do you think would happen if I were to scream now for help?"Exactly the same if we did it and ran, leaving you with the dead pigeon in your hand. Unless you think they would believe a story where a two-headed creature appeared and cut the rope off, bringing a small corpse with it."All right, all right, we're both set to be caught now. I may have been unfair to you, I must admit.'You're far more clever than you look. She thought and grinned with a dark shine to her harrowing eyes. Pleased by their small retort, she continued on her mark.Just how exactly did she think those food supplies would be contaminated, to begin with? That didn't appear like an easy task, at least not one without an outsider's influence.'I think I might have the perfect plan if you're still listening."They were all ears, especially for the fact that they were rather unaware of their surroundings and what was going on around them.Most likely a result of the fact that they were being manipulated by the woman, without even knowing her intentions, obeying rather than acting on their will. Such a poor woman, blind, unable to do those vile acts on her own.'How do you suppose we do this then? Burn them, pour some poison or some toxin we should've had on us?"No, nothing such as that, it's going to be more subtle than it, I'm thinking.'Melissa gave a nod, and looked around, unsure of what exactly could be done about the supplies. For once they could be given a short flame and burnt, releasing the mud-filled fumes that would wake everyone up.But that would give it all away, which was a bad thing since she wanted to do so much more on her bucket list.'It's settled then, I think I know what we might do. Just follow me and listen."They did as she was pleased, looming around some old three which wasn't of one piece any longer.'I was planning on using this on a special occasion but I believe there won't be another such as this one.'She pointed at a plating spot right next to the oak, it had to be under it.'Just dig until you hit the metal spot and you'll know what's happened. No one will know it's been hidden there, not a soul, not worse than a suffering Buffon who were to stumble there.'He went to his work and looked around, with a tongue which was wagging, he came to ask.'Is that another piece of the town you're planning on destroying? They seem to be planning on another quarter of it, if not more."Ignore that for now, that's a different town they're planning on bringing to life. Investors and such decided it would be worth it to bring another town to life, right next to ours."And your plan to drive them away is to trick them into thinking this place is cursed?"But both of them realised just as soon as they looked at themselves that this place was truly cursed. And it extended over the land as far as it stretched over its people.She was just as afflicted like any other around them. Worse was the fact that both of them felt the decay happening around their bodies, melting, shimmering, stretching in large veils of skin.They would have to hurry if they desired to bring this project to fruition. 'Found it, your small box of rat poison.'Enough green, yellow, mucus in the bottles to kill an entire battalion.'I have thoroughly thought about my supplies and a few methods which would be required to go on with it. But neither of them were subtle enough."And this will be.'There came the nod and the explanation. 'This is no common rat poison, for you see, if you would've read the bottle you would've understood that this poison is set to disappear as soon as it's applied on the area. It would be better if you thought of it as some invisible ink of some sort, if anything, a deadly set of ink which would more harm than well.' 'What about their water supply?' 'Great thinking, I have almost forgotten. I'll take a few of these.' She had grabbed at least twenty bottles in her lap, displaying a bit of her breast while doing so. Nevertheless, there was a clear jolt of life in her dead eyes now. A quick reminder. 'Turn the bottles around and spray away, the liquid should spread around the area and infect everything in no time. But just to be sure, save five or six more of those, we still have some work to get on with.' As they both continued in the dreadful clarity, they somehow listened and looked around. 'Are you sure we're supposed to do this? Won't there be consequences?' None that either could think of since they still imagine this to be a dream. Other than being watched by the mute being, there'd be no other witness to observe their dream. Perhaps that's the reason they went on with it, spraying the muckus all over the cheese and the meat, the bottles which were previously half-opened and the pastry. It wasn't a great an idea to put all eggs, the grains and the bear in one room, but they were done with it. The infection had spread and just as Melissa had promised, there had been no trace of the poison. Not a single rat inside either. 'And the next thing on the list?' 'Keep one bottle hidden in these wicked tribal trousers, I say. We'll make use of one later.' He had a demonical look on his face which was of no good. Murphy and Clarke, partners in crime now, on their own road, followed their needs and thoughts of what she'd want them to do. 'We still have a few bottles and I believe I heard the sound of cattle.' 'Are you sure we're supposed to do this? She hadn't.' 'Nonsense Murphy, I think it was implied, why else would she leave us with so many other bottles if not to use them on the living pests? They'll have better luck with eating he scurrying rats next after we're done with it.' 'Pigs and cattle, all in the same area, having the slough spread and ready to be touched by their illness.' 'Are you sure we're supposed to do it?' 'Do not say a word until she asks us to go on with it, understood?' 'But what if?' 'Murphy, you must follow my lead, understood? I haven't felt this much alive in a decade or so, don't ruin this for me. Can't you see that none of this might have any effect of what's happening out there? It must be part of the experiment on the human reaches and what we'd be capable of it there were no consequences.' They would die in the most harrowing ways possible, with little doubt in mind. Even now when they smelled the stench of the vile substance, they were pulled from their slumber and came to feed themselves. 'Two more bottles left, what are you planning to do with them?' 'I thought I told you already Murphy, that's none of your business, it's not even hers. We've been tasked to bring destruction to this town and that's what we'll do.' Some seriousness here and there but he couldn't tell whenever or not something was going to happen. At least in that sense, there was no defence for the vile acts he had in mind, which followed. 'There, can you see her anywhere in sight?' 'No, but I don't know where the well is exactly located. It could be here, or there, far away.' He had no clue and for a good reason, he shut his mouth when they entered another house. Though this time, it was far more spacious than any other. From the looks of which you could tell that the owners had something of their own compared to the others. At least, looking at it from a different angle it seemed like the house almost got close to one of the ones belonging to their day and age. 'How does afford this?' 'Make silence now, can't you see we're going to follow through with the plan?' Some dreadful silence here and there, no creaking on the floor, no other noise to give them away. It felt as if they were stalking for some prey, tied by the wall as soon as they saw the figure of a child. She walked down the stairs in her stroll. It felt as if that they were fooling themselves when thinking of the dreadful clarity this showed. The shame, the same thing which crept away, what would they do, what would other say? We can't kill a child, that is too much, that wouldn't do. And the worst feeling crept, despite not being able to see him, they felt him out there, looking after them, making sure whatever happens the men and women wouldn't die. But it was dark and she only carried a candle there. The blue light of which spread in a curling ball of radiance around there through the night. With the curtains pulled, and no light there, she barely opened the eyes herself, moving rather at a memory's pace. The kitchen was downstairs, exposed, it was a large house after all. With a fraction of a small wall separating the common room among other fractioned rooms, she placed the light on the counter. 'We should move.' Whispered Clarke, looking set upon taking care of the needs. But they didn't go after the child, instead, they walked up the stairs and followed the scent. One door stood open by the left side of the corridor, one which turned to the right. What a weird design they thought. Not only were the rooms connected with doors, but they also had multiple ways to enter. That way one could either get away straight out of the door or take a right and be met by the view outside. It was a height to behold. With the certainty that the room was the daughter's, they closed it behind and pretended to be their child. If there was some semblance of parenting shown, they would follow their daughter's every move, regardless of what was to happen. Right by the door, they hid, looking how it suddenly opened. One head came right in, only to be grabbed by the pair of reachers and be grabbed inside. After which, the door closed, there was no scream as the head got sealed in halves, the body falling over. This fool had done it again, he'd taken the mother by surprise, leaving nothing but pieces which were fractionally alive. Not a single doubt came any longer, that they took her and place her inside. One more person in the house of dread had to be taken care of and they could already feel themselves changing. More rabid with each time someone faded at their hand. With a slender approach, they held one of the hands the woman had and opened the door with it. Greeted by a sleeping father, they closed the door and came to be. Her hand just brushed around her husband but when he turned, the terror came. In the darkness, the beast was stung by nothing, least remorse as it covered and went through the same motions, the vibrations which could cut through steel if given the chance. It felt almost as if both of them were caught in a trance. It felt well, seeing them still alive, in a state of silent observation. His wife joined him as soon as she could. Together they looked like pieces of dolls which didn't find they ways to fit. More likely they were, not only because they didn't bleed, but something told both of them that they didn't think either. Not any longer. 'We should leave now before we alert the child.' 'There were other rooms, what if she has brothers left?' 'I didn't think you would step in but I think that's enough for a night, wouldn't you agree with me?' At least they were set on leaving, right through the door, followed by a curl of light. There were no windows there, just an opening to the abode of the world, on which they stepped, the roof slabs, then on the ground. It felt as if they haven't even gone inside. But there it was looking like a man who had been caught in his disguise. For once they looked and saw some genuine emotion the creature's eyes. Not human yet, but something close to disgust, repulsion, that deed which had been done was dirty. 'We should find her, now, before we're getting pulled by other needs.' 'No, we should continue doing this to them instead. Haven't you felt them that way? It couldn't be that I was the only one who's felt it? One feeling remained as strong as it had been the first time they felt it. A groan in the stomach, a pain which would force them to stop and act. This was the moment in time which dragged at their minds and the first steps they took, the story they had seen was blank. Only a

dak curtain remained, and a catatonic type of sleep came after. Neither of the two of them had been aware of the other part which happened next, only that there was a creepingly still silence which remained. A blunt kind of thing that was, mountains which were cut from the bottom of the earth and bore their cuts all around their massive bodies, it would be some kind of mistake to think that those marks had been made naturally, but then, so was the place in view. As seen from above, there's been a few months passed since the dreaded encounter had been set. Despite the setbacks in the past, it looked as if the frame for two grand towns had been set there, in the confines of the darkest sides of dirt. Mounds had been raised, trees had been cut and there had been no cattle there. One oak tree stood there alone near black windows and a sort of hut-like terrace, creeping from the inside of which he was some kind of annoying pest with large eyes, visible even from the distance. It had done its strange rituals from there but never understood what pulled the men of value over the lands. What exactly had crept there and who was in charge? Riding some sort of pale and sick horse made the man realise the value of the animal's life. It was less than nothing with its putrid bones sticking out, the mere had been starved but at least he was confined with the fact that there had been others of its kind behind. Why had the man looked so familiar and why was he selling sick animals? Greetings, out of a chance, have the two of us met before? I seem to recall most of the faces I've seen but yours. "Oh, yes indeed, we met moments ago when you came with me with a most accusatory story." "What have I said exactly?" "Well, my good traveller, in your own words, of ill and hate, you called on a truce no longer with the kind of men. You wanted to come and bring ruin to their lands before they build it on a far stronger level and undermine your work." "What work of mine? What do you know, strange merchant?" He stroked his beard and revealed a wide felacious smile under the hood he wore. For some reason he wore some delight as well as he touched the poor animal on the head, pushing and caressing a hand through the exposed parts it had. A damning image for the weak of heart but he waited at that and thought. Could it be that I was set free? Free from them, to wreak havoc and much as I desire, no, that's unlike me. I would never harm another human being, what say you in your defence? "Then why is that a torch bonded to your armour?" A black belted, shallow metal, layered on a rust-covered plate which made it hard to look at. Something about the way how the multiple coats of steel which had been placed upon one another made it seem like it had been done by a novice blacksmith. Not only that, but they were somehow layered with metal barb-wires which had crept inside through various holes made inside the armour. It was entirely held by metal strings, which made plenty of clingy noises while he walked or rode on the mere. Obviously, some of the strings were long and unattached, puncturing through the suffering animal as well. On top of his head laid a helmet like no other, and as his armour was important to note, it was just like the man said. He had a curved knife which missed its pointy end but kept its sharpness and a torch for him to bear. There was a lot of hay which had been brought in the area and it didn't take someone of high class to understand where it was going. I've got no ill intention, as a matter of fact, I'm not even heading there myself. "Of course, you're not, you wouldn't dare. A good man wearing an armour which would bring only despair if it were to be seen by the men. Wait, what could that be then?" He came closer, dragging some loud sounding, knocking trinkets he had used. "What is that you're seeing? Tell me before my emotions get out of control and I may do something I might regret." Relax your scuffle and listen carefully. I see that there are still some workers in the fields. You'd do well if you'd listen to what I had to say and do it well for I shall not repeat it twice again. A sadness in your eyes, I see, there's nothing wrong with it, for me to see. But they deserve it, don't they,

for do you not live there?"There was a pause, a kind of distraught which pointed at something which might've not be there per say. Of the merchant's claim, he lives in some sort of floating small star of metal, held static by chairs.It looked like a tight space, more of a prison than anything else, and his presence was somewhat disturbed?"Should I go there then? Wouldn't there be consequences for my presence?"Those are peaceful people who, time after time refused to fight back against assailant my dear shade.As long as you stay away from the darkest part, the other town, for they are mad and filled with rage. They are people who are deranged and must be getting rid off.It's your choice after all.'This man had become suddenly intriguing, now that he was done looking through his binoculars.He had been talking about strange things which weren't for the likes of good men. But he was never one of them. 'You must head there yourself and make things right. Perhaps kidnap someone of your liking back to your floating prison, only then will the pain disappear."I don't enjoy listening to gibberish from people who assume I'm evil. I'll do no such thing."Can you not feel the calling?It is not the first time we met after all and it might not be the last time, believe me when I say.They'll drive you to the point where you won't be able to control yourself, just listen.'But it was late, far too late to be warned about it, as he started galloping towards the point of destruction, exactly where he was destined to come.He had brought a lot of pain to himself and saw the issue as something which didn't matter nor that would bother him.By any means, he was struck by his peers. From the depths of the earth, they looked and tried pulling him below.'Let go of me. I will not keep this course, I'll return empty-handed if I desire to do so.'But he couldn't fight against the force which had shown itself far too effective to be called into play. The hands were strong, the bones were all wrong.Not only had they not belonged to men but the skulls revealed themselves to be growing the meat and muscle on them. The faces of which revealed much long head, spiked collar of bone, sharp nails but mouths which didn't open from the front but from below.Trunks which had been flattened to sheets had become big extrusions which pushes spores out of them. It was almost as if their mere presence darkened the bottom of the dirt into some kind of lagoon in a marsh.'I'll take that path, just leave me be.'And it was almost as if his mind paid him to rest, leaving him to continue his ride after his sad attempt to against it. Nothing appeared to have saved the rest of his desire to escape from that.He knew that they were down there waiting for a wrong turn, but how deep would be dragged if it were true?'For the men out there, I can only hope you're worth the trouble, for I shall come to you in a most shallow manner!'He promised to himself that he wouldn't bring taint to the land, but the horse carried far too many diseased for an animal such as him to carry. He wouldn't swallow, nor would it carry the pieces of branches or the throngs, thorns in tall bushes.They weren't even on the road any longer but the mare knew the way in its limited cognition. There was some kind of friction between his pale, metallic skin.'Don't bother going there, easy prey.'Said some hidden voice, at which he stopped."Who's there? Show yourself so I can see you."Which one of us would that be?'And there came another one other than the two of them he had encountered. One desperate cry seemed to have borne some kind of remorseless virtue which didn't show to either. He was a man now, not a fighter.'What do you want from me then?"Noticing that's all, you were planning on going on there to slaughter the workers, weren't you?"And what if I was? What's it to you?"That wouldn't do since we were hired to protect them, especially the chief architect, who's the most important person you wouldn't be able to lay eyes upon."Enough of this, may I just go ahead then, if only for a visit.'Their eyes and thin bodies were barely visible but they were there, hiding behind trees. It was obvious that they held some kind of fear for him as well, or at least some content for his poignant mare.'How about we'll offer you a deal, a third of what we each earn."Speak for yourself, I say we jump him before he gets the chance."Please ignore my friend there, he's only trying to harm our cooperation here, that's all."The pools coming from the top of the sky made it look like a bunch of dim light pools flowing through the top of the branches. A false radiance came just as he came off his horse and stood there, right in front of them.If they stood a chance to attack and harm him, this had to be it, the only attempt, the only try they'd get before the bland dark would follow.This way, he was sure that there'd be no tomorrow for them.'What's the reason behind thugs being hired for their safety?' "Watch your tongue, little man, you're still just a weakling wearing armour.'But he was so so more than that, he could feel that as far as his body went inside, there was little skin, no organs, just the armour he had been. Perhaps he had been moulded from the floating prison, and secretly he had been part of it.Regardless of which, this was to be his chance to strike, now that they were all revealed. An entire band of them, eight, maybe ten of them, wearing clubs, axes, some small daggers, bows in the back and even rocks which had been picked from the ground.Meanwhile, he was contemplating about his insides and how much he'd dread to find out whenever or not there'd be some kind of shallow expansion of the sort, which would spill and crawl at any wound which he may take.Or worse, the Bowman seemed to have it for the mare, perhaps the most likely scenario was his desire to put him out of its misery. It did seem to suffer while living, that of which had no return.The day of their termination had to come one way or another, and he was the so much appointed executioner. Bearing only the small curved, broken short incisor, he would call it, he seemed to be pulled on by the idea of bloodshed. It could get a lot worse for all of them if he decided to continue on this path, the mad ones going even madder, at least since they believed they stood a chance. At least inside the armour, he felt indestructible, to say the least.But what were those, behind, the bottom?They had nets, heavy, with small metal balls, rusted or rotten. Either way, it looked as if he stood less than a chance when it came to pushing forth the dance. He wanted to get back on the horse and try galloping away, but most of them were intent on harming him. By now this came to be known as a fact.Why else would they be so tense around him?'Well, are you to leave then or must we make you?' "I think we could reach an understanding."The moment he would flash his knife, there's be bloodshed, that much made him aware, but it seemed as if the moon had other plans. A celestial ball, the one which suddenly started shifting its gaze and light away.It seemed as if the moment to strike would come sooner than later and would creep on a sudden note. As long as he was aware that there'd be no recollection of the mad though, he went on ahead, while the beast behind him started going in circles, deviating from the mind.For a moment, they were suddenly in dark and could throw the net.'He's attacking, stop him now.'But his throat came with a smash, without knowledge whenever or not it had been the dull side of the blade or.What was happening then? He felt like a patient again, wearing nothing or his armour. In a room, with a window as the dark which had been left behind. The room he was in wasn't closed but didn't carry. At least he was coming around with an IV bag next to him, carrying the stick as well as listening to the sound of the bleep.There laid someone in the bed, riding with the sickness, the face of which he had recognised as being the leader of the thugs there.Such a young lad to be caught in this. Pushed into a hospital, no wonder he stood out amongst the other rascals.He was here while they were out there, a list laid next to the bottom of the bed, most likely filled with the names of the friends who had visited him.From the other side of the room, there was obviously another bed, from which he had decided to get away in order to stretch his legs.'I guess I was the one to take it this time, young fella'. He approached the chair next to the bed and stood beside the lad. Either there had been an eclipse of the lights in the night had suddenly gone off after midnight, but he remembered them. Oh, yes indeed, the flashing bubble of glass and steel, what a thrill he had watching that. He would've been ready to go ahead and even get away on his horse, from all his trouble, from reality and even from vivid memories, rather have met the lad again. 'I remember the day they have first brought you here you know? You were alone, maybe. Your mother had brought you here after the accident? No, it was something which you developed, an incurable thing of your own. Yeah, I think I remember you now, Robert, Moore, John, your name was marked off the paper. 'Unrecognisable at best, he wasn't even known inside this room, other than the hospital records which were off access to patients and visitors alike. 'When you first came, I think you spoke little. Moore, something of that, your mother called you, the moor. 'Drop it, already, look at the kid, he's barely even breathing now. It hadn't been much of a fight then since the men just spread and ran away as soon as he leapt to an attack. Though the victory was shallow, and for him, there'd be no hollow place to rest. Just a hospital bed for the young Moor, poor kid, he thought, looking at him, even now. 'I guess this is the end of the road for both of us, isn't it? They told me I haven't got as much either, just counting the days you know?' The dust had settled around ever since the last time one of the nurses had come inside to check on them. At least on the papers, both of them were written as being dead, no return, just thickening away with each day that passed. By now, the dark outside had settled into a dull view, no magic, no torch to carry and no sword. His mare had stopped by now from running into circles and fled away from sight. It wasn't right what was happening to the kid, but he could do as much about his condition as he could've done about his own. None of it would make a difference in a week anyway when he'd be plugged on the schedule. Looking around at the calendar, it was obvious enough that there had been a few days marked, especially weeks in the past. Red circles counting the days when he had almost been pulled off. But they didn't, some show of life, some impulse or a twitch had stopped the nurses. Violent junctions of the body which almost made them think he was alive. There had been none of those in a long time and his fear was that this was to be the end of the road. No more slipping away anymore, no more getting through the cracks. He was there to witness it the day it happened when he came to realise that there were no fantasies left for him either. It was his choice to stay inside the room rather than leave. And he was never part of the tied creature they had all become, disappearing in the dark and leaving the next one in line take over his place. Such as it were, there was one more in there before the abomination with its light returned. It knew, at least from the lacks of sound that there was some kind of irregularity at play. They were clustering with one another inside their dreams if they weren't in the blank. A quarter of them hadn't had dreams but found themselves covered in the same way as they have been while sleeping in their beds at home. It felt different and more precise, some here and there trying to keep their mind in check. One thing remained, which had been, in some sick way, their pain, a dreadful approach, little to no remorse for their kind alone. Looking at them as dreadful clusters, overlords which governed over the land of man, they took out long whips of steel, only to make them suffer. 'Go faster, you still have to cover the shift from the previous days. 'They looked starved, weak, barely able to carry their own weight, broken from the constant stress and by the way they had been treated. From this, there was no escape. At least not unless the chains had been removed, their minds unaltered from the constant surgeries from which they sent themselves towards. Another pair of damning things flew inside from high abodes. It was even more obvious now, when the ones which came, in flying clusters were revealed as horns, tortured souls, which found their way into this world. Without a way to reproduce, they were the last of their kind, especially since their world had been brought to ruin. 'Faster, I said, it's time to return to the factory and proceed further into the creation of the war machine.' Oh, indeed, it was time to initiate the plan the Great Council had spoken of. Far too long had this planet been governed by wicked rulers and tyrants, but not any longer. One of these days, right under their nose, the men would grow strong enough to overthrow the damning ones from their throneless abodes. It felt strange, almost close to the deranged. But at the gates of the factory, the gate was the most frightening thing they encountered. As for the whips? They were mere slaps, the pain of which wasn't even real, as the material made sure that the workers weren't purely abused. What was displayed served as a way to intimidate the new-comers and set them into ranks. But the gate, that was different. No one had ever touched the spikes which laid on it outer throngs, but there were curved and looked like teeth. At the top of it laid the wicked eye, the evilness of which seeped into their minds. Many of them would've exchanged a real whip rather than be sent through it, for they knew that it came to a price. The looks alone intimidated, the scent it bore created some disconnect between the commoner and the other. Where he looked at the person in front of him like some older brother, that changed as soon as they stepped through the gate together. It looked and followed them even though the other side, where there were no throngs of steel and no eye to look precisely so. But they knew that it was there, even though it wasn't present in a most material type of way. Something to have in mind was the fact that the eye was blind. It moved from time to time or hadn't, that could've been in their minds. But as soon as they came inside, they were released from their bonds which disappeared from sight. As their composition revealed itself to be something of pure energy, it came to fruition at last. He would be there working for hours as an engineer, a man which had laid his arms and most fights for his desire to be paid. It's still said that he remained there for the longest, while others left to search for a better life. Most remained since they were paid for both the show they put out there and the one inside. Life as well. But they were will make those damned things of destruction, the stories of which most heard as children made them wonder whenever or not it was real. The war never helped anyone, but the pay, the compensation made the greed so much more appealing to the common man. They wouldn't fight in it. 'But am I disturbing?' 'No, no, you're not, I was just trying to figure out why this circuit had been fried.' 'Oh, all right, I used to deal with this all the time back home, I think you may need to remove all the junk away and clean the card entirely before inserting it back into the core.' He pointed at the cubical-sphere at the table, that of which had been the corse. Apparently, one of the memory-inducing cards had been fried from being overused and he had been tasked on getting rid of all the trouble. The main one being that there seemed to have been a human rib-cage inside, along with everything a human had, melted right through the core and into the machine. Yet another failure in another. 'Man's dream of finding immortality.' 'I believe that was a female specimen we've seen inside.' 'Could you not call the poor woman a specimen?' Especially not since she could still hear them from there. The eyes and the spherical head seemed to have given signs of moving, but the rest of the body was paralysed from top to bottom. A dreadful thing to witness, but it was only going to get worse since they also had to get rid of all the human components before getting somewhere. In other words, they both looked with guilt at one another, knowing she would have to be taken out before they could proceed with the repair procedure. 'Would you plug her life cord out of the back of her head?' 'Not so loud.' She definitely heard the part in its full right. Quite aware by the look on the visor, especially since his hands were looked upon with a sign of abysmal emptiness. 'I don't know if this is right, I don't know why but usually, it isn't that far gone.' 'We have to do the cleanup, right? It's what we signed up for, it's what we do. Maybe we wouldn't have to do this if it weren't for them to seek cheap immortality and end up damaged on some ocean floor or abandoned under some sort of pit.' The looks of which seemed to have crept even his deepest senses. It was clear that she was very much still conscious, but that wasn't the problem, was it? She had broken the law and the sentence was an immediate execution. 'Should we give her something, maybe a few parting words?' 'Look, I know you don't have to deal with this type of issue often, first time I imagine. Strange, especially since you've worked at this side of the belt for a longer time than I, but that's beside the point. Whoever had it for you and took on doing the hard choices seemed to have missed one. But this is your chance to learn something new and do the things properly.' 'What's that funnel for?' 'We're going to touch the insides with soft flames, just so any organic material could be destroyed. Don't worry about the circuits, they're built to resist heat and such.' But not the meat, and the bones. What a peculiar choice of body, anyway. It looked as if there were no hands nor legs, just a floating head which was merely connected through a giant pair of tubes to a big oval-shaped blue armoured body. A simple yet strong construct that almost made it far. Sooner or later she had to have died from it, as machines were never created to act as immortal bodies. Other than the stench inside, there came the risk of something worse ahead, the decay, her mind being gone, which would only lead to a machine becoming a public menace. 'What a shame it had to happen to her. It makes me wonder what she might've been before all of this happened. Wrong place at the wrong time, a quest to become something else, perhaps some sort of.' 'They can be forced into this?' 'Rarely but you need to understand that they don't have enough control over the original conduit which is followed by them. It's not that they're partially in control, but more like, they encase themselves into coffins, but they're not dead yet, still dying in a way inside. Every now and then they twitch a muscle and then do it again. With enough tries, they manage to move a pair of feet and drag themselves out of a room. Now, what happens when those muscles get far too strained, especially on a body that's not meant to stay as much alive?' 'You mean to say they break apart? Inside of them, like in this moment?' 'I think it'd be possible, but hard to say and pinpoint where. Obviously not her body any longer, that was pushed beyond behind covered in skin and everything else. The only organ left to twitch and break is now the brain in that small case. And even that wasn't placed in the box entirely.' 'Who's at fault for the procedure then?' 'Illegal so-called engineers who specialise in this type of torture. They're running their own bootlegging factories or small shacks, in which they find addicts or others who aren't clever enough to realise what they're doing. Poor thing, but made a dumb choice which got to force us to pull it on her.' 'How many of them get here then?' 'Twenty, I'd say, per week, the problem being that the numbers seem to have been on the rise.' He looked at the creature, which wasn't human any longer, wasn't even a machine. Just a speck of consciousness floating in a metal jar, broken apart and no longer thinking properly. They wanted to pull it on her and never look back again. 'What about brain recovery?' 'Not a chance, as soon as that metal case opens she will feel pain.' 'Wait, I thought.' 'Part of the procedure, small stings of metal are inserted inside, they act like pseudo pain receivers, which means as soon as the case is removed, a few of them will be dragged out. And you don't want that to happen. We can only imagine what a headache would feel if it was directly centralised inside our mush.' Henceforth, the only humane thing left was to pull the support on her. 'Is it this one?' 'You got it, just squeeze a tiny bit and don't stop pulling until the liquid pops out, that should be fine. Your gloves should prevent any other discharge which may run across the jolt area.'It was the last moment she had, whilst being alive. There'd be no other chance for her after this, no confirmation, nor any other thought.Well enough, this came to be, he squeezes and looked away, pulling until he felt the liquid gush and dropped the cord right then and there.She was no more, at least that's what he thought, unable to know whenever or not it took moments or more for her to be properly taken care off.'Right, take this funnel device and help me by, let's see. I think the upper area would be fine, at least on the side.'The cleaning was long and thorough, and by the time they reached the head, the brain had shrunk to some tiny ball of a gutter sponge, which was foaming, impaled what seemed to look like twenty or forty metal spears.He was thinking what kind of pain might've went through he right before she was incinerated, but that was that.No mood for any play along, he got out through the back and walked home alone. It was close to being hard to see, the sky was pale, no colour in particular. A coat which dragged at his ankles as well.This was the old industrial road, built on the old town and the underwater old gates.It had been thoroughly investigated and decided that in the manner of doing their business there'd be too much of a loss if they were to continue their business there.It was the sore truth that the people have been buried under them alive because of their refusal to leave their ancestral homes. But at least the common citizen wasn't aware of the truth and what hadn't bothered them, it would do.A paleness had crept on him, ever since that dreadful statue came into being. It had been taken down and smashed a long time ago since they crept along.The day had ended with him sleeping in a pair of thorny bushes by the road rather than him returning to his caring wife.Without even bothering to remember when he had to wake, he returned to work, with the same clothes he had been wearing, dragging a most repulsing gash he had obtained.It had spread around but nothing so far.Back and the belt, another piece was dragged. He had taken a few looks before being greeted by the twins.'George and this fellow over here is Deus.'Both of which bowed in turns, ready to learn from the older man with his scraggly beard.'Chief engineer Theodor, I presume, we were told that we should tail you and listen to every piece of advice you are to give."Right."We haven't seen you come the same way sir, is there?"I wasn't in the mood, you work here for long enough that you'll get sick of walking down the line, even for the petty pay they give you for the time.That and I don't like waiting in line and cutting in front would only break the illusion since the chains aren't holding anyone.'Both of the twins blushed but they paid attention."Twins, I presume?"Triplets in actuality but only the two of us decided to work here and gather experience.'It was good enough that they weren't forced to see what he had seen the previous day. Even his dreams had been unsafe from the presence of death metal pieces, melting in the woman.He had dreamed of her, slowly tailing him from the factory.She had her full body suit moving but pieces of the machine extruded out of her while she was dragging some sort of heavy battery which kept her alive.Everything had been surreal, the way she moved, behaved, how she tried imitating what a human would do or say.But she wasn't, the woman had died, no to mention that she had been declared as being beyond any sort of saving.'Are you inspecting the exterior?"Oh, no, I'm sorry, I'm a bit out of the mood, I've been that way lately.'He could see her reflected image against the clean piece of outer mirrors, she would've been a beauty if it weren't for the small tube sticking out of her cheek. Those blasted cold eyes had melted in his dreams and most likely used on someone else while the crooks sold her piece by piece.Not only had they been paid but that's how they acted.'Right, we'll start by opening it up, do you twins think you can handle it?I'll go through the motion and remove the shell, some models have three or four frames tied to them so be sure that you're ready to remove all of them if it's needed.'They paid utmost attention, but this appeared ancient and old. A bad feeling. Too much sweat. He was running out of his senses and hadn't had the chance to take a shower. With the turbine on, he dragged a small device which seemed to have a button which melted the metal pointy end to fit any kind of hole, especially useful for the old models which used some star-holed kind of nails to keep it shut. With a strange motion, one popped out, followed by the two others. One was missing from there. 'Just remember, steady hands, you should both hold it together and remember that safety will come first.' He placed the turbine connection on the table, pulled the cable so no accidents would happen and removed the outer shell. Four distant tubes serve as legs, no head unit, just the body used for carrying, pushing and manipulating metal. 'This may be tricky here, this is an old model. See that thing in the middle?' 'Would that be the battery sir?' 'No, but I'm glad you asked me. That right there is actually the magnet, known as the source of this model's power in some sense. It doesn't have limbs to carry heavy objects, only a field regulator which activates or deactivates it, either be it negative which may push metals away or pull it against itself.' 'Wouldn't the shell be affected by it in any way?' 'Couldn't say it's possible in actuality, that's not a metal shell and neither are the nails. Everything is made out of a synthetic metal of the sort. It melts easily, can be moulded.' 'Like the statues in the old house.' 'Statues, in the old house. The one where they found the bodies, right?' It was a rude awakening to reality, but that came to pass. No one was paying any mind to it, especially since that dreadful thing was long in the past, the old area, where lived only the poorest of the folk, the kind of which no one cared about any longer. He was disturbed by the thought nonetheless, especially since its familiarity managed to hit back home, a pace which was unexpected. 'Where were we? Quick, I need to get back in the system.' 'The magnet, sir, what are we to do with it?' 'Let me look at the orders.' 'Usually, someone had already done it but apparently, the small notebook was there for him to see. It looked like it was to be salvaged for it, and whatever controlling unit be found in there, demolished. Under no circumstance should it be spared of the trouble it produced.' 'Usually, these types had tiny processors which stored most of their memories, including some kind of reproduction of a consciousness. One too many mistakes and it may get to think of something dreadful, even worse than that. It may start emulating the same mistakes, or they might even start going through the same motions from the memory, just what were they thinking?' 'Well, it seems that this might be just a normal cleanup, here, hold these.' He pulled two long wires from both sides and seemed to have created a frown. Both of the lads had their grins outstretched on their faces, being amused by the most simple of things. It was something to behold nonetheless, especially since the model was part of their history, the previous part in their advancement, the past in itself. 'Now, we'll have to stretch it and rewire it after we're done, but now, we should focus on another point I seemed to have missed. It's here on the list, somewhere, I think I saw it. And that was undermarked just so you know it was important.' Both of them looked surprised as they approached, the language is a factor which made it sound worse than it was. 'Beware of the bloated chip, do not attempt removal under any cost if you're alone.' Theodor looked around and saw plenty of other engineers at their working stations. There were plenty of them present at work, such is was that there was no excuse for them not to try. Even with the description at hand, it still seemed to be something which shouldn't have been written. Perhaps he wouldn't have decided to dig in so deep if it weren't for the warning. 'Are the two of you all right? Think you can handle yourselves now?' Both of them straightened while making it seem that this was the reason they've been training their entire lives for, it was to be their defining moment. And everyone has one of those, at least once in their lives. Most dreadful of things was about to happen, nonetheless. It seemed that there was something which was kept in mind. The boldness in which that thing was written. What would be next? 'We'll extract the disabled magnet with its device, get ready for that. You may feel some sensation of disorientation because the little metal plates in your heads might react to it, but remember, easy does it.' With little effort, it was removed, with no difficulty as it may be said as well as no registered trouble. Now, under it, there seemed to be dirt, actually wet dirt, with worms and small beetles which had been crushed by the power it bore. 'Turn the battery on its bottom, we'll have to clean it thoroughly.' 'How does a thing like this even happen? Certainly, there could be nothing of the sort in there. Dirt of all things. Has someone opened it before and placed a wet fist inside?' 'I wouldn't rule it out.' Said Deus to his brother George. They both started grabbing cleaning napkins and rubbing them across the edges and everywhere around. No spot had to be missed. But while they were distracted, Theodor still looked at a most important detail, which was the trouble it went to call upon that bloated chip. It had to reside under the frame, somewhere below, in the region where most of the functions that controlled it laid. And if the supervisor wrote it down, it could mean that there was some element to it which was real at the time it had been opened. Just what they saw when it was first opened, he couldn't even come to imagine. But placing a fist of dirt, as clean as this were? 'Here, push the magnet off the table, I want you to use the compressed air there to clean this, with as much care and dexterity as you can.' Seeing how they had almost perfectly cleaned the magnet, he rested his shoulders and thought of leaving them to their business. It was well, for some time at least. There was little concern for now until the little valve was turned and the small door which blocked the inside was revealed. Just what could it be down there? Placed in an uncomfortable position, his arm had been outstretched inside it, looking at the other engineers to pass him by and waving back at them. It was almost done before he came to the stench inside, nothing whichever had ever been encountered previously in his entire career. Something had decayed or died in there, but as the light came to be, through the partially opened gates below, he saw the single bloated chip, one which hadn't been a few inches, but had grown a few centimetres. 'Just what in the name of?' He was too surprised to think properly and wondered whenever or not he could remove it from there without having to get through any kind of consequence. The size alone would cause much trouble, but it wasn't organic. At least that much he knew, just a melted copper form, but somehow he knew that it managed to grow. With its form, it seemed to have taken the shape of some idol, that was the best way it could be described. One which didn't belong here or in any other place at all. His first reaction had been the thought of completely ignoring it and placing it back, but that much led wouldn't go inside. The short circuit could mess up the entire frame as well as the entire system, not to mention the most damaging thing of all, the magnet. One of those out of control and it could turn all the other workers against one another, being stuck together, unable to continue forth. At least he knew that enough to have himself be hidden from sight, while he prepared the tools necessary for the extraction. He pushed back and turned the valve back to being fully closed. There was a need for the bigger guns now, the tools which would be needed in order to pull that infection from inside. Deus was looking around the small compartment in which Theodor went and winced. 'What do you think it's inside of there? Want to take a look before he returns, if we're quick enough I think he won't notice.' 'No, Duce, you're going to get us both in trouble. Just help me clean this us thoroughly and we'll be done.' 'It's clean already, there were no worms, there's no dirt and no remains of anything there. What I'm interested in is what made this work the way it did. What made it malfunction to have come here.' He placed himself above the hole and started slowly twisting the valve. 'The least you can do is stay there as a guard and call me in case he returns.' George winced again but he came nearer to listen to the noise going on by the construct's side. 'I think I can hear something going on in there, you shouldn't mess with it much longer.' 'Relax, I know what I'm doing, plus I'm almost done, I just need to point this light farther inside and I'll get to see exactly what's going on.' It was late though, for the formation of led wasn't a bulbous inflammation, a growth no longer, as it had shown some signs of impurity. Most of its mass had spread across the board and seemed to have changed the mass into something of a mess. 'Come here, you need to see this.' Both of them came stood on the single stool and looked past the light into the pool of lead which had been there. Perhaps the air or some component from the air did something to it, for not only did it harden but it also seemed to have noticed the two of them there. Their own faces came from that pool of led, almost mockingly watching and grinning. Before they could express their shock into words or say anything to express how much they had been disturbed, a hand came from the pool and started turning the valve by itself. 'Stop it from doing that, we cannot let it go back into the dark.' Said George, despite being far too tired to do anything, as well as having met fear after having been caught. He couldn't leave his brother there, he knew that. And the man actually pushed the hand out of the way, being sprinkled by the led. His hand whitened, it had become pale. Despite standing on the stool, he fell back, almost hit his hand if it weren't for his younger brother to catch him. George looked afraid, confused, but managed to hold his brother until he could regain his composure. It had been a mistake, as, by the time Theodor returned, there was a small gathering of engineers who had come to see what was going on. Two brothers stood there embraced and it looked as if Deus was getting paler by the second. Something bit his hand, for him to have been brought to such a manner. It was the conclusion of the board as they sent word for an ambulance to come. 'Just what is going on in here?' 'Theodor, in my office, now!' Both of them came through the door and slammed it as if it had been made of glass. Some of it managed to leave some mark, after the fact that it was roughened up from the constant pressure. They shared looks, both thoroughly concerned about the kid. 'What was in your mind leaving two trainees unattended like that? Do you realise that, if something were to happen to them and let's say one of them lost a finger, we would all be on the road?' 'I understand that sir, but I had full confidence that they wouldn't touch anything while I was there. Sir, there's something else, something which I have found and it needs.' He was interrupted by a raised hand, knowing better than to talk back. This was something from which he wouldn't be able to get out easily. They had taken both the kid and his brother in no time, despite having to suffer from having to be forced through. As for the giant machines which acted like some slave master, they had been disabled and left that way at least until it was decided whenever or not they were to be sent out of commission, for good. 'This doesn't look right. It seems like the spectators will have to be announced about what's going to happen. We may even be forced to cancel.' 'Great, chief, I was being tired of playing around like a monkey for some people's sick fetish fantasies.' 'Those sick fantasies helped your paychecks you damn ignorant.' His shout stopped when he realised where he was. In a dark room, in the mansion, wax on the floor, among the men. It was a sudden dream which had held him there for a long time, but he felt it nonetheless. How come neither of them experienced what he felt? For a moment he had thought he would encounter some of there inside his dream. Yet another made him think he was still dreaming there. He fell behind and it had become a mess. There wasn't any distraction any longer ever since the event, the joy, the spectators had been gone for years. The so-called slave masters had been transformed into scrap metal, with less than enough to satisfy the need. Now work was more strict and under regulation. Worse, the led infection had spread ever since that day. Like a plague, bits of it managed to crawl their way or float like spores into other openings and sooner than later, it came to be. A fully blown self-centred plague, which hadn't caused any problem for the men yet. But something would come to me, that was a certainty, the boiling point was to come. It was there, he could feel its presence and neither of the others was aware of what was going on. For them, the tiny patches of leads were nothing but the missed repairs done by some lousy engineer. How could led become something as strange as it were, cause death or worse, infect the areas which were to be touched? There hadn't been answers to the questions which laid there, only more trouble to look for. 'Don't touch that, don't dwell there for too long. You should be wearing tighter gloves, why aren't you doing it, what's wrong with those?' It'd be a catastrophe if someone were to find out what was going on between them, especially since that feeling of something growing hadn't left the place. A piece of it still crept inside and pulled on him, especially since, from time to time, he could see an eye, made of led, watching. Taunting him in the most secretive way. 'Theodor, are you coming or what? We're waiting for you to show us how to work this.' It was half of a head, a machine which must've had the body of a humanoid man, only a piece of it was left, but something of it seemed to have recorded what had happened to it. Somehow, it managed to get destroyed or salvaged to the point where this was the only piece of it left. From a small metal rod, it stood erect and seemed to have received enough electricity to move its eye and be aware of its surrounding. One trainee tried but failed to attach a small voice box to it, so they may hear something of what had happened. It would be a shame after all, for such a beauty to go underrated and wasted for the worst of times. 'You're going to need something bigger than that if you want to get somewhere, son. That ain't going to cut it. For this size alone, you're going to require some old speakers from the back, where they keep the archives and what not.' 'Is it that old that it requires an old model to work on the sound?' 'Indeed it is, young fella, let me tell you something about. About, um.' His face looked disoriented. He could only swear over the fact that he had never heard something speak or imitate speech without a device or anything else, but this piece of hand actually had acquired enough energy to move its lips. And in a way, neither of them knew how to react to what laid at hand. 'Greetings, as per say. It seems as if I was disassembled, reason?' There was a beeping sound, followed by awaiting input. It was an offshoot of course, but what else could they do? He was a trained engineer, followed by someone lower in rank who hadn't seemed impressed, either by the fact that he hadn't enough experience to know that it was impossible for a machine to start talking just by using its lips alone without the sound input, an observer and a trainee. Theodor would have to be aware of all of them and account for their safety if something were to happen. Things changed in that way and there wasn't any denying to it any longer. Somehow, the dread had gotten to him even then, when they looked and tried to break it in thought. It awaited an input of some sort. Simple commands, that's how they were used to hearing, at least it had a chance of showing the old protocols. 'Malfunction.' As it were, it was something dependable on the thoughts and their inputs to work properly. 'Registered, what is to be done with me?' This was important, too many words or if it were too complicated a command, it wouldn't answer nor respond. This had to be put properly under some silence. As he turned he made a sign and they only watched like a choir, other than the trainee. 'We'll repair you.' He said, with the most innocent look someone could have, bright shingles in his eyes as well. The rage the man felt when he turned was unimaginable, but he wasn't going to hit him, he might've taught a lad something about the consequences of disrespecting orders but not any longer. Not after the last incident. Far too many lives had been lost for them to care about what happened. 'Repair, what it about me that needs a repair?' 'Missing body.' Said Theodor, now seriously giving a look and making sure the lad wasn't trying to push it past him. Something about this conversation appeared to be fishy, and not in the least would he be surprised if it turned out the way he thought it would. 'Can you still feel your body? Even from distance?' 'Affirmative, body stuck, cannot retrieve.' This was a thing which in turn seemed to have brightened them aside. Both the observer and the trainee looked as if they were getting ready for some sort of a field trip in search of some lost body. Not only would that be dangerous but also mad. Nothing could be more dangerous, though in moments it was agreed. He wasn't in charge, the observer was and he looked just like he was ready to give the order. 'Wrap it fast first.' 'Negative, I need to be aware to provide some assistance.' Something which brought them to its side, but leaving it turned on in a dirt factory in which the led would jump on was dangerous. For some reason, it didn't jump on metal alone, merely on a circuit which was active or something active, having had energy in it and what not. Not his call again, and now, he'd leave it there unattended. 'Theodor, we're going, I see that you forgot your helmet, we'll be waiting in the back. Be moving fast, will you?' I nodded while looking ready. There had to be some way to deal with this, especially since it regained some control over is a body. Too many men laid around and if he tried something shady, he would be called out. There had been too many mistakes lately and they couldn't afford any others. This made him decide to go ahead and hesitate. Going against all orders was a sure way to get booted off, which meant there was no way to warn the other engineers about the led affliction. He was there, with them, on the field, regretting every single moment of it. 'Well, what are we looking for exactly then?' 'From the way it had described, we're apparently looking for a big body, the likes of which we've never seen in size.' 'Won't it become dangerous to drag the trainee with us then?' 'He'll do fine with the field experience, you don't get to see a rogue out there that often. There's the three of us anyway, kind, nothing's going to happen to you, hear?' He shyly nodded and looked at me. Without the least of concerns, it seemed like he was intently listening to the plans the observer had in mind. 'Where to find him and take control over, that's why I brought a copy of the server with me.' A flat box which seemed to cover more than half of his needs appeared in his hands. He had been keeping it in his backpack, and old model, just as old as the machine had been. 'That's vintage, how did you even stumble onto such a thing?' 'Let's just say I know people that's all.' 'But how exactly have you got it that fast? There shouldn't have been one in a thousand miles.' That type, in particular, it was dangerous to use, that's why it was banned in the first place. As long as there was some auxiliary battery connected to it, there came a signal which disrupted the programming which stood as the base for the other machines. In other words, as long as it stood on, the signal caused the others to malfunction, the rates of which were from medium to the high threat at the span of a few hours. Nothing would be any clear than that, other than the thought that it might fail to meet the expectations they required. 'You realise how dangerous that might've been, keeping in inside the factory?' 'Wait a minute Theodor, you can't accuse him of that, he just.' 'It's all right Jones, I know what I did and he's right, I put everyone at rest. But there's a reason I was sent here and given this to work with, you see? Not only have I seen to the fact that there was some kind danger involved, but I also made sure everything was in control. When was the last one you've seen a functional machine of that size? And I'm not talking about the shows you people used to put, a disgrace if you ask me.' They were by the river banks, shallow woods, which had just recovered from a fire.

By now the road was made of many tiny stones which had fractioned themselves into the numbers of hundreds and thousands, all of which were hardened pieces of charcoal.'Some animatronics for a bunch of spectators which sent donations, that might've been the least excusable thing I've ever heard off, I mean what was in your minds?"It wasn't out idea per say but we couldn't argue with the spare we were getting."Always about the money.'Said the observer while rubbing one of the bald spots on top of his head.'He got no satisfaction from anything around, especially since everything else was a mess.'Since we're in this together, at least we could try getting along. Look, whatever happened in the past should stay in the past.'Tom, the trainee, that was him, after having startled the others, as if he had just jumped over like a leaping spiderling out of his cocoon. There was something to him other than being shy, but it didn't matter as much since the effort was looked as if it was insincere.'We should just look ahead and try making for that point."Are you sure you know where you're taking us, observer?"I'm more than qualified for once, as a matter of fact, you'll find no one better than I in this place.'It wasn't as if there were other opportunities and there came a feeling that the road was going to be harsh and long. Deemed to be rather unnecessary by any standards at all.He came to the conclusion that they'd had to spend the night in the wilderness, by the ash, in the cold.'Do we even have supplies for the road?"Only the best, If I were to say, everything is accounted for, especially since it's funded by the big ones."They all slightly tumbled their brows and looked and the strange device he carried. A tubular type of gun which dangled in an empty cube, moving at intervals of time, numbered at the very bottom of the cube. It seemed as if it was adjusting for something in particular before it was aimed at the sky and popped.Ten seconds they waited, some of them held their breaths. Nothing so far.'I think there's something wrong with your gun. "You should take a few steps from this spot now unless you want to get hurt.'Of course, he had, he worked directly for them, of course, he'd get all the privileges and mostly what he wanted. What was he after?A supply box had slowly fallen from above, from an aircraft which was just as unidentifiable that it could've been invisible from what they cared for.That was the point which had decided their due.But the fact that it was welcomed hadn't changed the feeling that something was putrid in the story he had told them.As soon as they managed to open it, they backed away.'What is this supposed to be? Is this a god damn sickness being shown?'From the looks of which, it seemed that there came out a box of dirt, with growing pieces of some damned creature inside. It was damning noises which it crept inside the dirt.'Something went wrong with the dropout, I think someone just thought of making some sick joke."You think so? What exactly gave it away?"Close it, please, just close, I can't stand to see that thing crawling out."What exactly did they place inside the dirt? Look, observer, if you want to give orders that's fine and well but we need some answers.Look at them, both of my colleagues are already in shock, so can you at least tell us what's going on?"I'm afraid that doesn't concern you. In case I haven't made myself clear before, I do not know what happened to our delivery. We should've received food and ammunition among other.."Ammunition?"Were you planning for something dangerous to happen?"In the eventual case it might happen, I only thought it would be the safest approach, that's all."I should crack your skull right here baldie, for what you've said and done to us. Bringing a kid and our chief engineer here.'Jones had pinned the observer by the tree and planned to flat one of his eyes if I hadn't intervened. The action came close and he almost came close to going with it, which would've ended up with a suspension for him.He hadn't gone through, luckily enough, to save his own skin.'Well, now that it's done, this project has a lot on it, that's why maximum secrecy has to be kept, do you understand?"But what are you?"It's been dealt with, in case you were wondering, my bright young pupil. You see, I've dispatched a few men to transport the head you've just looked upon. Congratulation, you've all received a promotion, at least a temporary one. Without further ado, you'll be transported to a facility where you'll work only on this thing alone, nothing else, until it's finished and ready to function."And If we decline?"I asked with an impassive tone, looking around for some way to get around and reach home.'Well, it's all in good grace, in other words, the three of you, including the trainee, don't have a choice any longer. He's going to accompany us in order to prevent any suspicion from going ahead and forming. The rest won't even suspect what we're heading towards of what exactly we'll be doing there."Do we have food at least?'Asked Tom, he seemed to have packed only a sandwich in his pocket, which might've crumbled by now in some strange twisted form, though still edible."Worry not, for I have planned in advance for something like this to happen, in case of a malfunction, there are some boxes placed around the round, with signs marked through the ashes against the various burnt oaks. That's as well as we're going to get, so we should make the best of it if anything else.'Neither of them liked the sound of that, but this tiny dictator was giving the orders. And each of them was aware that it was only going to get worse from this point on. Not only would they walk, but it would get through the night, without a pause, without care. Through the night, where stars wouldn't shine, only the smoke of fire went on. For once there came some sort of good news, which came out of a sudden, with little to no explanation whatsoever, but it had. They had been rewarded for their patience in the box which had been promised. 'Shouldn't we handle it somehow? What if it ends us like the previous one? Actually, aren't their scouts in those aircraft above? Couldn't they just pick us from the road and leave us where we need to be?' "No, as I said, this needs to be done in as much of a secretive way as possible." Say, you haven't given us your name. "Salmon!" The lad's eyes brightened and it seemed that he almost sprang to life. Jones was making a fire while he was thinking of ways to further this investigation against the man. 'Meat stakes, cabbage, a flare gun.' "That's enough, it's late, you don't need to shout the name of everything you find around there." I'm sorry. 'But that wasn't enough to distract him from what he thought, the man worked against the government and for some reason they were dragged with them as well. Forget about him. More important, to remember, was that infection, for the first time of which, he couldn't do something about it. Without a chance or some way to fight it from distance, he laid there helpless, chewing on crisp fish scales and on its tail around the fire. The others looked dazed as if they were looking at some vile thing inside of him. 'Something on my shoulder? I don't think I understand.' But no, there it was, somehow it had followed them through the burnt sea of crisp black leaves and far off the road where they had set camp. Some blood laid on some cables and small wire, indicating there had been a fight. One light laid in the single eye is still had and at once Theodor realised the reason why they looked as frightened as his reflection had been. There it was, the partially looked upon a piece of the head. It floated, like some mad head, looking for its body, with much of the needed desperation. What would happen once it had taken it? There wasn't any way of telling, but for now, they had been made aware of the bright danger which would come for each of them in part. Without a doubt, there wasn't any chance to set things right, not in the least possible way. One couldn't explain how much worse everything could become if it decided they were all threats that needed to be dealt with. Some crept, others wept, but they needed to say something before it decided it was time to act on the programming or impulse. Little distraction laid at the moment. A miasma came from its insides, the likes of which were vague and had borne the scent of hot oil. Not the kind you were used as an engineer but the type which was specially made as a fluid to melt organic matter. There were those types made, specifically to be boiled instead of burning, reaching maddening temperatures and managing to disinfect even the smallest critters which were there. Something about being there surrounded by ash and sitting in front of the fire made them aware of the fact that, if they were to run, there were fewer chances to escape. 'Speak to it, you're the one it listens to.' Whispered the observer, looking unsure himself about how this would go on. This had to be short and well thought if he wanted for at least one of them to have the chance to get out. 'What are you here for?' A quick order of lights flashes from that one socket. With colours such as blue, red, pale yellow, most of the ones which followed being desaturated and dead. 'Disassemble.' That was enough to give him some sort of clue about the desire it would have. What would it do to with us? 'Whom exactly?' 'Disassemble the remaining humans.' The remaining humans? Oh that thing that bulged out of it, that creeping sensation had been right. He had ignored it. Like a bunch of creeping things from its inside came, tumours of led which had overtaken it. Now that he was aware of it, he could see the led below, dripping on from the wires and being pulled back inside. It acted like a small extension of the sorts, whenever unsure, to go through, of course. His thoughts weren't clear, but he was set on finding out. 'How many of the humans have you disassembled?' 'All of them.' 'What do you mean by all of them?' What he had done was only to startle the head when he wasn't spoken to. From inside its mouth came a tube that shot a that oil at a precise angle and in an instant, half of his skull had been taken. The risk of oil which had slowly been lowered took care of the rest of its body until nothing else remained of him but a pool of bones and some brain matter which had fallen away before the splash began. The rest should deteriorate in minutes before being absorbed by the dirt. But the horrifying image of being so close to a man who had just been executed would last with them, for as long as they remained. Tom gulped while Jones refused to say even the slightest word. Without a doubt, there came no surprise about whatever was going to happen to either. He was important now, he had made first contact, the other two weren't truly as important as he was now. It wouldn't listen to them, even worse, if they dared. Enough of that, it came time to ask. Theodor wouldn't step back nor would he avoid the question. 'What do you mean by all of them.' A set of lights and some sounds came on as if going through the motion again, trying to look for some sort of archive which had been saved. The model was old and the capacity to record being in it would've been seen as something rare, as in being a modified version of some older model, an illegal alteration of the previously existing code. 'I have ended almost all of them.' That was to say that there weren't other men or women out there from what they knew? It couldn't be, there wasn't any time, but it was mere fractions, a few blinks in which the observer had been whole. 'Everyone in the factory?' His voice was strained and he had needed to cough for some time now. It was undecided. 'Affirmative.' It said, no more engineers, his boss, they had families waiting for them, good men who used to enjoy working there and putting on a show. 'What about their families, their neighbours, the towns and cities.' 'Affirmative.' This time it was louder, to the point where it could wake up the dead. 'Are there other men, in any other state of being, other than the three of us?' He knew by now that it was no longer an option to keep it short, it was far above that, having reached the point where it recognised tiny details about its surrounding, even that Jones. With his attempt, he threw a rock, hoping he would crack the visor whilst running. 'Jones, don't!' Despite making it a few feet, it only needed a clear view to shoot just one particle which came through one of the legs. It moved from left to right, a particle of boiled oil which cut through matter like a blade of bitter steel, sharp and out of a dark forge from which it lingered. Jones crawled now with no legs while the head followed. It stopped. 'Remain where you are.' And they stood there, looking away, or at least Theodor made sure Tom wouldn't look and would try in the least not to listen to the sounds which came out of the man. 'Bastards, do something, stop it. Can't you see? It's exposed, it's coming from me this moment, get away, don't let me die in vain, don't.' His voice stopped abruptly, though he aware that it was only because of some organ being demolished. It wasn't because he was dead yet. Theodor dared to look behind at what was left there, too far from a near sided fellow to see. But he was left almost alive, cut in pieces, his body sealed by the oil which had cauterised some of the wounds but left others exposed. 'What are we going to do now?' 'I don't know, kid but don't do anything which would get us killed.' Where did it get that much oil from? The supplies just didn't seem to end. But looking at the dead man, the observer, he had noticed that there wasn't any pool any longer, just the dry remains of what used to be a human. This was to be the fate of humanity, whenever he liked it or not. At least from his standpoint, there were no escapes and no way to live through this, no one to procreate with. Humanity's fate had been apparently sealed and he was busy doing the figures in his head. The numbers weren't in his favour at all, regardless of how many times he went through them, it couldn't have been that they all died in that short of a period. 'Should we even try living then, is there a point? My young sister isn't there any longer, my parents and my friends share the same fate as everyone else. What else is there to live for, Theodor? What stops me from marching in front of it and doing what I can to stop it?' 'Nothing stops you but that would be futile and a waste of what's left of your life. We're the last, the legacy it seems. Either that or the machine's bluffing and no one else is truly dead. Though neither option can be checked yet, just play along for now and know that it can get rid of us at any moment if it wants to and that's something to keep in mind.' A wave of disquiet came as it finally approached, there was no discussion to be had, at least no yet since it was the poised head which gave the orders. 'Follow me and do not turn.' It seemed to have taken by the road but not in the right direction, at least not towards his body. Both Theodor and Tom looked at one another and shrugged, having no other option rather than going ahead to follow. Whatever happened next was queer and shallow, for they've taken by what had once been a river, in the place of which was led. How could it have been that they poisoned water in such a manner? He was thirsty but Tom was worse. It was supposed to affect only the circuits, not the water sources and in the case of that, what else had it an effect on? Could it be that it could spread on the metal of pools of blood? What about corpses or anything organic? 'Where are you taking us?' 'Towards a settlement of men.' 'Why are you still keeping us alive if you killed every other being who's ever walked on this planet?' For the first time, there came a mind-boggling silence as if for some reason it refused to answer. No longer a slave to some protocol which forced it to give a response each time a man asked him something, but that couldn't last. 'Child, you obey. Step twenty meters inside that small human location.' Tom was shaking and immediately turned towards me. I had little to say or make out of it but for now, I was aware of my only chance being this. Instead of giving any type of advice or looking away, I only nodded and saw the kid go on ahead. There were so many things I wanted to say to him then, just in case something was to happen to him but the chance for that was lost. He was there, as a soldier looking not to step on a mine would go on looking for a chance or an excuse to return. It was clearly deserted if what the head said about humanity is at its wit's end. Without much to go on, there came some senseless thing which dragged at his teeth and ground them, at least now when he had the chance and freedom to do so. He asked, now after he saw that the kid was too far to hear him. 'What?' 'I only wanted you alive, nobody else, you understand.' Before he could even comprehend what was going through his side of the head towards the other, he saw some sort of led explosion from below. It was a minefield of some sort, from which there had been no escape nor scream from the lad. The boy had spread across the field in pieces which had been immediately covered in led, which instead crawled back into the hole from which they came out of. Now on his knees, he watched, unable to rise from the grave in front of him, only to be met by the last of them instead. 'There is no longer functional machine either in this world, we are the last of our kinds, kept alive.' 'What do you mean kept alive, just end me already, why is that you're still playing with me?' 'Why aren't you looking at the soles of your feet? The others noticed by they never called you on it.' 'What are you talking about?' 'Look at the soles of your feet, look past that, inside your shoes, in the sockets.' 'Led at the bottom, had that always been there? Could it be that he was the carrier, to begin with?' 'For how long have I been carrying this?' 'From the very start, from before you even worked as an engineer. You brought me to existence, you brought the end. Without you, we wouldn't have had the chance to grow.' 'But how am I still?' 'A part of us, that's the reason why you cannot be slain by any normal means. You are to become like us, alone, just see.' It finally came, like some sort of frightening release, a set of sharply coated oil which promised death like any of the others. But as the oil came in contact with his skin, it only managed to burn a layer of his skin and to reveal what laid under. He had become a man an of led, both on the inside and the outside. 'We are similar in some way, brothers some might say.' Theodor's look intensified as he looked around at the buildings melting, the wood decaying and a flatness being left in their places. 'No, why are you disappearing as well? You cannot leave me now.' But that damned face turned into a giant grin which encompassed both the cut sides and kept extending until there was nothing of it but a bath of led. His skin was there no more and everything he looked as was gone. The drain was about to swallow everything in sight, at least to the point where the deterioration had begun. One thing which seemed to be conveniently placed there was a hole, which started growing. It was the point of no return, now that everything came to be made of the same material. Of course, it would slowly puff out into the abyss, the endless beyond of space and fill the emptiness with much of woe. The throng from which there came no return. With a head start, he plunged into in only to feel his body turning into some sort of pool which joined the other melting pot, dripping into a vortex which had devoured most of, only to met by the mad realisation that they were done. With the led having absorbed most of the nutrients which had belonged to the organic matter, they had taken it all and suckled on it until there was nothing but their weak shells left. Now the led was slowly shifting and leaving, with one final dreadful fate revealed. For only one man was left life, now part of a road, pieces of stone stretched from his mouth, his hands displaced, he did truly look into an abyss. But it wasn't one of emptiness but filled with plenty of strange knots, twists and turns and plenty of welded objects together which didn't belong. Theodor couldn't scream and be no longer in control of his limbs, he was merely outstretched on a rack, looking at a part of some machine which suddenly turned on to work. But it was in vain, there was nothing to work with out there. The sad truth which had been avoided was the thing which it had said. He would be the last of them, one of the last beings alive as a matter of fact, left there, as a lost soul, with nothing to work for, nothing to dread. Nothing which had been said made sense, for he had no memory of it ever happening. Throughout his time spent there, peering through the hole above, from which came a light which didn't bode well, he came to the realisation that the sun had started deteriorating as well. Without the telling of how much time it passes, with the decay constantly carrying on the planet, there wasn't any certainty. Confusion reigned, his heart had fainted, without a slight mistake, for the sake of which he just stopped trying to live and came to the point where he had forced the little muscle had inside his body. It pushed and turned, never having mourned anything less than that. An awful thing, which wasn't as sure of itself, but he felt himself being ripped apart, like a sheet of paper, which didn't belong, he wants to do something else but couldn't, wouldn't live a life of grand torture, as a tormented soul. At the point of which he felt pain no longer, he was awake, just like the others. From the lights of which that dreadful floating body and its two-faced buffons suddenly revealed themselves and grinned madly at the pair of them. But that was short-lived, as it looked around and managed to observe that something was wrong, something which didn't belong here. Five to twenty inches of wax had grown since they were there, on every sole of the feet, there came that growth and growth it was. It couldn't have appeared, it couldn't have been. 'I was plagued by a nightmare, I cannot believe how much it had come to affect me, oh can you understand what I went through?' 'Stop bickering there, I've had one as well and you don't see me complaining as much.' They started an argument but in all fairness, the most surprised of all was perhaps the one who stood in front. He looked at himself then looked around only to notice that he himself was still part of them, unable to cope any longer with the fact that he was stuck there, he turned and realised that, despite being immortalised there, he could see himself in wax. One of those still in growth pieces gave him this sensation of failure and utter numbness of thought. He had little in mind, he would go blind, he'd finally be away from them, but somehow his place felt as if it was there, with other sculptures of wax. And for that thought, and as the sole reason it had, he didn't feel afraid any longer, but contempt. 'It seems to me that you've had quite the night, haven't you?' 'What's the status then, head? Is there still a veil of darkness outside, or is it safe to go?' 'I'm afraid I cannot answer that, but there's no return from this journey now, as you can see.' It pointed both of its fleshy and flashing eyes towards what used to be the door. From the looks of which there was nothing but an empty wall there, which dreaded any approach. 'Have you tried knocking on it to see if that wall is fake?' 'And disturb your slumber? I wouldn't dare do such a thing.' At once every candle in the room had lit, with a spark of flame which bounced madly, from which there were indistinguishable features which seemed to have crept from side to side among the many flames. The arches were great, the rooms had been prepared. Him, of all the men around the room, felt that parasitic creature which crept inside all of them. Not only would he have to feel and live with it, but he knew that it slowly re-arranged their organs there, making sure they would become even more interconnected than it was possible. He swore he felt himself be a part of it no longer but couldn't place his hand exactly on it. What was the reason behind it and why was he mad? By the end of this journey, he would start acting like all of them, senile, afraid and alone, overtaken by the thing which ran inside of them. They were all acting like confused souls wandering in a place where they didn't belong. Foreign to their touch, it was only now that they came back to their feet and made any attempts at walking. Without a doubt, there would've been better ways, but they seemed to listen to it, for now, their guide, whom spoke. 'Now that your attention's here, I must drag you towards the ends, as far as I could say, there's no way back once we escape this room.' 'What do you mean once we escape this room? Shouldn't there be a door right there at the other end of it?' 'That way seems to be blocked and locked, believe me, I've tried going through to no avail. Nothing in this place suits me either, at least nothing which would help me rebuild what I lost.' 'If that's the case, I vote we go ahead and try finding whatever it is we have lost. With our combined efforts, there's no way we could lose our tracks here and there, at least not as long as we keep it safe between us."Cut it shortie, you're not the one who makes the shots around here.'He looked like he had been some sort of butcher in his life and it wasn't in his habit to get out of temper, he hadn't done it before in front of them and that was that.But a wave of pain had taken through, when that thing bloated through their skins and grew, expanding around, pushing the piece of cloth lower below until that point of grand pain.It was a living thing which binds them, and now it had encompassed their entire torsos like some sort of ringworm.Either they have been entirely stricken or life or something had made them all lose their minds because neither of them acted surprised at all. There wasn't any extremity or any type of reaction, just the general dread felt by the two-faced skull.'How come you're still going on?Have you not realised by now that the majority of you are going to be entirely taken over"Which is none of your concern, wretch!It nodded and flew back a while, for there was little time for consideration and more-likely they all felt too entrapped inside the room to feel anything else other than the need to escape. This problem would be dealt with later.For now, nothing else mattered, other than going around and bringing nothing but contempt with them.'Let's march there and see what we can do, perhaps we'll trample what's left of the door and creep inside whatever hole."Say, say, brother, carry one, we won't let them crush our spirits, we won't have to set down what we have.'Henceforth they walked and crushed the wax in their path, dangerous things as every single piece just flattened and melted to some wax pool at their feet.It was almost as if this entire room had been a trap do alarm some fiend in hiding of the presence of the men, and they had fallen right into it. But one, in particular, was aware that something was going, especially since he was set on the fact that he had dreamt of something similar during his solitary night where he had learned he was the only one of the men.'We need to get away from this place, that room. Damn you people, why won't you listen to me?Can't you see that the one who's supposed to take the shots has dozed off? He's just as lost in his mind now as the walking corpse is, we won't be able to get through him in time to stop whatever it is past those hidden gates.'"Then lead the way or shut yer mouth, we're little on patience as it is.'With this they listened, none came forth. Other than a glance or two, they hid inside the damn.It was dark inside the room, with only a candle having been brought. Once everyone was inside, they came to the realisation that there were a lot of sticks of wood there, more than plenty, in the hundreds or the thousands.They were back stuck, but not important, for he knew this was another sign.My name must truly be Theodor, they must know, they must know. 'I'm.'He opened his mouth as if to speak but closed it under the anxiety he felt, now that they were so close in that tight room, with even less space for them to act now that they had become that. No spines or many of the organs could be felt as swimming inside the pool, so it was obvious that this change wasn't just skin-deep.It'd be permanent but neither seemed concerned, other than him.'How long must we wait in here? This room is too tight for my needs and this space gives me nothing but contempt for you people.'Shhh, I think there's an intruder there, silence yourselves for now if you don't want to get its attention.'As Theodor watched through the small key-hole he saw a big figure, it wasn't a man. Too many legs for that, no real body but something which seemed to have been filled by the process of melting from a bigger creature of some sort.It gave off the texture on its body like it was nothing but a dreadful thing which made a lot of noise from the various holes that laid inside that brownish skin-flap. It spread its legs like wings until they had become thin as sheets and started cleaning around.For now, it showed no sign of noticing them, but to be sure, he turned and blew the candle. It didn't have to notice what was going on, they had to be safe one way or the other. Whatever happened, they were in this, stuck together, like a bunch of strange animals trapped in a box with sticks. Speaking of which, they were wet. But no water had been there, some sticky and putrid substance, like some clay, it burdened the scent and laid between the sticks, wouldn't happen to matter in the least. There was a dreadful thing which didn't last, one of which could be taken at last for granted. It remade the statues, one at a time, from the pools, back to the soles while lifting itself back into the air to restore the wax statues back to their true sizes. Something wasn't right, nonetheless, as they were aware of the dark silence that something might've happened at any moment. It could knock on the door, or try coming inside after it was done restoring the room to its original state. Worse than that, there was a dissatisfaction over the fact that they had to wait for this long. The process was not only long to weary for them to wait, especially in that sort of tightly spotted place. Little by little they had become aware of something which was going on. Not only did the circle just creep closer together like a sponge of tainted meat but they also started plotting together. It was obvious what they were after, going ahead and trying to nod it off. Neither would the ones in front nor the creature know or notice, as it was dark but they felt around. There was just enough space for them to do what they had no, as well as there was little and no less. Worst of all was the fact, that they started without consulting the ones who laid in front. But to say the least the dead one had become the worst, not the mute one who could walk, but the one which was carried by two of them in the past. At least, to say that he had become a bloated piece of meat with no arms, no legs, with only half of the head sticking out of the blob was an understatement. One one side, neither of them had noticed, as it had been only the burden of the man who was carrying him, but that was all in the past. It seemed like their body was in motion as well since those sticks had a scent to them. Rightfully it was dark, for neither of them would've wanted to look upon the image through the maddening thing, at least not in the least. What they witnessed was some feast of sorts, which hadn't done much to improve upon their mood. Blood for blood as they said. But the elongation appeared again, this time in them, right at the time when they started feeding stick after stick to themselves, pushing it inside. Somewhere out there, the two-faced skull hid away while they were feeding whatever creature laid inside of them and managed to survive on that. It was enough to feed themselves and quiver the needs. Not only that, but a sliver of light had come from there, as they had become such like a spear, a wall, which hadn't need for their hands to grab the sticks but dragged itself closer to devour them. Whatever substance laid on them, it made its taste buds go mad and wild, inside of them, in the least, there were some dreadful things which happened. Little space laid for the organs and the food to be taken apart, henceforth, they were treated in the same manner, broken and taken for their power. It was clean now, all around, in the form of a hole which was large enough for them to fit through. But as closely as the light came into contact, in received and retracted, like some flacid type of being. The time for hunger was there no longer and it was obvious that somehow they had avoided the curator of the wax statues and continued this way. Right in whispers. It was said. 'Won't we abandon that one?' 'No, he'll find us, once he noticed the light coming out of the key-hole, plus, he's seen us go through that way. He'll know where to look for us.' And the satisfaction was greatly lurid. For there, around the halls, there were plenty of sticks and opening to the outside. Small in shape, maybe holes, but this place was rustic, so there was that excuse for the lack of windows or of fire. But everything seemed to be wet or covered in that thing, as it turned out for the giant feathers to be present there. 'It's a nest, isn't it?' 'It is, but what shall we do about it? Of course, I see the dirt below and the bones, but where's the inhibitor of this nest?' Not another word and they saw, right in front of their very eyes, by the corner, in some distance corridor, after the plunge, there was an opening in the wall. This castle or this construct had been displaced and broken. It didn't look like a hole which had been made by a beast, but rather of some siege. But in the distance, they could see that dreadful process going on and did well to remember that there'd be nothing out there tied to nature, but the solid construct which poisoned the world. To which there was no stopping, as they looked for a way out. 'Isn't it similar to the last time?' 'Perhaps, but this time we're under the threat of something bigger, if I may say, nothing virtuoso, but rather something blunt and evil, perhaps a bird of prey.' 'There wasn't any other way something could be that docile, but neither of them wanted to think of the worst, at least not yet. It would be impossible to look away or to say what they saw. But the one who inhabited this nest was out there, with a look of despair on its own body, it flew around the entire area and looked like some dreadful drake of some sorts. Have those been feathers before? On the closer inspection, they looked like scales, with the dreadful faces of their victims attached. No, those must be our reflections, wouldn't they? But neither man met his face, nor could he think of anything to say to those reflections which did grin. It was only as deep as slumber that they felt. Perhaps their nightmares carried on in the waking world, as they forgot to check whether or not truly woke up. It was a sham, a shaft, they carried with their sluggish body and dragged it through. Soon enough there had to be another way to get through, but how could they get there unnoticed?' 'I don't think we can fight that thing alone without weapons.' 'What about turning around?' 'Not an option any longer.' It seemed as if it was a dream indeed, as they pointed at the dark. Despite being lit by the source where the illumination faded, there they were, a few of those cleaners who blocked the path of sticks. They stood there erect despite being afraid to approach. A myriad of thoughts came to be through their minds unless that was nothing but them going through some mild paranoia. There was no way back, no path to return. Normal men obeyed and would've followed but they carried on rather than risk whatever it was there. 'Do you think we'll meet him again?' 'Let him rot rather than find his body, I would've disliked being in his presence once he was entirely built. Do you truly think someone like that would have the best intentions once he had a body?' 'He's right you know? He was using us as much as we were using him, without a doubt.' 'Be silent so I may hear my thought?' It was the first time he had spoken since they wakened up, the man, the lead. His name was shady, it's been forgotten, there was no hope for him yet, other than the hope, indeed. There was this way he looked at it. 'We have no possibility to snick, I think, but we may take it by surprise, listen to me and look at the walls. Sturdy stones, placed together as to last, it was undoubtedly the best craftsmanship any of them had ever noticed or laid eyes upon, with little doubt that the ones who built them were masters of their own stone-carving regalia. But that wasn't enough to do for it, that think out there, the oversized dreadful thing, the two-headed, four-tailed, on closer inspection, as they approached they noticed that it hadn't wings. Over its serpentine body, it bore some planar set of brooded pseudo sheets which helped it glide rather than fly on its own. It was clear enough that it was made for it, as the faces appeared even in the distance, though this time they had looked as if they were skinned off poor souls who stumbled in the wrong place. Perhaps they might've been pulled on by their own glittering reflection that they would forget. It was a doubt as well as that tails were real, but batons for striking down the plane of dirt. Nonetheless, it was a terror which haunted the skies, the heads of which were that of overgrown men which hid inside the mouth of the twin-headed drakes, as if hiding from others while displaying their trophies. Every now and then they would retract inside just to come out for air, with their hands and pair of legs as well, acting like parasites than anything else. But their torsos must've stretched through the bulk of the necks rather than be tongue deep. They crawled to the level of their own feet and listened to the man. John was it? Robert? Had he been a captain or an admiral? They wondered. Without a proper way to tell, it was only guesswork in their minds, but he called the shots, always and foremost. And they listened as if not to strike at their relationship with the man. 'Grab whatever you can, sharp rock, bone, scale, if you think it may help. We may have no other alternative but to fight the evil before we go forth as you have seen, the way back is blocked. Fair enough that they had listened, though it wasn't as well as he thought it to be. It was hard with their circle to fully take on the fiend, meaning only one of their sides would be fully able to strike it in its true manner. The rest of them would just be there for the sake of watching, kneeling or freezing while the battle went on. Once the sky started roaring, they had known that the time would be forth, without delay. It would start retreating to its lair, which became much muddier from the rain. Bricks becoming even browner than they had been, this time even darker, closer to some deep sunken blue. Even the sticks were draining and from somewhere, right from above a new batch of them fell and filled the hole. Now there were no guardians and no way to return, they had to do this before it darkened again. Without a doubt, those things hiding inside the body of the creature were affected just as much by the dark if it chose to hide inside of it. Little doubt remained of the pure intention of the creeping thing which came into light. 'It will know, as soon as it comes into contact, it will notice us.' Listen to yourself, do you even hear what you're saying? We have a little of a chance to get through, right around but it's too late to make a run for it. Not any longer since it's coming. We'll have to deal with it in whatever way we can and sooner or later, it will have to be paid for. He knew what that meant, and just what this fight could bring. The only difference was the fact that they weren't truly aware of how bad the things would go if it managed to shove its sharp claws inside their puffy body, worse than the fact alone, there was little dread in their eyes. So they waited, unafraid and with little effort which would be placed against them. In a way, they were almost close to being hidden by the shades, as the sun has crept inside another side, moving freely like some fire sphere which held no rule, rather, it acted freely on its own accord. Perhaps that might've been the scariest thing out there, to think that it could decide to follow through and devour their planet, it didn't leave anything else other than a bitter taste in his mouth. By the time it came closer, he looked again behind of him, at all of those souls which seemed to be there with him, afraid. Little was known to him about their personal dues, or whether or not they'd survive this growth, but it was time to stop going through the problem and take his chances ahead. Strike at their heads. With a puffy slip, they slid forth and threw what they had from the back, smashed sticks and stones, pieces of glass amongst a fully fledged scale or sorts. It turned out vile, as they carried on, to their surprise, it was nothing which they expected. The mouth had been opened and one of the ones inside suddenly leapt from inside the flying concoction. It revealed its many legs and hands, that grown body and long tail-like lower body, which had become such as one who lacked the nutrients to grow. Behind, the beast had last lost control over itself, since it needed two pilots to control. It wasn't long until it trashed around and tried smashing and crashing with its talons around. But that last, as it stumbled on its legs, ready to fall behind. The plane-like wings which worked no longer seemed to creep in such a way and be destroyed by the sudden change in wind and pressure. A low-grade thing which bore through them, at least then, alone. It was a miracle of the sort, a bloated type of clarity of their own, from the top of which it was thrown. Now it landed, afraid with its companion, at a much lower altitude. Their vessel had fallen, not entirely destroyed, as the trees had cushioned the fall. But they looked dreadful, and once they came into the weak light which came from below, they dared not take a move forth. It was a dreadful time to be alive, to creep and seep through their woes, their minds were diluted in the vileness that they achieved. Now, it would be too easy to grab its hands and push it. 'Take care of it now, can't you see that it's evil and it doesn't deserve to survive?' Its eyes suddenly bulged as it looked close. More attention was paid, as it opened the mouth to reveal a long soft rounded piece of meat, filled with bulging veins, the teeth of a man and a pair of shorty but long tongues. Despite the ability to make sounds, that wasn't enough to satisfy their release. Before it was done, it spat it out, not being the tongue, but another living being which had lived inside. The smaller parasite hadn't managed to get far before it was kicked away and fell past the edge. Such death was swift, it didn't suffer the fall. A creeping sensation came on both the men in the back who only watched, afraid that something might happen. So many things laid there which were unexplainable, such as why was there a need to feed again. Why were they feeling empathy for a bunch of strange beings with which they had no connection? 'Haven't we had this conversation again?' Asked one on the back. For once, he had given a general feeling of being right to everyone adjacent to him. He wasn't strange, he wasn't queer or any more peculiar than anyone in life. It was even more surprising that they would want to creep and weep for that. 'It doesn't matter, those parasites might not be evil and the fact whether or not they may deserve it counts little. But we cannot afford for our plans to be delayed if they're urging trouble.' As he spoke, he grabbed its soft face and held it. Not only was the body weightless but the face also had a softness to it which was unexplainable. It looked like the head of a man but had no skull inside. That grip held its grip shot and removed whatever force it had left in its limbs. 'See this thing? Hopefully, it won't survive the fall.' 'Wait, shouldn't we wait and vote for it? What if this is murder? Why can't we let them both survive if we carry on?' 'Because they disgust me and I want them gone!' He yelled, and after he was done squeezing what was left of it, he threw it away, ready to order. While in the air, the one which fell switch to a fetal position, as if that mattered in the least. The body was never seen, and the tress did little to cushion the fall. Now, there was the problem of the other one which observed and show signs of moving away, trying to make it through on its own. There was a long way down there but he knew they couldn't take any chances. 'Which one of you still has a stone?' 'It's defenceless. This will be stone-cold murder, can't you see it's trying to flee?' 'You got what you came for, both of them out of their flying body, let's just carry on.' 'Give me that damn stone.' His voice went through them and managed to force the chained-pair to carry it from peer to peer until he was given it. This wasn't a throw but a drop. His hand extended forth, right above and from the likes of the sky above, a small shadow fell on its head. It stopped from its descent and started. For this moment alone was spent between the two of them creeping into each other's souls. After this, there was no reluctance any longer. He no longer snapped his wrist on his own but simply released it from his hand. There was a window of a frame, in which they all watched how the stone punctured and went through its entire body with little difficulty, right before it released and fell with its companion. 'That should take care of that, we're leaving now, understood?' With a nod, they seemed to follow him through, around the corner through another cover of dark. Sticks were there as well, and it was getting dangerous, alas. Without a doubt, the process would be horrible to see, under any circumstance whatsoever. But they felt it open as their chest and eat a bunch of those oily sticks until it was fed. The repercussions of that would be far too many to count, and no one was interested in that at all. What was important and which came was the need to escape. No one

bore any of their thoughts away, no one cared enough to look at themselves in those dark mirrors, but once they passed the rooms, they were done. There was a torch and what followed next was vague for the eye. Not only had the architecture ended, but it seemed like the floor had creaked and ended there as well. It seemed like this building had been built as the extension of a cave, a wet stony place through which they came to be. A small creature, dark glittering eyes, the scent of sulfur in their eyes. Neither of them dared creep nor say a thing, they were all cursed just from the simple fact of being there. 'What now? I see no way out and I can't be the only one who noticed that. We're only going to get farther and farther inside until we'll be trapped or too far from escape. Is this what we want to make out of our journey?' 'Look at us before talking again, I'm not even bothered any longer by what I'm becoming. Perhaps it would be for the best to get as far away as possible before we change into something else.' It was a bad thing to say, especially since the risk of making everyone else more paranoid was ever-present. Neither of them liked thinking about the repercussions which came with their growth, not that it could be ignored any longer. But eventually, they wouldn't feel any of their insides, not even their minds, if that was possible. A mindless sluggish rounded creature which did nothing more than feed itself to gluttony with sticks. Not the grand future or the end any of them had envisioned. Yet the one who was silent remained there, the presence of which couldn't have become any less stronger now. It seemed that out of all them, he was the least affected. Not only had he avoided most of his body absorption, but unknown to most of them, all of his insides were still there, not even touched or broken down.

Instead of it, each and every one of them was connected to him, their life-support, their only working body. Whatever amount of pain or spasm which was vaguely felt pointed towards him. No one dared look past their thoughts. They were too busy talking it out then to observe that of which had crept through a hole. It flew no longer but had apparently sprouted a pair of skeleton legs and pseudo-meat-like arms which moved disjointedly. At a thought's notice, neither of them moved an inch. Being surprised was the least of their expectations. What came forth was a greeting and a bow, that, which was followed by his reaction to this ordeal. 'I see that you have changed as well. You're no longer the same people I've encountered back then.' 'Perhaps we're not, but this place appears like it's had its way with us, alive.' Though on the outside they were used no longer, as some of them had already been consumed in the vessels. It was the rate of which it ate and grew that wasn't natural. With the little it was given, somehow it expanded in mass rather than be static like the others which had been noticed. Electrical cords were attached to it, just to control the rate in which this expansion went. So far there was not a single known reaction which could be documented and said to have belonged to it. No one could be bothered enough to testify on the process, henceforth, the higher-ups didn't answer any of the inquiry. That dreadful thing never left them, good people being lost inside, already, as it happened, three of them had been lost. Without a way to pull the others out, they were condemned to be its prison guards, feeding it resources until it'd be too late. That sudden realisation came as no shock, as they looked at the body of their fellow. In addition to that, they seemed to have been taken back by something other, the skin which had been growing, the muscles, the organs, why was it? Why was it that it was growing out to be a humanoid, all of the sudden, in the most dreadful manner. There was another head which laid on the side of the skull, which covered any kind of ear which might've been. 'You're three-faced now? Will these sudden changes ever stop?' 'I could ask the same about your growth but I believe that we would only be wasting each other's time. Shall we take advantage of this deal then and walk away? This cavern seems as if it has no end.' But its speech could not distract them from an important fact, that of which they could see blood dripping from the back of its head. It's been drinking some of it while they had been gone, but just how much of it had it been consumed? There was no telling of the dangers which might be involved, now that they had been aware of that detail. This Fyor was a dangerous fellow. But at least they knew that it would go ahead and try for their blood, with as much doubt to that as there was. For they seemed sick and their own bloating red substance appeared as if only made their conundrum worse. It was evenly so as the growth and chance continued taking place. Though he was deemed as somewhat safe, he was set to walk forth with the torch inside the cavern while they all watched themselves for danger. 'We've met others out there, two creatures which had a flying sort of bird, in some way I cannot explain what it was like, as if appearance left too dreadful of a memory.' 'I wasn't interested either way, but if I may say, you left me, for quite some while. You wouldn't happen to be interested in hearing what happened, would you?' Because in turn, it did quite wonder what exactly was wrong with them, to have undergone such extreme changes. 'Well, it's only fair if we exchange stories, so if you do not mind, these halls of stones, these crypts seem endlessly depressing. May we fill it with a story?' It was just as soon as they had left, by the time what was left of a fire faded from the room they had gone into there he was, Fyor floating, in a corner which had been his own. So wide and fashioned out of creeping layers of melted holes that it was undoubtedly peculiar in either way of looking at it. Something had eaten through the wood and made its lair there before abandoning it. A warm type of hole, deep enough for a man, or for a malformed two-faced skull to lay in. There they were below, the cleaners whom stretched and pushes themselves in the way of rebuilding the room to its appearance. That was just moments after they've gone in and there was little to say or do about the subject. It was even more obvious then that they wouldn't return. 'Blasted ones, you left me here all alone, how dare you?' At least it was asked in such a manner, whichever was less disturbing, though he'd have to act fast. It was well enough unless he would be heard or seen by them, who roamed the halls like ghastly sheets of skin which did reveal their organs in the dark. Most of what they had were attached to those long joints which stretched to clean. Expose there in their form, it was revealed that those floating blankets which covered them served merely as a distraction from how they truly worked. 'What do you mean that wasn't wax we touched?' All of the sudden, some of them felt dirty only from the mere touch and the incandescence of the thing they remembered having shoved their hands in. 'It did come out of one of their puffy balls at the end of a floating long limb.' The fact that it hardened instantly left an unsatiated feeling of dismay if it was meant or used to encompass a living being in it. Though it might've been easy to break from the outside, there was no way to know what the deal was on its inside. But it was time for me to act and try to find an escape, so I may hope to join you sometime. There was little doubt that you would find a way, I know it was to be like that, regardless of what happened, somehow you came through. The observation which came merely after observing them a little while. Such was the way the acted, and how easily they made themselves around danger, how they carried on with little fear of the pain and suffering which might've been inflicted upon failure. A true pair of men, which had been lost. Regardless of which. 'What about the story? How came you here with us? I didn't see any open door, that was never there, to begin with, they hadn't completed it. Merely a broken wall there, from what I've noticed at least.' 'I'll get to that, just bear with me.' Without much hope, I crawled out of the hole once I noticed that there were more of them who had arrived. They spread around the room and pulling even the smaller particles inside. That was vile and there was no need for their culling, the dread, that of which wasn't approached nor spoken about. Under the light which had momentarily come, their forms looked as if they were filled with growths of skin, bulbs, a dark green, dead colours, a carapace on top. It was the opposite of the silken impression they gave while floating in the dark. The light didn't last long, for a good reason as well, for no one deserved to behold their appearance and still get to live with themselves. But for himself, neither of them appeared to have noticed in the least. It was almost as if he had become invisible amongst them, floating and peering through the flocks of air. Quite the pair, a dreadful one which didn't last. They were free at last to roam around the room once they were done. It was interesting, just how close I managed to approach them without being caused much trouble. As long as there were no touches, I believe there was a confusion that I was one of them. 'They were blind.' 'It's as close as I choose to believe. Why else wouldn't they have attacked me when the chance came near? But what comes next might as well be unappealing and disturbing to either one of you, for I have followed as deep as I was able, going through their lair.' It was perhaps just as deep as to push through the wood and get into rock. With everything in sight encompassed in the same wax-like substance, I have noticed that there had been other humans there predating you or your presence. There was nothing out there left of them other than their remains, which had been more than enough to understand what they had been. Rather than cleaners, this was their lair, their trap, through which they didn't do anything else other than leave their mouldy statues until someone came, fresh new meat for the saucer as one would think. 'Why is it that, at the time we arrived in the room, there was no statue there, to begin with?' 'It might've had to do with the fact that they had just finished eating their previous victim. You were just lucky enough to get there when they were full.' 'And if we weren't that lucky, as to find them still there?' 'You wouldn't have made it through the night.' That was a lot to think of and pound on, though it somehow didn't answer what happened to the rest of him. Taken from a pile of bones, from one of their sacks which dangled from side to side. It was obvious enough that something went horribly wrong when no one dared spare a word of what happened.

A gap and a large one at that remained between the time they were out there and the time it laid inside amongst them. 'How did you get through, then? I could perhaps understand the way which you used to get through but if there's one thing I cannot wrap my head around is that fact that I do not know how about your trick there.' 'Oh but there was no trick involved. Once I had everything I needed, I did nothing other than return to where I came from and started eating through the wood. It's so much easier to do now that I feel no pain, and have little to no joint powder to block me from over pushing my entire body.' 'And you crawled through that hole, after, that would be all?' Though there was more, he saw something about those such-said cleaners and the way they acted. Not only would their lair go deeper than expected but there was a stretch of thought that they were somehow next to them, right past a thin sheet of stone. Would their paths intertwine? 'This change of yours, do you wish to talk about it?' 'Not now.' 'I wish I could say anything about it, that I miss feeling my legs, they've become all so numb from the constant pressure and I can't do much to explain that. If only there was a better way to deal with these changes, I would've been rather grateful if I could at least feel the soles of my feet again.' 'Stop complaining, it's not like we're in any better condition than you are. Can't you see that a lot of them had almost lost themselves entirely?' It was true enough, other than a few of the on-lookers, they were mostly silent, having their faces pulled inside the sluggish mass. Outside, there was a dope, a creeping sensation that somehow, just through some unevenly unnatural way, it had grown past what it was given. Where could it have given itself the energy to do that? Clearly, it had grown a short, pole-like body, which made it feeding process much difficulty since they had taken a pair of movable stairs and had to bring them in. Obviously enough, there was something wrong going on around the entire complex now. Fewer soldiers around, more of them being called back at an alarming rate. Even the brief encounters had resulted in false reports and non-professional explanations given under the table letters rather than official papers. Just what in the creeping hole was going there was a complete mystery. His world had become hazy and rather than any explanation, he was mesmerised by looking at the many camera windows there. You know, it did look strange enough, as it grew its body through the night. Some holes from its insides opened and puffed, but it was contained. No one was contaminated as far as he had known. Such a miracle didn't happen on a daily occurrence and for that, he was grateful enough. Regardless of which, he thought he was in control now. Well enough that there was no one around here to order him around. He lifted up his receptor, only to find there was no signal there, threading murky waters in a sea of roses. Watching it still, eat the last of them. From rumours, rather than reports. Repeating, from rumours that actually official papers, he had heard from a younger soldier than they were about to bring larger stocks, of both men and smaller vessels. Though for what reason alone, he hadn't known nor figured out their end-plan, as this was madness on a madness' basis. There was no reason, nothing to gain from this ordeal. Whatever happened to their higher-ups, this had become a deathtrap, a torture chamber which ate bodies and left nothing behind. Even creatures of the same species had been cannibalised and consumed as if they meant nothing, in order to feed that strange growth. It was disturbing. Soldiers, grown men and even veterans who were present there stood afraid at the mere sight. This place had been changed as more and more efforts to restrain it and prevent further contamination on either side of the room it was in proceeded. Excavations had taken place and now they thought it was close to being fully suppressed inside that tiny room. No sign as of yet of anything going wrong. But other than the soldiers, a team of scientists had been scheduled to come. Had it truly been a week since then? What was the reason behind him losing his sense of time? Paranoid, unsure. Apparently, they had to come with a bunch of machines and insert some chemicals inside the dirt just so they could make sure there'd be no growth which had undergone beyond their awareness. It wasn't evenly so that they cared. At least, with the tiny amount of hope which remained, it did what it said it would and prevented it from growing. There was dread inside, at least for those involved and not a second passed without the constant reminder that there were good people inside this very moment. Speaking was hard past a point. Right as they passed some invisible sheet of webbing, invisible coat, both Fyor as well as they couldn't help it but look and hear at the details. Every drop of water from above vibrated at a level which affected the entire room. Even the fire was moving like some sort of bright illusion, leaving something of its after-image behind. Without a doubt, their vision had been altered in some way, if all of them could see the same thing. 'What's happening?' 'Don't panic yet, I think this is supposed to be normal, in some sort of way, I can't be sure exactly what's the reason but bear with it. It's the only thing we can do now.' 'But I cannot, I don't know about the others. Neither of them is speaking, they haven't been saying anything ever since, you know, that happened.' 'I know as well as I have seen. I can sense it, I don't think there's many of us left either.' 'Then can we return? I want to be sent back to my nursing home, this time I won't complain. Do you hear? I promise I'll sit in my chair and won't cause trouble any longer. Can you hear me?' 'No sign whatsoever of anyone being there. They had all been abandoned and most of them had died once the process had begun. Apparently, what could be salvaged from the human anatomy was their human eyes and toes, which migrated at the soles of the newly grown sharp legs.'Are you unable to go on?'We'll do well, continue.'A deranged thought came, as this place was quite sealed in its own bubble, in the term of which no one would know nor hear that something that could happen. It was a peculiar thing to look at, but it was there, the endless, the point where there'd be no return. Whatever happened past that blanket was merely an illusion, to distract them and bring them to this point in time. A torch which wouldn't last long and the two or four of them left there with Fyor.'Say, what were you planning on doing once you recovered your body?'My plan would continue until the point where I had the chance to escape."But isn't the world out there destroyed as we speak? Something's changing it, and even the most dreadful of creatures are trying to hang dearly to their lives and hide inside rather than fight out there.'Well, now that you had to push the knife and twist it, I must say that I was planning on going even deeper, to the very bottom floor which could only extend until I had my own place to dwell inside.'Said Fyor with some kind of smile on all three of his face. There still hadn't been an explanation of the coming of the third of, not that it was important any longer since they were all nothing more than superficial addition with little to no sentience whatsoever. Nonetheless, there was more to it, he was hiding things, most importantly now.'When we first found you, weren't you standing on a wooden staff then?'Ah, yes, I was merely pretending to wait until someone who could take care of my trouble just happened to come along. You have no idea how many of your kind I've used in the past, only to have stopped or have taken the wrong turn. The maze normally changes, but this time it hadn't. I forgot to mention because you wouldn't have had a clue of what I was talking about, but there's a reason why everything went so smoothly then."Well, I guess it's only fair now since I don't think I'll be able to see an end to this.'Even the smell faded away, the torch wasn't even that bright, not had it hurt on touch. He tried it as well, pushing his hand through it and seeing no blister form.'Shouldn't this be a cause of concern?'Only as long as you fear of what it means.'They only one another now, the corpse which had been absorbed by now. No, he looked away from the sight but knew well enough that all of them had been lost. He was the only one left there, him and the skull. There wasn't any reflection any longer but he had little doubt of the fact that he wasn't human any longer. Straight from his toes and fingers, there was little there to him, little to speak of the facts. But he knew.'Say, you dropped your torch a few hours ago, haven't you?'It looked as if it was nowhere to be seen, not in the back nor could it have been hidden. I guess so.' Said Fyor, without even noticing the the fact that there was something wrong with the light. It was still there, at a level which made it seem as if he had never dropped it from its hand. He felt hunger again, most damning, ever closing and there was nothing else there. But he would be alone, then he would be hungry again. Not unless the hunger would stop forever and remain, just like a torch and the light. He desperately clung to something dear to wrap his head around. There was little he could think of to make for what had happened. Was it inevitable?'Say, you're looking at me vaguely distraught, is there something I could help you with?'We could just stop from walking and stare at one another, I don't know if there's an end to this trap but in the least, we earned a spot of rest, wouldn't you agree?'They stood there staring at one another with little emotion and less so of an interaction. He wasn't aware of what his means for an end were but at least he knew Fyor couldn't get tired. Yet he stood there, legs crossed, both eyes on the side closed, standing with his back turned. There wasn't even that much sand below, from which he stood and crept again past the endless gaze which snapped. They were trapped. Sooner or later they would have to agree on it and that would be enough. But no, it couldn't go that way, not with the hunger, not until it was satiated. The torch remained, why not it? The torch hadn't gone out, so why would the hunger return once it was dealt with? Look at the meat on it, the juicy bones that lay there, why don't you take less of a bite and carry on without him? It's not like he was planning on speaking much. He had figured out a long time ago as well, mostly by the look in his eyes and how dreadful they were. A repugnant being which deserved even less than being alive. He had to do it, the hunger just got worse by the minute. Standing there and simply looking at the raw meat didn't cut it for him, he could only be pleased in the case of eating it, piece by piece, until there was nothing, not even a slice of bone to pick his own teeth with. That came as no surprise then, when suddenly he pushed himself through the fat, and came the few inches between them, opening the hole in his chest which had extended to reveal a collection of all their human teeth which had been tightly set into their jaws. Now they were attached to a most leprously-looking tongue. It encompassed the skeleton and pulled it inside. What followed were the screams of the creature, as the tenderness of the meat and the juiciness of the bones got crushed and mushed to make up for the loss. For once, it didn't matter any longer whether or not it was suffering. He was content eating it there, like a glutton, too fat to move now, ready to choke on that mouthful. Perhaps it was too much of a meal to take, something which didn't end and only added to the fat. Though the others weren't there long, the circle had become filled and pushed against itself until there was none of that any longer. It grew in itself, which instead crippled him. What's happening to me? Where are the others? He had remembered that there had been other men standing with him as well, part of him rather, deceased by now, pulled in by the mass. Alone and afraid, he could feel his neck full, mouth full, the jaw crunched and forced open. By his guts, he released a pair of bones and chewed faces, all of which had belonged to their guide. There wasn't any help to it, that thing inside him didn't end. Forced to choke for as long as he was part of it, there would be nothing more to say on it, other than the fact that he would be ingested as well, eventually at least, by his own growth, which would eventually think of himself as nothing more than a numb and dumb meat to devour. The veteran was the last to die and be absorbed. On his case file, it had been set, early onset, classified. 'Well, I think that makes the last batch of them done for, though I still wonder, who's to be the next one in line.' Looking at it through the cameras was one thing, but he had dared not walk towards it to take a look for himself. It was more than dangerous, perilous, too much for a man of his age to take such a risk. He'd be pushing inside, undoubtedly, especially if it were true, what they said about, how it got into your mind. 'Sir, there's a man looking for you outside the room, sir.' 'Soldier, who's he and what does he want?' 'A scientist sir, he saw he's come here with a proposal for the next batch, should I send him in?' 'Go ahead, soldier dismissed.' 'Sir.' The new cadets always filled in the shoes well after their first time, but once they reached the on-going over a few months, a lot of them just disappeared. Either they were dismissed, or. With a bang, the door was almost snapped as it entered in contact with itself. There was some sort of confusion there, at least in terms of who guided the show and who gave the orders there. It was rude enough that he entered with his suit on, and he was trying to speak with him through it. 'The helmet, take it off, I won't have you men of science disrespect the uniform as well. Wait, don't worry, there's no form of contamination here, no need to bring out the tool.' He had his small device by his pocket, ready to set it forth and mark for something around. Just in case, he did do it so. There was something of a slight, unexplainable amount of it there, but not enough to constitute a danger. After all, the entire place seemed to have been contaminated from the dirt below, and with the constructions going on, well, it didn't matter. At least they were forced to take shots every few days, which were enough to kill any of the diseases they might've come in contact with from the lowered immunity left by it.' As I said, oh.' His expression changed as the chair was pulled and the scientist stood sat down. 'I'm sorry, I didn't mean to be as rough as I have been ma'am. If I had known.' 'It's all right, no need to apologise, you'd be surprised to hear how often this type of deal happens throughout my field.' 'I'm sure I would say, why have they sent you here?' 'The next set of patients that are to be connected to the vessel, right? They sent me to pass on the list and return a full report whether or not there'd be any kind of complications along the way.' 'Complications?' 'That depends solely on you sir, and how you may react to this.' Though he had more than enough experience, he had failed to notice the pile of files she had brought with her. Before, there might've been more than a few pages for each man who entered, which included their private history, service, statues, amongst other, whether or not there was abuse involved in any sort of way, that kind of stuff. Not this time, as he was given a note of the fact that they each received only a single page, not even back and behind, written. One image was more than enough to determine who he or she were, with a few snippets of personal information which didn't involve anything medical at all. No blood type, height, age, physical form, at best he could try to vaguely guess at it, by even then, the photos were old. Maybe ten years or more with each frame, each shot, each man that passed from page to page. Others were still in black and white, to the point where it may have been that one of them was older than the veterans he had sent there. It was odd to look at and he could only wonder. 'Why so many and who so soon?' 'We didn't have a chance either, the project leader has given us a direct order and had asked for specific instructions. Most of them down the pile are now heavily sedated and under our control. This is only something of a, of a.' 'Show trial, isn't it?' 'Something of the sort, except the fact that you're the one who's been watching it ever since the project started, keeping it under surveillance. If there's anyone out there who know what it does or how it acts, that must be you.' 'So I guess I only need to keep sending my reports and everything will be peachy and well.' 'As long as we keep everything at a professional level, of which I've no doubt you may be able to maintain, we'll work just fine.' It had been three hours since she left the room. Stacks of single sheets were spread on the desk, from which the pictures stood as evidence of the entire process. He'd have to look at them and see just how they were sent from their artificially induced coma, the terms she had used to explain their conditions, before leaving. They had been brought in thin black boxes which contained, two or three of them crammed inside. It was mad, that way it was revealed that there was some sort of round opening to each of them. Those were human beings there but were left to hang as chum in the murk. 'Damn military project, this is inhumane, someone has to.' 'Stop. Rethink about the whole order. As he thought it, he fingered one of his badges on the chest and reminded himself, just how it was during the war. They had marched through one of the small villages and were forced to kill the women and children in order to capture it. It was dull by now and the edges prevented it from slashing the skin off his finger but there he laid, conflicted and disturbed. He hadn't even known those people, yet it felt wrong. But he went through with the orders, he's killed them, charged, broken through the weak doors, looking at their cold faces. He hadn't become a monster because of it, he was still sane, he had achieved a rank. It should've been hours at least before it made a move. But a few boxes here and there meant that there were at least eighteen people there, waiting to be pulled. Without a doubt, they wouldn't get pulled in the vessel, those boxes were more than enough, serving as some sort of pseudo carcasses for it to stretch towards. Like small silk spurs, webbing over, they came and attached to the openings. They were thin and almost invisible to the human eye, but they had shown signs of growing. It was like it could drag them towards itself, the staircase-type ladder in front of it made it unusually hard and overcomplicated everything. But those spurs grew in bulk and started spreading across the top, to the point where it had reached the change which was needed. Not that either of them would feel. What laid inside, streets of cobalt, years passed, there was a road between the two towns at last. One which had been made properly and would symbolise, in the least the union between two's people. There would be an inauguration of the railroad which would pass through both of them before heading in the outer world. And there had been peace. Except the dirt had started spreading, making the water dirty between the two. 'I still can't believe you're asking me to do this.' 'You know what I said, they're not under your jurisdiction Malloy. You are to set them free and only take care of the crime happening in your area as long as you're seeing to your stuff.' 'But that's not the way we were trained to deal with them, what's so hard to understand?' 'I think you're the one failing to understand that until the law is set in place, we are virtually unable to touch them. I'm sorry but this is how it must be, there can be no other way for us to change it.' 'Unless he counted the acts of some vigilante who would come and crack an eyes, slitting a throat and carrying on as if nothing happened. There had been a few of them, seeing those dirt-men walk across the streets, repugnant in their looks, trying to sell their wear to the first and foremost buyer.' 'Would that be all or have any other inquiry of something I may actually have power upon?' 'Nothing sir, that would be all.' 'He was dismissed, as always, nothing to be gained from it. Damned faceless man, still, after so much time, he failed to see through, but he knew there was a hole. He had to be under their hands, it had to be their fault? Who else but those superstitious, dark practitioners who had performed their rituals countless times? Perhaps they have been the ones who had troubled him with the visions and the paranoia behind. He hadn't dared ask any of his colleagues about what he had looked like or what have they seen when trying to peer. The man never left his damn room for the sake of it. What else could he expect, other than be on his own investigation while keeping an eye on the man?' 'Come on Cones, you're coming with me.' 'About time, partner, what are you looking for?' 'This is off the records, it seems, we're going to investigate some of the crimes committed by these.' 'He grunted and almost lost his footing after muttering the word, locals. Clearly, there was some sort of distaste for them, as well as there might be, as one was quick to find out that there'd be no clear distinction between the dread they felt, as any other pointed it out. But with the help of reflection, that was undeniable, dark times were ahead and he had little to think about it himself. Passively, he slipped his hand on his handgun and walked away. Cones followed him and said nothing as they carried it on the road. It was clear enough that the place was becoming a mess, not only have they had to deal with strange cases in the past but their presence here only made their occurrence happen more often. Disappearances which were unexplainable and unaccounted for, bodies which were found months later after the murder with no signs of violence on them. Children who somehow died of natural causes but had been completely drained of blood, to name a few of the strange events that came upon their arrival. With this, the sound of evil permeated through the buildings, something was happening. They were in a loud enough a conversation that there was little help which was needed to be done for. A more disturbing way of acting wasn't there, as they both got out and just kicked the door in.' 'Won't there be trouble without the warrant? Come on now, you know there are regulations here, you can't just budge into someone's building uninvited and.' 'He had gone past the stars, while Cones was on the first floor, waving at some of the other neighbours who had come out to look at the ordeal. Wave and look away, follow that damn bastard before something's going to happen to him. But without the slightest shimmer of hope, there was some dreadful thing happening there. A crime was underway, ready to take off by the time he was on the seventh floor. Lots of people there already, two sorts of thugs, their own. Standing on both side of the door and smoking inside, you could see cuts on their fingernails and their big brown lips. 'What'cha looking at a stranger? Piss off if you know what's good.' The other just looked funny at him, but they strangely looked similar enough to be taken as twins. What could they be having stashed in their pockets? Not a gun, that was too hard to get already, but he had something hidden there. Why haven't I equiped my gun yet though? They're not going to take me lightly either, brass knuckles. Only one of them had put them on, while the other had pulled a switchblade. It was two against one before Cones could carry his own weight there and he still hadn't pulled the gun out. What was Maloy even? A slam on the door followed, at least by the sound of some peculiar, almost pitched voice that didn't speak right. It was an attempt at the language but one that was broken and took too long with the bowels. By the tattoos and the words written around the balding old man's body, he was clearly a nut case. His room had left an aroma of dust and smoke and other than the black and the red, there was no other dominant colour there. 'Drop to the floor.' 'Dogs, attack, attack!' It was clear enough this time around, that he took out the gun and managed to take a great shot in the gut before the other slammed him off the stairs. The force of the blow threw him off by the side, luckily for his spine but his chest was red under the clothes and there was a shout. A wail of pain followed but the man had followed. Where's the gun, where's the gun? Maloy tasted mercury in his blood before coming to his senses and being lifted up by his chest. What proceeded after was a sensation of burning and he was picked up and slammed back down, repeatedly while looking at one of the tear-eyed giants. He could've been his brother and how he laid there in the back, dead, while he was forced to smash him in concrete. Soon enough he'd lose it, the consciousness, the escalation of things. Right before the corner when Cones had arrived and there came the first two shots without a warning or a sound. He was disturbed as well from seeing all the blood and the state in which he had been. Neither did he look properly, nor did he aim well. Despite that, both of the negro's hands had been shot through but he wasn't rendered useless, and he leapt from his side and pushed his body against Cones, slamming him against the wall. That took him off the balance that he had enough time to get away. A brute, large enough to take down the section had escaped and there was nothing which could be done about it whatsoever. 'Follow him Cones, he's getting away.' 'You need medical attention.' 'I'll do fine, just get the other, he's in the room.' A sight alone would've given him something worth fighting for, but he could barely see his own shadow floating there. Without the foreknowledge in the matter, he'd be crippled there, with the little he had. 'Wait, what's the status on the other one?' 'He's dead, still bleeding from the shots, do you hear?' 'What about the one inside the room?' Little of which he was aware came into play, as he watched and listened, minutes after he went in, only to be met by Cones again. 'He's not here Maloy, he somehow escaped.' 'How could he have possibly escaped in the condition that he was in? There's not a single a chance he made his way through.' 'I've already told you, he's not there. Now, I think you suffered some sort of concussion and broke a few ribs amongst the way. We need to get you some to a medic as soon as possible, do you understand me? I need a sign to know whether or not you understand me.' Without a doubt, the closest thing to a confirmation as it might've been was the way he spat a great deal of blood out of his mouth. It was a long way back to the nearest ward and people's disdain had become widespread around the town. Without the fairness of chance, they had just come and murdered a man on their shift, even though they hadn't been called at the scene. Some information would have to be given to the chief and both of them stood in danger of losing their badges, but nothing could compare with what they saw. 'Did you take a good look at the man? The one who escaped?' 'Shut yer' trap, you need to conserve your strength.' 'No, no, just answer me.' 'I haven't seen the man, by the time I had arrived, he had been gone. There was nothing further I could do about it.' 'What of the room, did you see what was inside? The red, the black, the runes which had been drawn just about everywhere?' 'I know, I called them in to fill in for us?' 'Why did you have to go on through with it, I haven't told you, I haven't.' Perhaps something was indeed wrong with him. He felt his chest exploding, at least in the same manner one would have during a stroke. It could be that, he was young, he had been strong, he had lost his consciousness from the blows and that was the worst which had happened to him ever since the last case. The ward, now that was a strong word. He was left there, no visits allowed, for at least a few days. From the diagnosis, Cones was given a waiver to sign and had lost any temptation to bring him back to the section until he was properly taken care off. An empty room, this wasn't right. There had been a man there, inside, though he had dozed off because of the antibiotics he had been given, he could dazedly look around. He saw more than enough and wasn't in need for anything more. There, he had lost his chance to catch the man, who was free just as he was locked. 'Nurse, water, please.' 'Right away.' She was a young woman, all in white, wearing a small tag with the name Emille on it. Strange for a girl like her to be called that way, for she seemed sweet. Dark locks, golden-blue eyes, young, he had already thought of that and more. Something about her, how she helped him drink when he couldn't do it himself, taking the extra steps to get in close and hand him the pills. It made him feel too much at home for his own comfort, while there were crooks out there, in the dumps. Weird looking, swarthy, back-boned men, if so classified from a biological point of view. They were stroking their own beards off the bones and parts of human, another one had been kidnapped, to which there came no report off. 'Care, care, don't spread them.' From the top of the head, almost like a zipper, they removed their faces and revealed their magnificent incisors and the two-headed smaller mouths which hid inside. They ate what was left of the bones and toes, before returning to their deeper holes, under the bed and on the floor. Such a practice was well known. Though neither of them could explain it, there was a feeling as to be attributed to their ancestors, who had somehow survived for months or decades in worse conditions, walking through the foundation rather than act like normal people. This behaviour was thickly set inside their heads, and their bodies had evolved accordingly. Despite the fact that they might be hiding in the bodies of the other beings which they detested, their hands and legs had never been connected to the stolen torso. This allowed them to stretch them and climb unfathomable reachers through the system, and as their bodies revealed themselves as to be thin and weak, there was little chance of them being stuck. It was a matter of freedom and chance, this was to be their dance in many other ways at least. This would come as no surprise, but they entered through openings which had been left there way before their arrival. The entire city had been designed for creatures like them to roam freely, unseen, and as it happened, so they have. Worse than that were the ones who had looked like men, in all act and appearance but of eyes. Such creepily bizarre they were, bulging on and pushing some sort of spades as to approach in the darkest manner. Even their walks reflected something vile but neither man in a crowd or otherwise could explain what exactly was wrong with it. Perhaps that pulsating bubble which formed if you started too much at it. Something really didn't bode well, too many secrets tied to such a creature which might not even look you in the eye. And they were there, out in the streets, ready to spread their bodies and revealed themselves and nothing but a spreadsheet of organs which might've dragged itself out of some primordial era in the mud or in the sea. Something of a habit yet again inherited from some prime ancestor which had reigned farther away in their evolutionary bile, the sort of which had never truly left in any shape or form. It only made the creature more dependable on its hosts. Some could see how it stalked others, then turned away at the first sign of sight. No one could find it out if it were for it to survive, that was mostly the only concern which might've been addressed in any sort of way. For they had formed a council, somewhere in the dark. It was a hole one of them had dug up, leading to a boiler's room, at an abandoned floor, where there was more. Inside the boiler, there had been men's bodies abandoned as the previous resident had taken great care to get rid of the evidence. The rest of the underground structure had been somewhat sealed from any possible intruder which may find he was there. Now there would be none who could disturb them in any other shape than theirs, no eye to lay on them, just crisp bodies as a bonus to eat. 'Don't eat it yet, wait for the others.' The small juvenile growth looked primal in some way. Its claws looked as if they were just the right length, the mouldy back and the extra eye put its face as something below anything one would like to lay eyes upon. Maybe there had been a mix, the way it hid its one small knife, ready to jump at the throat of any intruder which had passed.

After all, the three of them were small. 'Wait, wait, do you hear? Someone's coming, it's coming!' A curled pair of tied-together fingers pointed as some gravel which fell from the hole. It seemed as if the entire room shook, including the light above. Neither did they know what they were expecting to come from that entrance, if not the single most repulsive invader they could've encountered. It was one of the naked beings which hid in sight, wearing nothing but its own flesh, a sort of pseudo-pole of organs and veins which crawled inside, surrounded by a transparent layer of protection. From the colour, it had become reddened and a few deeper shades as well. Not entirely black by any means whatsoever, but just enough to creep inside anyone's guts by means alone. Such was it that there was a legitimate interest which hadn't made them expel it from their meeting, a curiosity which elected the being and its strange ways. How it rolled to the side and seemed to have tied itself to the wall, rooted inside the dirt. 'Not a small talker, not one, one.' 'Shut up, don't disturb our guest, others might be showing up, if you don't shut up, bad things will happen to us.' Indeed, to say the least, there wasn't any doubt of the fact that they were sealed there. By the world and others, something crept, more dreadful, bigger and stronger. From the head that entered, that of some long and deformed femur-shaped head, there just pulled back two openings which revealed hidden eyes. It had a long pair of necks which shoved themselves in the head like spears, leaving the appearance of someone who might've been impaled and caught to suffer. A pseudo pair of wings were attached to two bony hands and before it came into the light, it revealed the body of some filthy skin-like rodent, which fell upon itself and had formed mazes of the folded flopped cover on its body. There were no greetings and the three mongrels could do nothing else but watch how it came past them and suddenly opened one of the boilers with its beak. From inside, it pecked upon only one of the corpses and dragged it to a corner and started devouring on. To say the least that there was some sort of chaos inside the room now, that would be less than helpful. 'Ask it if it speaks. Go near it, talk to it, do something for it.' The both of them pushed the pig-faces little snogg, with his lame legs and outward pushing toes, it came to nothing more than a stare. Such was that the creature stopped eating and suddenly started at the living member of their clan. For a single second there, it cowered in a thought that it might've been eaten alive right in front of its fellows. Which was less than acceptable, an utmost shame to die that way and suffer forever after? An evilness crept and it had desired to grow into something much bigger and violent and catch its beak in-between his arms and crush it. For a moment there, it almost came to believe it. But that stopped, as it returned to eating from the crisp corpse. 'Have you come here for a discussion?' 'I shall speak only when the others are present, until then we'll speak no word.' A voice like that could only do worse to your thoughts, not to mention the damage it had inflicted upon its vileness, which might've been called a brain. But that was neither here nor there. There were others, were they? Have they not a clue of the fact that there was already somewhat of a shortage in the space? Outside, there were more of the dreadful things happening, now that the two cities untied. For once, the dirt on every side, as well as the sky and the air had been somewhat overtaken by a level of radiation and dark poisoning for no explainable reason. It was even more clear by the fact that their tap water had become tainted and the image of the destroyer, farther in the land had become more clear for the commoners who hadn't trained their eyes to see. A small price to pay but no one could be bothered by it in the least. There were dire problems at hand and some tainted turned tower was the least of their concerns. No longer was the city theirs. Now the denizens had become the intruders and were no welcome to the new order under which everyone was to act. For starters, there was the indecency the women displayed on the streets, of a better look, the men would've thought them mad. How they displayed themselves in the midst of chaos was nothing less of being short of ambiguously peculiar. There were others there, afraid and alone, prone to be looked down upon. Mostly the ones wearing their bee-hive protectors, or some modified versions of them in the midst of daylight.

Under that circumstance, they were spraying toxins over plants and they were making sure no one would get off easily after they were done with them. Not only would the toxins go through dirt and travel straight into the foundation and the wood but they would also create fumes inside the houses. 'That's enough of that, you've got no right to be doing this. What you're getting through with this here is short of an attempt to.' Before he could finish stumbling, the long metal shaft suddenly raised itself and pointed at the man, while it was still spraying nonetheless. The result was short-lived as he screamed, seeing himself rot in front of a pair of melting eyes which belonged to no one else other than him. He hadn't screamed but stumbled down the stairs and fell. Soon, he was dragged once the spray had paused and he pushed the man into the hole that had crept in the dirt. A proper fertilised, as the like of which there had never been. And it looked like this one worked alone, no one else around appeared to have accompanied this lone crazed corruptor. But there were troublemakers as well as on their side. 'Murder, help!' She quickly covered her mouth and snapped her window shut as soon as she saw his attention turned. There'd be a short span of running from where she was to the straight door where eight locks would immediately be turned in order to prevent entry. It was an invasion and they were boiling with rage, those who looked from above, down at what had remained of their neighbour. 'No one will allow you to get away with that, they'll catch you and there'll be a lot to pay down there, once they lock you in that small cage and throw rocks at you, damn lunatic!' There was some provocation, at which he would respond. The door was open after all and the woman from the opposite building had given him nothing but the perfect idea. But for a moment, before he went on the stairs, he lifted the cowl only to reveal what laid under. A face which had almost looked to have been affected by his own toxin itself and somehow managed to survive. Severely skewered, in a way that it should've been done at an early age because it looked as if it grew into it after he had been given the treatment. The bones grew wrong and pushed the skull into pieces and some of them stood where they shouldn't anatomically be. For his cheek-bones were far apart and lowered, the teeth had been taken and pushed away, leaving only the bottom ones, which had been sharpened and cracked to the point where one would think he had eaten a rock. He grasped from something in his throat, a tube of some kind, the pair which would've been attached to a patient to help to breathe. After going ahead and pulling it entirely and abandoning it on the street, he started climbing and pushing through. There'd be no stopping to him in any sort or shape whatsoever. With everything unlocked, after memorising where the man was, he went ahead to cover his grotesque appearance and came inside. It seemed as if the toxic had taken its initial effect, which discoloured everything in sight until there was nothing but dead colours. Such a shame, that there were worms growing in the wood, walls, even one in the lightbulb. He hated the worms, they were most rubbish of creatures. And these ones weren't normal either, as they could grow just about anywhere and just about in anything. If luck is your woe, as one child had screamed inside one of the apartments, one could grow a few of them inside the brain. Directly going mad as far as one could go away and see it away. More likely, as it had been, neither of them had ever witnessed such woe. It was some sort of miracle that they were still there on their feet, at the top of the building, two young people, having witnessed what was going on, have decided it had been too long. So long have they suffered together and the world was at an end. Despair was in their eyes and they would never be seen apart again. It was a fitting end then, once they gave in and let themselves fall into the abyss. That was a hole in the ground which had disintegrated from the taint and left some kind of black legacy which wouldn't last. He went up the stairs, found the right floor and guessed at the door, which might've been less of right. What was important was the fact that he had taken a great look at the assailant, the criminal, the one who committed one of the worst offences known to man, insults, for they drove him mad. There was no other way to stop them from echoing inside his head and he remembered them. It had driven him mad and he was sick, turning the spray on him for a bath before pointing it at the door and seeing it melt and crack. Wood wouldn't have to act that way but with enough exposure, it turned into soft sap and let way to a view of utter failure and despair. With this, it was clear that the man had ended himself way before he had started on the stairs. More so over the way he had taken his life, multiple cuts and pills, his entire room looked like some kind of sabbath of ritual blood practices. There was a twitch. As soon as it was noticed, the spray went on him and entered directly through his mouth and bloodstream. It didn't kill him but left him looking like a crazed wingless bird, his face had contorted into a mad beak which went through his belly. Worse. There had been a flash, and he wasn't in the building anymore. Neither of the two of them was. Tubular halls of metal, now it was the chance. With the slight illusion that they rolled and twisted, there came the supreme distraction which lasted for as long as the stopper. With little on its mind, there came the trail, an utmost failure of woe. It looked as if that there came some sort of disorientation from the place. It made things harder, being far too dismissive of any attempts of trying to chase it and put it down. For the ones which crawled squeaked and made other noises, trying to get the attention of anyone around who may be willing to help. The place hadn't looked completely abandoned by any means, there were lights, but the rooms were rolling as well. One of the doors opened while the time had come for one of the sides to slowly become the floor. It fell through it and ended up being caught into one of the rooms, in a system of moving bridges, dirty and unclean. Where had the cleaners been and did it reek of the most dreadful scents known to man? He was crawling, fleeing, followed by some territorial pair of moving mules which laid on the wall. There was a pause in their moves but clearly, as much as one cared to look and see, they were trying to get his attention. At least in their direction, there had been a disconnect, something of ascent and woe. It would be clear that those who'd fear the sensation of being lost in there were most of all the ones who ended in death. Now they laid as corpses, many holding dearly on the twisting bridges. Somehow it could leap from the bridge to bridge, under the eyes of the mules and the one stumbling idiot who couldn't help himself to stand erect despite his working feet. He had wanted, and prepared to spray him one last time, as to finish the job, with little outside help, he was being mixed. Long bars of metal went through the bridges, it was the thing which helped them stabilise and somehow adapt to the constant turning. Though that didn't prevent them from moving higher and lower, being unable to become fully stationary, but achieve some form of it nonetheless when it came to the direction. It tried to mutter some new words. It failed and stood down there as it to defeat some sort of dark type of madness, a decrepit sadness which had overcome its malnourished mind. For, the mules bore sounds, they were distracting, the metal boxes which they were opened as to reveal, some weird thing which bore no appeal. A kind of peculiar metal, the liquid in form, which didn't spill. From it, there came most dreadful shapes, faces, eyes, poor imitations, which suddenly closed on themselves as to hide the laughter. Such mocking would go unpunished, for at least as long as there was nought to say otherwise. 'Please make him leave.' He spoke after trying his best to appease the strange mules. There wasn't even a certainty until the spray started coming and mixing with the metal. It took a while for the exposure to come into full effect but there wasn't any doubt behind it, whatever the material was made off, be it a rare metal or not, it was completely affected by the concoction of decay. As they metal melted, there came the screams of men which had been trapped inside. With their shouts roaring, there was a sudden stop to the constant rolling around of the tubular hall. Everything was still and for once he could see thing properly without being distracted or pushed out of his way to follow. He had to admit to himself that there was some dread tied to them, the ones who seemed to have been trapped inside. There was no dumb being in his head, only by his act did he understand what needed to be done. Yet the creature first, it would have to be put out of its misery despite. 'Ygaaaaarr.' His mouth came and left that broken attempt once he witnessed it leaping from one of the bridges below on the ground. That came rather a wall, as it slammed in the right place. With this at least he had the higher superiority, he couldn't be attacked by riposted against. He sprayed the bridges now instead, right above him, looking how mere splashes came and turned some of the features on its back into the mud. 'He brings ruin, makes him leave the place.' The plea had failed again and now, the crawl was closing to an end. Soon enough there'd be a wall, a stop, something for which there'd be no other end than his. That would be where he ended, surrounded by this sickness of steel, watched how he passed by two mules that couldn't feel. He was sick, through the tubes and the holes he couldn't puke unless he desired to choke on his own, but was it that bad of an idea, other than the alternative? It wasn't what he felt but the wall, the end, that was close. He could see, almost see, rather, the shape of a black door, a dark entrance which would drag him away. And it was there, in the right shape, the form which didn't bother. As soon as it appeared to sight, even the mocking mules backed away as if they were afraid. This would be his opportunity but he was running out of bridges to block the constant spray of acid which spread around, tainted. With little in mind, he wouldn't choose to grind his nerves into dust without a good reason. Little else to his name would stand as treason. With only inches away, it stopped once it bumped against the door, without the height and the hands, he was cursed. And there it stood behind, like some sort of man of little worth, holding his apparatus in hand. The valve was turned and now it came. One hand, which came from the black door, he couldn't see the rest of the body but what he did see was the fright. The shock which prevented his assailant from moving, the foe who saw the rest of his life flashing as the hand came and crushed his head in a mere fraction of a glance. It was shocking how it fell, headless without bleeding. Perhaps it was his own spray which went off and started melting itself as well as a canister, but once the door had opened, the hand and its owner disappeared. Instead of staying and being caught by the dreadful thing, he saw this as an opportunity to get away. There had to be a way for some kind of reversal, there would be nothing to live for if life continued that way. A rubbish creature, the abomination, which already felt the effects of the state his body was left in. Bones becoming flaccid, organ failure soon to come. He felt the cold water under him, as well as the splashes and made a lot of noise. Was it there or had it left? Matter of fact was that he couldn't see well, especially since his head had been thoroughly twisted in a way which prevented him from looking forth. Cursed to roam, splash in the sea, soon he'd drown, as soon as it had become deep enough to be pulled below. A dreadful curse thrown at it as well, for he realised he could breathe there, in the worst conditions, he managed to survive, at least for the time being. Not much could be said either about the dread in which they had been thrown, the others in town who saw the opening of their neighbour, the giant room of metal which stood out of the building like a metallic thorn, disturbingly so. Without hope, there'd be none to look away. They were silken by their toes, many named and unable to match any of their foes. It came as no surprise that this disturbance drew near other degenerates as well as connoisseurs of malignity, the throng of metal which hadn't escaped sight. That was the type of thing which never went away. More approached. 'Stay there, don't come any closer, this is private property.' They were disgusting, the wretched twists of mankind. Despite the fact that they bore some resemblance, they had nothing in common, just the woe, the sickness in their head prevented them from having any kind of meaningful relationship. It was over, he would be overrun by them in moments. Disgusting tiny beings which didn't belong in the human world, they would drag him with their assorted faces, once they revealed that their teeth were as long as overgrown fingernails. They had been used to wrap and pull at the hand, pushing back and forth and trying to bite it off. Once some of the colour went off their faces, it was time to admit the dread they felt, the coldness of their feet. It was something of a wrong way to look upon what they were committing, with a pair of them who were pointing their firearms at them. Before there came any reason, two shots followed, straight into the heads of the little pests. If there had been another, he strode away, leaving the man somewhat unharmed. 'Stay away, you hear? Call for some kind of backup before the night draws near, do you understand? What in the?' From one of the corners, the alleys, the openings, whatever it might've been, came some chanting pile of the transparent discoloured scum of ooze, made of bubbles, chanting in some sort of tongue. It had two human legs which carried it and two human head, while the body disproportionately pushed itself out and dripped below. A mere look of sickness there, once the first shot came it. That much revealed that there was no ooze, merely an illusion as it bled the same and flapped like some sort of grease and fat, the layered body of which crept along. Another shot, somewhere in the back. 'Get inside, now.' 'Yes, I'll go, right away.' He would follow soon enough if chance gave him one to react to. But for the time being, he felt as if there'd be nothing for him to do, nothing to strive for, just the mere friction of it all which disturbed him. By the time he was inside, there were a few of them there, chanting in different tongues but it was obvious that they meant the same thing, some kind of revenge it seemed. Every neighbour in the building had been woken up and brought to woe. It was even more obvious to them that there came some alteration outside. Neither of them seemed to be set onto something, or have a clue whether or not they should burn it or breakthrough like some sort of siege. Despite their delegation, the sound of sirens pale with joy, as they approached, at the mark of the abandoned site, had forced them into hiding. It was an eeriness which drove them to think about their brothers who had fallen before. Caught into the same trap of a false sense of security rather than trust their own senses, no more. The weather was dry and the metal throng still laid there, like some piece of a machine which somehow lost itself in the distant past. A scream came from inside, seemingly the people had problems of their own. Old cars, dark in appearance, almost leathery, even the small device which made the sound was ancient in looks. Not that it was either of their concern what it looked like, rather what was going to happen as soon as their opened fire. Where were them? 'Show yourselves, you're surrounded, there's no point in hiding there. We can see the trail of blood, some of yours had been hurt, isn't that right? From the looks of it, maybe four or five, is that right? Am I hitting the mark? Give me something at least.' There was silence, at least an unrelentless one which crept inside and refused to go unnoticed. It would've been considered some sort of miracle for what happened was unheard of and unseen. One of the wicked looking ones, wearing all black, a veil, seemed to have grabbed some kind of leathery looking vileness. Neither of them had acted like that before, coming to ask for help. 'Slowly, take it slowly.' It felt like the end of a siege and they had been the breakers. Most of those who peered and looked around were too afraid to approach, but the one that came had brought one of the small twisted ones who had been presumed dead after being shot. It was clearly in pain, having most of the fur around its body already lost in the wind. There was even some desire to push their knees away and crush the thing before it showed any sign of coming back to life. This was going to evolve into a difficult encounter by the likes of which there'd be no way out. At least no easy way from the way this was displayed. Though they laid in hiding, he could see that most of them had prepared for something of the likes. Soon enough they'd come and spread around the entire section of town and try taking as many lives with them as they could. Without a doubt, at least there was still hope for the likes of which no one else might've survived. As young as he were, he made took the right obscure choice, rather than to give in, he turned the clicker on himself and firmly pressed it. The release was soft and easy by the ear. When the chance came, the creature abandoned its offspring-like moving corpse and made it for the door. Now it was time for them to come out of their hiding spots and join in the massacre. It felt like night came early, for the sky was putrid, they had been afraid. By the time they managed to arrive in as many and as wide a houses, the doors had been blocked, stopping their unwelcome entry. 'Let me in before they come, I'll break you, I'll take your throat out, release the door!' Desperation would be little said, for the night had come and even the grotesque feared what was to come. For, in reality, they were weak, and the streets had to be clean, even with the invasion on the way. Everything became colder and silence arrived all of the sudden. Those who were stalking, slowly appeared, moving with their emptiness in sight. It felt like this would be the end of them, for they came outside and made trouble. The light was flickering and the first ones came to a charge. It was against those bodies and their disgusting way of spewing those liquids which would melt anybody into the primordial thing for which they belonged. It looked like a slaughter, though it was not. Rather than call it so, this was nothing but a way to clean the streets and the taint, even the impurity which had melted or had tried replicating them had nothing on the pure concentration which they bore. 'Make it for the alleys, we need to retreat."They're here, we cannot."The voice ended once there came the first flash of spittle.

Nothing but organic matter got affected, henceforth, the pool of which they had belonged with had gone through different changed. After the mixture, they had become some sort of blood-like pool before either being absorbed by the nearby plants or become gaseous and dissipate. Everything near laid undisturbed, but it was time and no one else had the nerve to get out there and take care of them. It would be a shame for the men who were outside at night, for everyone knew it wasn't safe to ride. Was he new? A traveller? Tourist or some man who had stumbled in the wrong place and the worst of time? Once he went from the highway and straight into some random street, he had managed to walk over one of them, which followed him by going straight into a tree. There was fear now. An accident on the road, his bloody nose and forehead bumped. The windows cracked, as well as the side mirrors and even his wheels had melted for some blasted reason. 'Oh no, what have I done?' He couldn't see himself past that point of looking back, he would be aware of something being wrong if he had his senses with him. But some of them had been lost during the crash. At least as he looked inside himself and saw something worth, there was still time to do something. Something. No time for that, he had been made aware of the inhabitants of the town, and their appearances. One which had come and started slamming its long slithering hands and slightly duplicated face against the glass. It must've had a soft spot there, for there was nothing it could do to break through. He was caught there, suddenly caught by another one of them. It came clear that they blew what was left of their deposits and poisoned with the least amount of venom the body of the creature. It fell below and started melting, leaving him to stare at it from inside. From his perspective at least, he knew that it would try getting in. Not only was he hurt but there wasn't a chance that it would pass on the opportunity of taking him after noticing how vulnerable he was. He'd be guarded there relentlessly, while he needed to receive medical attention as soon as it was possible. Minutes passed, time's abroad. From the side of his skull he was bleeding, just as well as from one of his ears. A ring came into his head, a dizziness, the belt prevented him from breathing but he was unable to get it off. Even in the broken rear mirror and with the fuzzy sight, he could see the one his car had hit getting up. It followed. They would watch him struggle in pain for minutes rather than give him a fair chance. It wasn't as if anywhere else it had been better, as a matter of fact, it had been worse. How they crawled and abandoned one another, pushing the slower ones behind, not only the ones in the streets but those who tried hiding under the shade of the tall buildings. No one was safe as long as they remained outside, no one at all. And soon enough, there'd be no chance for either of them to make a go for it. No first-aid kit or anyone who had been trained by any means whatsoever in the medical field. His head had been bashed far beyond mere awfulness and distress. There was some single separation which came from the little piece of mind he was given in that short span of time. Without a way out, bleeding, apparently pierced by a piece of glass which had found its way through his chest during the crash. With little less, he could've done more, some things might've been changes, why had he come down his road? He couldn't look at it thoroughly at all, there was no way. It went evenly through his bones, he wasn't aware any longer and then, a flash. More often than ever, it had appeared at a moment which was less than opportune. From the side and once the heaviness flattened the car and the area around it, there laid a tunnel which leads below. More than that, a connection which broadened some kind of link which could go ahead while being unexplainable to the current watcher. A foot upon the other, yet inside, there were no circumstances for a man to walk. They were there with him in the dark. He hadn't suffered anything worse than he had. Then he had thought. It was for her that he rushed through the city, her mother. It was that eve's that she had been taken ill and there was little he could do when they took her away. She was on an oxygen mask, barely living, having suffered through. He couldn't see a thing but felt the cold air below, knowingly looking at the abyss through a hole. From the point of fall, there'd be no way out, not with what he had suffered, not with those behind him. 'Soon enough we'll meet again.' He thought, in greener fields, where I won't regret. Despite not being much, he fell, never to be heard from again. Outside, it looked like any curbed tube of metal which had been reinforced with some strange material. Neither had the rain stopped nor had anyone outside managed to survive. There were the few left but they had at least been partially hit, which meant they had become dead time-bombs, of which reaction went ahead to have them suffer. It'd be a miracle to have them pay any attention to what he specialised in. A little more dreadful to be sure of it, more so than expected, but it was so nonetheless. One couldn't disrupt the continuation of the fear and peculiarity they instilled into the community. Their demise came as promised, their dirty settlements destroyed. Even as the sky darkened and coloured in a moving array of many shades and the stars looked rather foreign, there was no way to stop their reach. More so since their reach now extended to both of the outer reaches of the cities, even the new wing. Poor men, or those who looked even close to being humanoids were taken by surprise as these strange creatures suddenly appeared and started pouring their gaseous inflammatory biles. No screams could encompass what was going on there, but there was a certainty at which no one dared look away. 'What are we to do if suddenly they decide it's time for them to make their way inside and finish what's left of us?' 'If that happens we'll lower ourselves down and offer our bodies I presume. What do you think it'll happen? We have no force or anything to fight them, that's night after night we're talking about. And look how clean the city has become. All of the sudden those invaders have received what was worth for them, it was exactly what they deserved. If some contribution had to be given or said, nothing would turn out well. He was the lone cop in the area, who hadn't doubted that his partner was either dead or missing in action. 'Shall we wait them out then?' 'Only if you're willing to do it until morning because they won't sooner disappear.' 'How come I haven't encountered them previously during my night shifts?' 'Well, that's something I can't explain myself well either. It's only that they seem to appear in the places where the biggest concentration of people seems to be.' 'Crowds at night might be disastrous in the past. What was left for them, at least was to wait, for the better or worse, there was little which either of them could do. Rather, he had grown tired and little comfort laid in there. 'Come with me, I've got an extra bunk bed which you may be interested in.' The watching neighbours had already gone away or looked as if they had lost whatever drove them out of hiding. He had been taken by the arm and helped on his feet. His partner was out there while he was inside and by the sounds of it, that was over. 'I wouldn't want to be a disturbance, I mean, I could sleep on the floor if you're willing to lend me a pillow.' 'Don't be ridiculous, you'll do no such thing, just trust me, we'll do fine together.' There was a mutual nod, before entering his humble abode. Outside, by now there was silence, all across the city, where the eeriness had extended while little doubt remained. No one was left alive, no one who lived outside. Certainly, some of the taints had remained, but there was no explanation of how they had achieved it before the reach of light when all of them had vanished or simply disappeared. One more distaste was the fact that those metal structures remained where they were, with no exception, there wasn't any other way to deal with them, not the one through the top, nor the one on the bottom. And there were others, hidden through parts of buildings which were more than hidden to the common eye. One of these days, they were more than aware that they would wake up, never to see daylight any longer. The rain had stopped a long time ago and what remained of it, in the veil of the coming dark were the clouds of winter which were working their way to bring snow. It would get cold, at least from that. Something had to be brought to the attention of the common knowledge, as it had become obvious that the snow-flakes were not white. Something in their composition and that of the damn thing had become the most peculiar thing of all. It was a colour of red, switching between brightly so but when it reached the ground, it darkened. A horrible image to look upon, at the bloody snow would spread around, there wasn't any stopping from reaching the ground. From inside, there came the first man with their lances as to clean, what had already clean up the roads where others have been trying to get through. It was quite bizarre how it suddenly happened without them being aware, a right thing at that nonetheless, as more came and did approach. Near the central square there laid the tower, which had become an enigmatic thing to behold. 'Look at it, it wasn't there the last couple of days when I visited this side, as a matter of fact, I've never seen it in seasons or the decades from what I could remember.' 'What are you implying then? That someone brought it here?

A tower out of all?' 'No, no, that's not it, I think it came from somewhere but I can't explain, from below maybe, somewhere in its hiding. It must be there, I can't explain how one like that could suddenly appear without remark.' 'It would be slow, more than so. People weren't busying themselves enough with the little they knew. Their hopes were high but not higher than that tower and its complementary piles of snow which had made their way on its slabs.' 'Why don't you enter it then? What's stopping you?' 'I? I should enter? Sunny, I think you'd make a better one to get through since you're so much younger and far stronger.' Most people around appeared to agree. The lad had become a man, with his brow high and walk as slow as he held himself to the ground. Without a doubt, he was at another league than others, at least from the standpoint of being in his prime. His physique was at least bourgeoisly made. One single door which seemed as if it wasn't even a door. It was a single scale, a piece of stone which was missing. He had to pull them out one by one and leave them by the side as if to make his own grand entrance whilst entering. He continued pulling them out while going out until the point where he felt no longer sure of himself about what laid there. The difficulty wasn't worth mentioning, as he had become aware that there was little to no possibility whatsoever to pull more of them aside. They were hardened and impish in nature, after seeing that some had jagged edges which would cut through the skin while others had been rounded and slipped from his hand. With the snow around, it almost seemed that they were eating it from around them once they had been placed on the surface of the street. It was even more obvious by the fact that they produced the heat constantly. Once there was enough of a hole, it was time for him to enter it. He hadn't made it wide enough to walk slowly, but rather, a roundish kind-of way in which he could climb through and see what there was about. The people which had gathered watched the lad, the brave young man and his senselessness through which he plunged in there. From what had happened in the past days, and this being no exception, everyone expected this to be a mistake, or some mad choice, the order of which everyone wished they could take it back. He had been young, there was a chance for him to have a better life rather than be wasted in there. At least most hoped he would be well enough, in the warmth. 'I don't know what to say, there's nothing in here I can see. If only I had.' 'Her laddie, take this flashlight, you'll need it more than I.' 'Thank you ser, I'll be grateful to ye.' 'Just take care and don't take any risks you don't suppose you can take.' His red lock had flown through the air before going in there. The distance just outstretched their line of sight after he began walking and all of the sudden he was lost. Once the light was directed, he saw that there was a floor below. It was made of stone and he could touch it well. The cold had been gone, at least that was great, gone in its whole entirety. But he still got the chills which accompanied the cold grasp, the lack of air. Someone was there with him. 'Anyone there? Have you come to follow me through? I don't think I said anything about wanting to be accompanied.' 'Over here.' A voice said, in a spectral tone and somewhat of a queer accent. It felt as if the owner of that voice would be repellant in the worse of cases. He was about to follow once he saw, there was an opening, another one, leading to the other side. Yeah, that must be it, I only came into circles and got mixed up. They even took the time to almost seal me inside as a slimy banter. Good men. He thought, with a smile which followed the sound of that young woman who called upon him. At least from her likes alone, he would try to follow like a hound after a bone. By the time he was there, he started pulling rocks again, one by one until he'd be ready to make the leap on the other side. From that point alone there was nought but cold. What was highly disturbing inside the tower was the combination of empty space and the heaviness of the weather which came in. There was little denying to the fact that people came to their senses, the man had been gone. At least from one of the sides, when he got to the other, only to find a world just like his, a mirrored which had one flaw, and only one. Something had twisted it and turned it around. After his first step inside this new and bizarre world, it suddenly dropped a few centimetres below the tower's line, simply because his weight alone exceeded its capacity. Some looked from far away and said no word. It took a few moments of looking at them and at their walking patterns to realise that it wasn't the world which had been twisted but him. The man was weirdly out of place. He was sticking out and didn't know any better. With each step, it seemed as if the world fell below a few inches at a time, thoroughly going down until it would be pushed out of sight. Looking behind, it seemed as if the tower was far deeper and stood way higher than he had anticipated as well. 'Stop walking, stop, just stop there, not a step further, please, can't you see you're the reason this happens? Great, great, stay this way until we get the proper things and figure out what's going on.' 'What's happening? I used, I've been inside the tower and.' 'That's enough, there's no need to worry about a thing at the moment, we'll take care of everything you need.' He seemed to have carried on a smile, a tiny bit nervous but he couldn't be blamed for that. Being in the presence of one who caused earthquakes by simply walking, even a low mass, wasn't a daily occurrence. A crowd had gathered but they felt the distant cold people felt while looking at a prisoner in a jail. He wasn't allowed to walk, even too much talking appeared differently so, that it could progress to being dangerous if he had said the wrong things. 'How much longer am I supposed to stay this way? My feet are tired and I'd like to come inside and share a cup of hot tea.' 'You heard what they said, there's no need for that before something's being done about this peculiarity.' 'Oi, don't get any closer to the tower, he's the one who came from its inside, can't you see it's dangerous?' Indeed it did appear so, from the likes of which, neither man nor animal could deny what had happened there. For he had grasped a scent of freshly baked muffins and did forget himself a moment. In an instant, it was almost as if everyone there in the crowd bowed down to him, the crooked man in standing. They fell and couldn't move for a bunch of seconds before he stopped and held himself high again. 'I'm terribly sorry ma'am, this wasn't my intention at all, I smelled food and I lost myself a moment there.' Which couldn't be explained by reason alone, he had a thing for them, but neither of them raised up for the time being. An entire square of men and women sitting down, unmoving as the result of his having grasped the scent of a bakery. 'I'm here, I'm. What have you done? Why is everyone down there, you mad caricature of a man?"This isn't my fault, I, they were fine a second ago, I swear."You moved, haven't you? You had to move your feet and have them all slain, didn't you? What's wrong with you?They were good people, good people, far too few of them left in this world. What have you done?"He had stumbled with his words before but this was no explanation, there'd be none for it, for this mistake.'I tried but I couldn't help it."Murderer!"The old sleeveless, stain-coated man had pulled out what he had come with. Apparently, there hadn't been another idea for this to end, as the man hadn't had a chance to prove he could change.Was the original plan to force him to return to his tower slowly? Because that wasn't an option anymore.As far away as it seemed, his steps had become deadly and there was no return.'I'm sorry but you won't go there, it's only going to get worse for us if you're allowed to live. No, no, not a step, not a sudden move, I swear it, there'll be nothing stopping me from carrying on with it."I didn't want to come here, please, lower your gun. There's no need for this to end with bloodshed now."I think it's too late for that, wouldn't you agree? You could've stood there in your spot until I came to end it. One life in exchange for many."Now you're doing it to save your own."No, I'm doing it so others won't have to suffer as you push our cities into dust, our creations, our humanity."But I'm but a man as well.'The shot was finally fired at him, unexpectedly so. It bounced back, and broke through the barrel, pushing pieces of its shaft through the man's neck, as well as what was left of the bullet.'Stop, don't move, don't.'His hand had dropped the gun and ended up being lost, whatever was left of it, in the pile of corpses. Now, as he was trying to desperately stop himself from bleeding immediately from his expunged throat, he realised that he was done for.A major artery had been pierced. There wasn't any way out for him and he knew that there wasn't a way to end the young red haired thing that had come from the tower.'I didn't ask for this.'He said, all tear-jerked, with his hands around his face and eyes. The first steps were the hardest, even though he knew what would happen, he couldn't leave the man to suffer for long.He ended like the rest which left him in a difficult place, after seeing that the entrance or the exit, the hole into the tower was far beyond his reach. It would just happen that sooner he would reach the point of no return rather than be ready for anything else.What happened next came over him, as no one would've thought. He grabbed the gun and looked at the barrel. If it happened for it not to work outside, but what remained of it wasn't even functional enough even if he had a bullet to push down the smashed barrel.'This place then, I guess I have no other choice but to follow and see.'Closer than before to the scent, he felt the work being pushed with each step. Hopefully, the food was still well, for he had no desire to consume something which would happen to below-standard or even less than that.He would carry on with the little of his will, which sent shivers down his own spines. For, in the store he entered, it was revealed that everyone was below the floor, head tilted behind knees. Strangely, the food wasn't destroyed. As a matter of fact, he could have everything he desired, pies and cakes, and small brownies, juice and syrup, pancakes which had been freshly made.Before he was done, he realised that they tasted wrong. Not that there was something wrong with the baked goods, but rather, the scend of the dead around almost permitted inside the place and the food. Sick by that, he went ahead and left, but as soon as he slammed the door behind of him, the bakery distorted and broken on all sides. It pushed in itself and pulled the nearest corpses on its walls. The looks left it there, standing like some sort of altar fueled by the heat of the stove.'Why have you left Fallon?"I had to do it, how do you know my name?"It could be heard like some sort of shout, coming from overhead, straight out of the hole in the tower. He wasn't sure himself what to make out of it, but the voice was familiar.'We grew up together, I'm Sean, remember?"I do remember you, the boy who broke the window trying to snick out of class. There was a numbing silence before that, it seemed as if Fallon was checking to see if anyone was alive. There could be little avoidance to them, henceforth it would be better if he ended them fast than to damage them with the vision of the dead men below his feet. 'I can't hear you well. "Well, I can't either and my throat isn't helping much. "May I come out as well. "Don't try coming on the other side Sean, it's far too dangerous. Once you're here, there's no return, you're simply stuck. 'The voice had been gone for a while, to the point he wasn't sure whether or not he was still there listening or not. 'I'll leave now, but I may come back at another time, whatever you do, don't cross to my side, if you're still there. 'To his surprise, his feet had already gone on a hike and before he stopped walking, he looked at the corpses and how much pressure had been applied to them. Flattened to no end, even their blood seemed to have been crushed out of their bodies and vanished. It was then that the floors had been covered, as by carpets, organic carpets which have been human at one time in their lives. Looking around at it after realising that he was responsible for it made him feel miserable and guilty for something he had not committed, especially by the ones that seemed to move their eyes. 'Grandfather. 'A woman stopped, her dress benignly pink, shone upon by a wasted brilliance the sun bore on her from the top of some celestial plane. In the midst of all, she didn't see her own reflection but that of a man covered by shadows. He remained with his back turned to the sun and seemed to have no recollection or not realisation of what happened, while she was on her knees weeping. Only one step and she's dead, joining her father and the network below. Was this the reason he was sent there, alone? "You should run while you still have the chance. I wouldn't enjoy seeing a pretty lady such as yourself end up like all the people here. 'A crackling of wood and steel took away both of their attention. The bakery, it was still in the process of shifting its gravity point on itself. With little in mind, he hadn't realised what he had done, or why it was so desperately pulling itself in from its all sides. That was getting even worse, for it started pulling others as well from both its right and its left. Fallon decided he wouldn't stay for longer there, to hear of the disturbance he had caused. Without realising where he was, it suddenly came to his mind that the woman was dead. She's been dead for the near few minutes he took the steps in whatever direction he mindlessly set himself towards. Everything was slowly being flattened, even beyond his reach and mind. The smaller animals took way longer but they'd get there. Why delay then? "Make way for me for I'm coming! 'No echo laid for his shout, only the sounds of his boots and the occasional scream of some unsuspecting affected person who was at the wrong time there alive. There was not the right place to be in any longer, as he had mentioned that to himself. Only dread and tears in his eyes as he went away with each step, pushing his only escape farther and farther above while he kept descending deeper until everything he knew was dark. Sean had finally reached the end and was the only one at the current time to have survived. The ordeal was how he said. 'I reached the other side after I decided to follow the light and he was there, surrounded by seas of corpses. "What did you say? Our lad was. "Trapped in there, as will any of you if you try walking in his footsteps. That way he went had no way of return. "But what if we get a rope, equipment, something to help him get back home? "That would be impossible, I'm afraid. 'He didn't sound spiteful in any sort of way, merely content, far too content for someone as young, he was talking about a friend after all. It seemed like the tower had claimed another one after all. Without a better way to deal with it, on the account of the witness, they had brought nothing more than a photo and a small table. A bunch of candles had been lit as well in his memory but that's where it ended, the lad was lost. During the eve of light, they had scattered around and suddenly went from sight, rather than follow any sort of pattern, they were gone. Neither of them had thought of the lad for some time now, speaking in terms of days and weeks. It felt as if he hadn't existed after all. Mostly because the tower seemed to have repaired itself and left only that one empty brick spot, through which a much colder wind blew ahead. From it, there came a pulling serpentine invisible coil which seemed to have taken Fallon's photo as well. There laid nothing to remember him by. 'Well, you can't cross the line now, can you? That's just something you can't do, it's preposterous, that's what it is. That's how it is, now step back or I'll put you back in your place.' A bulging sensation hadn't seemed as if it would leave, in the least out of his own desire to do so. People were walking around paying little mind to the man standing as a guard on the passage, he's drawn a line behind him and blocked anyone who came in sight. 'How would I know you're not covering in for your thuggish fellows while they're busy committing thievery.' 'I've already told you, ma'am, there's no one down there but the repair personnel, can't you see there's no light down there?' 'Look, I'm only trying to use the passage to get on the other side of the street, I can't go around, that would take far too long.' 'It's already taking too long because you're spending the time talking to me, isn't it?' 'Just let me go, I promise I'll be the only one. I even have a lighter I could use in order to avoid getting lost.' 'I've told you it is dangerous, why can't you get it through to your small skull?' 'She wasn't going to let go of it as long as she had a food close to being in. Even from her standpoint, she knew that a few steps inside would be all that she needed in order to make it to the other side and get out of his nose. For the time being anyway.' 'You're nothing but a brute, you know that? No decent fellow would be standing here harassing a woman in the midst of daylight.' 'Would you rather be down there where no one can hear you scream?' He lowered his voice immediately, as to avoid being heard by near-by passers. Rather pleased with himself, this six to seven feet tall man went on. 'Handled by other men that are much less considerate than I am.' 'That's... I will suffer no threat from you or anyone else. I shall inform.' Her eyes widened as soon as he stopped crossing his arms, no longer folding himself but rather set on being alert. One word and she would've been dragged inside, would she dare it?' 'Authorities.' She had only made the first step to turn around, rather pleased on the way she taunted the big fellow. Little sense accompanied that as she was grabbed from behind and taken in the round mouth of the tunnel. There was little there to it, nothing which would be thoroughly thought about. It wasn't even certain any longer whether or not anyone saw her being grabbed. With the light carrying on away, she saw the square distancing itself, up until the point where the cavalry had appeared. They had heard and seen, bearing lighters and flashlights. 'Light it up boys, I think we got company, don't we now?' By the time they reached the bottom, it was obvious that some change had come into effect. First and foremost, they had changed the structure and had managed to blow up the wall. It seemed as if the tunnel was connected to an entire system of underground structures. A deposit may be, or something of a set of vaults laid in the secret room by the tunnel. She was still held by the man, the only difference being that his conniving band was there, waiting for him, armed. 'We told you to stay put and stop anyone from coming here, what happened?' 'There was this woman and she started asking questions and telling me she'll report me to.' 'Aw shut your filthy mouth, we heard that part. I want to know why haven't you slapped her senses in already and came back below.' 'Don't you dare talk that way about her, you honourless scoundrel! I'll hear nought of it anymore.' 'And who are you then? Her boyfriend, maybe spouse? Look, we were having a great jig here before you and your friends came. I admire the fact that you came here unarmed, but it's quite irresponsible to provoke us any longer. I suggest you all turn around and leave, now, before this gets bloody.'He didn't look as if he was bluffing in any other way, he'd be ready to aim and release the trigger at any moment there. That wasn't the greatest of things.It wasn't important for the time being, to note on the fact that they felt as if there ceiling could collapse on them. A shared sensation of the will, which seemed to have crept inside the mind, from time to time. Even with that, it would be more of a reason not to get away and let her there with them. From the looks of which, they've already done enough to destroy much of the structural entirety which kept the whole place on its feet. Not only were the pillars gone, but also the cement and the big hole which had been hole was virtually expanding by the second.Something of it appeared to be spreading through stone. 'If anything goes bad, should we?'Yes, we will retreat in the vault chambers. As a matter of fact.'His voice had been raised and all of the sudden, he came to no recoil in his mind. There was little time and they all knew that one way or another, heading outside would have them chained and sent to the chair or the block. Neither of which were desirable alternatives to being rich.'Go ahead, I'm making sure none of you is leaving any longer, so start walking.'He pointed his small pistol at one of their heads, slightly a few inches to the right. Luckily for him, there had been no jitter and the man stood still, for one sudden move and he would've ended with one between his eyes.The first shot came and they realised that the men meant business.'Go ahead, we'll give her to you, as soon as we're in the vaults. No, I said, move!'A few steps by the time, they slowly switched positions and seemed to creep inside each other's mind. They have been messing around for far too long and it wasn't certain whether or not someone would notice. But for the time being, the plan was that. No one dared come inside, even with someone missing as the guard.Coming as the most likely explanation, they had become aware that perhaps the reason behind it was the sound of the gunshot which alerted everyone outside of their wrongdoings.Most likely so.The adrenaline rush went to their heads, it was an uneven type of thing which couldn't have done anything else, other than mess with them. Neither looking nor knowing, they had become aware of something, at the point where the vault room and the tunnel reached an intersection, there was a small piece of the wall which was dangling on the metal railing. It was desperately trying to get looser and get away.From the looks of it, even a small child could guess that it would reach the time where it could hold on no longer. Not that it mattered in any other type of way.As a matter of fact, they had been afraid someone would spill their guts on it as soon as they got what they wanted. For a good reason as well, they didn't look like fair people, rather scoundrels that they were.Baggy, piled clothes that didn't fit in colour and covered their mouths, heads and most of everything other than their eyes. Other than the big one who wore only a tight white shirt and everything else being exposed, they were entirely concealed. Perhaps the big guy was disposable, not that it mattered since they were all going hand in hand.She'd be harmed, if it wasn't for the help before, not that the conundrum lessened by any means alone. It was getting more obvious by the minute that there were exceptions to be made and had.'Start turning the wheel, we're going to have a short trip inside and you're going to accompany us.'But that wasn't the deal we agreed to.' 'We've agreed to nothing, in case you haven't noticed, I'm still the one holding the firearm and you're the one at the opposite end.'He looked rather bizarre in his red clothed mouth cover and baggy repulsive hat. It was even more obvious by the accent that he was some kind of foreigner who somehow managed to move on his account and have himself surrounded by other petty low-lives.Ten minutes passed, and the men had done a great job turning on the wheel, with its heaviness at hand, it was obvious that there'd be no return to that ever again. Neither man nor animal would choose to head inside once the vault was opened. It smelled like a butchery or a mortuary room of some kind. Lights turned on as soon as the door opened and the first reaction shared by the ones closest to the opening was to empty their guts. It was disturbing and disgusting. What they stored in there, the basins filled with large pieces of meat that belonged to no man nor animals. Headless, the limbs had been cut, they were suspended in a liquid and left there to rot. That was expected, it's the reason why we brought these on our faces. It appeared that he had not only a bad taste in his clothes, but he was also responsible for a robbery at the nearest hospital he could get his hands near. It looked as if they were all equipped with surgical-type gas masks, and breathing through them with little to no trouble. Perhaps they were slightly modified and attached to air-tanks as well, which didn't matter as much as the fact that they were being affected thereby the sight and by the looks. That didn't look like a laboratory inside the vault, but more of a paganistic ritual place, dark, plants had grown below and there was a liquid pouring everywhere. As for the tanks, they had been cracked and spilt on the floor, but somehow kept a different type of liquid in their tanks than there laid on the floor. It was harder to move through it, but the smell was depressed as soon as they got used to it. 'Don't make me go there, please.' She pleaded, only to be ignored in hopes of a better judgement and a better decision. The man who held her had second thoughts as well once the scent and fragrance reached him. 'Don't force the lass, at least, can't you see she's just as poor of the soul as any woman like her? She won't last for long if you let her roam that way.' 'There's no one else who's going to decide what's good or wrong for her other than I. For I am the one holding this and you're the ones on the other sides, unarmed. Now you will listen very carefully and do as I say.' He pulled out of his small backpack a small air tank and threw it to the big man. 'Karlson was it?' 'Karlson, make sure it's on both of your faces, that way you won't be able to separate under no circumstances.' With a quickly thought concoction, he cut two tubes and tied up the marks together. By the looks of which, the ones made into one of them and the intersection connected, leaving only a perfect way, a kind which looked as if it was made to be that way, with only a gimmick to it. The air was limited, especially for the two. Karlson didn't seem to mind nor did he pretend to know or to understand that his breath of life was limited between them. Without a warning, from the ruckus which happened outside, they seemed to have retreated inside the vault. The structural integrity had been compromised after all. Little to nought kept the walls from collapsing on them, and with little doubt, no one came to their senses. If there was one thing to which this would lead, that would be the dark, red overall lamp which they had brought. With the system in front of them, they had set base, while closing the way behind and blocking it. Now, there was no way to come from the outside to the inside any longer, once the block was on its way, but there was still a way to mess it up. From there, a small panel with a code controlled the way the inner locks pushed in and blocked the valve. It's set of passwords had been overwritten by what seemed to the laymen around to be some sort of engineer or someone who had somewhat had to have been in the field of studies related, if he managed to reconfigure the lock at such a speed. The small cylindrical metal bars were pushed from every side and suddenly the room was fully closed. It's been a while, but the smell had entirely faded. Neither of them had taken off their masks, which meant that there was a danger lingering in the gas. 'Can you please let go of her now?' 'No, one more comment and I'll personally make sure one of you died.' 'Careful, careful, just relax, there's five of us and only four of them, five if you count the woman. You'll do fine, just make sure they're put back in their places and dealt with properly.' 'Next to the wall, now, we'll travel from vault to vault until I get what I came here for.' 'And what exactly did you come here for?"That's neither your business nor does it concern you."You damn tomboy, they're only after for money, don't you understand? Why else block this whole area and take hostages?"They all went silent after hearing a moan. Apparently, from one of the tanks, one of the lifeforms in there had become disturbed by the constant influx of noise they all came up with.'Leave it to me, will you? We can't be disturbed by this either.You two, start pushing the door, if the schematics are right, it should be easily pushed. If it gives the two of you any trouble, ask for the others.'Inside the schematics, there was a drawing of a block of stone or something which seemed to block the path forward. It was obviously a heavy square-like rock which served as, what might've been the perfect sealing system out there. For as long as there wasn't anyone strong enough to push it, their combined effort not being enough, there wasn't a single way to make it through.Case and point, as they were barely pushing through.Meanwhile, one of the scoundrels took it on himself to silence the beast in all of its glory. The sounds it made were disturbing and had to end one way or the other.While taking on the initiative, he laid a few shots and riddled its body. Glass shattered and left some kind of oozing enema coming out of its bodily holes.The moans stopped, but its sudden shriek awakened the others.'Make them stop, you hear? Make them all stop, I can't handle with all of these mongrels shrieking.'A few of them laid adjacent, which made it more convenient.'Stop wasting bullets, just take care of them. And you, stop looking and keep pushing, now.'The lass was in tears as well, and the large man behind her seemed to have been confused by this entire show of shrieks and struggling specimens.'I'll deal with them then.'From behind the back, the one man who had been silent had suddenly grabbed a piece of dark tubing from the walls. As soon as he pulled it off with his bare hands, an array of steam started pushing inside the room.He suddenly came near one of the smaller tubes and started smashing the glass and silencing the small blobs which would start suffocating as soon as they reached the bottom.One after another, a cry of anguish faded as he would laugh behind his mask, being rather pleased of himself for killing so many of them in that short of time. In no time, the room was filled with broken shards, bleeding pieces of meat and small corpses which were floating just about the boots.'Are we done with it now? There doesn't seem to be anything important in their file cabinets, nothing of value anyway."Just what's this place then?'Outside, there had been a blockade for at least half an hour, a thing which was promptly strange for the officers never involved themselves in that way, not to such extremes.It looked as if they were preparing for a siege at least, by which there'd be no victors from. At each entrance, there was a launcher set, which aimed directly towards the innards of the tunnel, the main plan at the time was to give them a chance to surrender, after which they'd be forced to deploy the toxin.That was dangerous, as well as the department had settled on, which was used only in the worst of cases, for it not only caused tear-eyed or lung damage, but it also caused blindness and tears in the skin. Not only would their hostages be hurt, but there was a real chance of killing them in the tunnel.'If those are the orders, those are the order, there's no need to go around and find another way, we should give them half an hour then go ahead and do it."There's something wrong though, we've tried yelling and shouting and there had been no remark or anything to it. It's as if they're not even there any longer."Impossible, you well know it that they couldn't have escaped.'He took a few seconds to think about it and look through the entrance. It did seem rather abandoned for a place which had been taken for their so-called siege, commentaries by the passers-by. Either way, there had been witnesses, of which statements correlated with what they thought."That's it, I'm heading in, don't start it if you know what's good for you."But sir, there are protocols we have to follow, we can't just."Go ahead and turn the jerker-launcher away from the tunnel, make sure they won't start it with me inside.'He reached the tunnel but there came a type of flash, something really refused to let him get through. It cut through the walls and seemed to have malformed the entrance into the flatness of the ground. Most of the top caravan-like ceiling which had laid atop of the hole not laid restlessly cut off from below, left there to be pushed by the less-weary.'What's going on in here? Am I seeing this as well?'This is unexplainable sir, I can't, I don't.'Take care of the crow, I'll cross the street and see to it on the other side.'It was just as the same time that they had pushed through to the other vault, which was suddenly tighter to move through and far more complicated than what they had expected. For, as well as there had been strange looking beings, this took them all. A perfectly simple room with only one raised slab on it. There laid a jar in which there laid only an eye which gave the vague impression that it was alive.'Just what now? I don't want to carry on with this sickness, just let us go.'You won't leave until.'One took a wrong move and surprised his fellows as well. Despite being somewhat familiar to one another, having passed each other in the city, there was still that connection which had taken the rest of them off-guard. It was at the passing from the one previous room to this one he tried attacking with no warning and grabbing one of them. The plan was, for, as long as he grabbed a hostage of his own, there'd be a way to trade their freedom for. It did manage to shock them in the least, that much as two or three times went into his gut before he fell with a thump, dead.'What the hellish devil is wrong with you? Are you of no mind? We weren't supposed to kill them, not now, not here in this room.'I'm sorry, he came at me, I had no choice, I. Why aren't I supposed to kill in this room?'There was a sad attempt to drag him by the shoulders into the previous room and leave him there, but he failed to get away from the doorframe. It was hard enough all ready to push through, with the three of them watching the remaining three and the lass. It was getting tighter and far too hot for anyone's comfort. But the man was dead.'We'll have to lift up the rock and crush his head with it, do you understand? This man won't be able to be forced back inside that room.'You're mad, have you lost you?'One of them, Nelson, had seemed to have grasped something which the others hadn't. The strange feeling which this room had made him feel didn't seem to carry on in his memories. It wasn't as prevalent as it had been when he was a child, but he had a clear recollection of a similar time like this. It was by the time he had felt despair and was forced to do something he disliked. Something he really disliked, something which a child shouldn't be forced to take. Nelson turned around at the eye and for a moment there, he had forgotten where he was and who was in charge. Something wasn't right with the body now and they were desperately taking precautions to make sure everything was right. A shot went off but it only grazed one of the walls. It was a warning shot, they were supposed to move.'Hands where I can see them, do as I say if you know what's right for you.'His gaze went deeper than expected and it appeared that he was ready to go on with anything he set himself onto. One deeper snuff into it and they'd be ready. There were puffs of blow into the man's chest, it was getting even closer now.'Lift it, before I shoot you all one by one, I said.'Atlas, tie the girl to one of the hooks.'What hooks?'Those ones.'There were a few of them at the farthest corners of the room. He had to act fast but he was done in no time, after which he had to chance but to remove the air mask from he face and leave her there alone. The hit of the scent had come sooner than expected and she almost fainted from the strong aroma which had haunted her surrounding.'Don't say a word, as soon as we're done with this, Atlas will put the mask back on her. Do we have an understanding? Good.'Atlas was a beast if even a man could be that way. He was not only rounder but far bigger and stronger than anyone around. It was a shame that he wasn't asked to lift the stone off himself because he would've probably been able to do it himself with little to no effort involved. With their combined efforts, it looked as if this wasn't going to be an issue after all. Mostly because they were at different ends and one of the scoundrels was a few meters away, doing his best to guard them with his slinger. Though the effort came, there was little doubt regarding the result. "Take off your hands, now." The three lads suddenly backed away of their own will and looked at how the head, as well as the man's hand, got caught under the rock. As their fellow's head got smashed, so did one of the bandit's hands, caught between the rocks and the harder place. Still, there was no fight to be had as Atlas turned and managed to grab two of them by the chest and hold them by the wall. "Why did you do that? Why you had to stop lifting? Go back and pull it off his hand before I knock both of you in." There were agonising sounds, as to be expected from a man which held a hand which had been caught in the process of being crushed. "We can't lift it any longer, it's not our fault." "Yes, listen to him, it grew heavier, I swear, that's the reason we backed away, we were afraid it would crush through the bottom and fall through some hole, dragging us with it." "Cut it off and pull it away before I execute all three of them. You as well Atlas, for entertaining this idea, to begin with." In all fairness, he'd shoot his own partner as well if it meant putting an end to the screaming. "Step away now, I won't have you trying anything while he's down there hurt." It seemed that a bunch of bandages had been enough to stop the bleeding, but it was an awful sight. The headless man didn't help with the fact that his blood had spread everywhere, including his system as well. In the awful case he bore some disease or had caught one, it would be the means to an end, in the sense that he'd have no other chance to get through. This was going to be awful as well as he knew it. "How am I even going to be able to shoot? I'm not left, left-handed." "You'll learn, just aim at their chest and use your other arm as support for your aim." "Like this you mean?" "Right, like that, just aim and." There was another echo below, one which hadn't left the vaults but gave them a reflection of their current state. "Atlas, get the lass, we're pressing forward, don't attempt anything like this, and whatever you do, never look at the container in the middle of the room." It was where the eye had been, saying that out loud, instead of thinking it was a vile mistake. He was nervous. "I am Boulevard and the leader of this gloating band here would be no one else other than I. Well, seeing how the object of our fear had suddenly just disappeared, I'm afraid that there's little to do against it." That meant that there was a great chance for it to be that way. The rock suddenly rolled over and crushed itself against the opening, blocking the door as its upper and lower regions held sharp pieces of its doorframe suddenly twist upon the impact, leaving the entrance looking like some portal through which there'd be no entry for any working man. "What's going on here exactly? So far I've seen nothing worth taking, certainly not worth a man's life and a hand." "I beg to differ, simpleton, I believe that the means will justify the ends, that is all. No one would dare think otherwise." "What good will it do if you're stuck here with us without a way to spend your fortune?" His men were getting nervous around him, he was clearly losing his grip. It was soon enough as well that he lost sight of the container and it was already gone. Somewhere and sometime during their conversation, it managed to slip away. "Greatly so, I believe there's no other way this may come through. It never seemed to me that any of you cared for your lives in any sort of way either, perhaps this was just an excuse for you to try torturing a man." "What are you even talking about? We're not the ones shooting and crushing people's heads." "But the three of you helped, not to mention that your sudden act cost one of my men's a hand. Neither of you looks too conflicted over the fact. As a matter of principle, I believe that it has no effect on it whatsoever. This seems to be the only way through which any of you might try making a difference. Not that I was planning on leaving either of you alive, but it seems like you earned yourself a place with us.' He turned and immediately shot the cripple in the gut than in the neck. The others were rather surprised by this cruelty and lack of compassion, the man had shown himself able to do what he claimed to do. 'It's simple, you two, take his pistol away, I believe it's time for his initiation.' But sir, you can't expect him to suddenly come to our side, he's going to double-cross it when the first chance shows itself. 'No he won't, you damn knucklebuster.' At which he hinted at the greater risk, that of which the others knew right then and understood. Exactly the same reason the man had to be taken care off. 'Atlas, I want you to return and hold the other two against the wall again, there's the initiation before we may proceed. Speaking of which, what's your name son?' Hubert. 'He was thrown a knife on the floor, rather pushed than any other motion to be held. The way he had stared at it seemed as if it was an invitation for something bad to happen, but the man, Boulevard had no care in the world for it. 'Now, I want you to take this as slowly as you can, there's no hurry in the world for you. Listen carefully. What I need of you is to behead the man manually, do you understand? He's dead, so there shouldn't be any kind of resistance laid against you.' And if I go on with this, will I be one of yours?' That's how it goes, you gave the order, you killed my man and it will be you as well who replace him. It's part of the conduct, you see?' The sleazy fellow said, hiding some sort of grin, he stepped away and squatted over in order to have a better look. All the time in the world it seemed, even though the others didn't agree with it. 'Man killed, mankiller.' They whispered amongst themselves as if they had been beyond that. It did affect Hubert who seemed to have had a dose of sickness gotten from playing around with the corpse. From that point, it could only get worse, as he carried on cutting piece by piece, ripping away in the most disturbing of fashion. I have to carry on with this, please give me strength. The meat was dry, far too dry, there was no blood that sprayed out, rather it was at the tips of his fingers, pushed inside through his nails. Such delights he had there, that the others didn't get too see, other than Boulevard of course, who noted on everything which happened there and understood. By the time he had been done, the head suddenly rolled around, leaving the body in the worst possible looking way. He was immediately startled by the fact that one of the scoundrels took his liberty to come and kick the head against the farthest wall he could launch it at. There was a kind of unexpected splash and a thud before it fell again. 'What's wrong you? That almost took care of my heart.' Ah, you'll live you, get up now, you're one of us Hub. 'He didn't understand exactly why the transition came, even if he had a vague suspicion that they were putting up with it because of their leader. It couldn't be understood by mere observation though, as the man had little expression shown behind his mask, thing which applied to all of them. Atlas being an exception. The giant was called and made to put both of the fellows down, which had been, more or less reluctant than they had appeared to be. 'What are you two waiting for then? Keep moving, we're still not done with you. If you what's good for either of your skins, you'd better do what you're told.' The remaining ones switched to Hub who seemed as if he had changed. Either he was putting on a play or he had really switched in order to follow some kind of folly. It was something which in the least could be said to be unthinkable. Neither man nor foe decided what to do against them, it's something which they themselves hadn't decided to be done. They'd make a mockery of everything which was considered right, but they went on and pressed on. The door opened, quick and precise, it wasn't locked, nor did it require anyone who adhered to any kind of strange behaviour. 'Halt, one of you will remain behind and make sure nothing bad happens. You'll stay here why we're heading in, understood?' But, I.

'Another warning shot against the wall, it scraped the side of his cheek, inches away from penetrating his skin entirely. Perhaps he hadn't understood where his place was, this wasn't a social visit of any kind, it was dangerous to play around and ignore commands.' Now that I made myself clear, step away from the doorframe. You're next to go in, carry on with that.' He said in some low meekly voice as the last one entered and they closed the door behind them. The place was a maze, in more than one way, packed with shelves of every kind, to which openings had small values of silver and gold. It looked as if this had been what they were after. 'So what next? We take it and what?' 'We leave, of course, you two, take these sacks and fill them with whatever you can. I want nothing of value left in here and don't worry about the weight, we'll make sure that we're.' There it went again, the thud. Something heavy rolling around. Some kind of egg-being, eyeless, rolled all, organic. It seemed to have no awareness but it was tall enough to reach their ankles at least. Below it, there had been a trail or some delicate disturbing ooze which didn't seem to bode well for either of them. 'Stay away from that, I mean it, we should move.' At first, it didn't follow, but as long as it was there, the gold and the silver inside the openings turned brittle. Their colours were of grey and stone and it looked as if they showed no sign of turning back into them. 'Of course, it would be such a thing, this whole place is nothing but a sham, we need to reach farther below. Come on, let's group as get away from it.' 'But what about those things in our bags?' 'Leave them be, they were nothing but stones and small plunder anyway. Look, dust in here, nothing there, small pieces, all because of it.' That being had taken another route and managed to meet them again by the other side unless they had been wrong and there was another one. Transparent, small eyes, as well as its nigh-invisible mouth, revealed itself. Uncertainty ran amongst them, as neither of them was sure whether or not they would try attacking them. Pistols were hanging by there wasn't any way to know how resilient they were until they attacked. 'I feel bad for some reason, can we lay down for a while?' 'Don't take a break now Hub, or it may be your last.' Not that he paid any heed to his warning or something such as that, but he could be right for once. Only for this occasion, this moment, his life could be lost to them, who were rolling through and touching the walls and the stacks with their strange bodies. It never occurred to either of them that they could be more dangerous than they had been observed to be. 'We need to move, there's nothing down here either.' One of the cohorts had found an entrance, that only went four feet in before it turned out to be a solid wall underneath. 'They've placed a couple of fake ones in order to confuse us, sir.' 'Keep looking for it then, we'll eventually find it.' 'I think this might be it.' Yet another fake path which leads to nothing. It was then that one of those rolling pale beings just came and trapped one inside. Another one of the men lost it seemed, as soon as it started producing that liquid outside its body, there would be time for him to drown. His screams were not heard. 'He's one of your own, aren't you going to do anything about it?' 'I'm afraid that our ammunition is limited, so keep searching.' 'No, he might be scum, but we cannot leave him to die that way at the hands of that melting yolk.' 'Be my guest then, if you want to risk harming yourself instead of looking for a way out, no one's stopping you.' There was a slight shimmer of silence then, which abruptly ended in disgust. No one else appeared to have paid any attention to the man, instead, is focused on looking for the only way they could. That one trapdoor which leads below, instead of the fakes. The main problem being the fact that there wasn't any possible way to tell since the fake ones went deep and laid in dark. This was more important and more amusing to watch, as he came and charged at the round melting oval of pure white. It was the biggest mistake the unknown one had done. It carried on with him having entered far too deep into it and being slowly broken apart and taken in. And another one went down then, leaving only one rebel who joined them and the girl. Nothing was said about that any longer. Speaking of which, there was only him, one fellow and Atlas left the legacy, the scoundrels who would share what was left. 'They're all fake, duds, there's no way down there.' 'Keep looking, there has to be some way there, I know that, look for anything then, a hole or some kind of.' Atlas, what have you done?' Apparently, the brute wasn't told to stay put around there and had managed to stumble on his own around. A huge mistake since the big man had pressed a button and started the alarm. With the yellow lights going on and off, in circles, like small cortices of radiance, they had no other chance but to retreat. They were broken in spirit and soon, that wouldn't matter since they would be revealed. Every standing, blocking shelf started receiving below the ground level, leaving a flatness which was unacceptable. Not only would they be seen but as soon as they landed, they'd become hunted with no way to get away. 'Look, the elevator, make for it, make haste!' That was all which was needed to be said and spoken about, only one good chance to get away from all the trouble and they'd be set against it. This dose of mad euphoria didn't seem to bear anything to them at all. 'Well, is it still working?' 'I don't know, there's only one way to find out.' They clicked, it was there after all. Both Boulevard and Hub entered it and waited. Atlas and the woman had managed to crawl away before the blocks were being removed. And after a moment's notice that was all. Without a way to see any other human being out there, an assumption came, that there were none left there, just the strolling roundish blobs of white, of which existence and presence couldn't be explained by reason. Were they mad conjunctions or apparitions? Neither, but they had taken human lives and were ready to follow through. 'Press it before they follow through as well.' He had, there was a thump and it seemed as if it was on its way already. The disruption was over and they were on their way. Two levels in, the light stopped, there wasn't any way to get it working again. 'You know, there's no need to hold her as a hostage any longer and she'd be a lot more useful on her feet. Not to mention the big guy as well.' He lit one match and held it for a few seconds. Those things would last as long as they didn't force their breaths away and didn't choose to push too hard out of their lungs, to begin with. Well, it was a convenient thing that they were there, only the two of them being focused on the conversation and the repercussions of both of their actions. 'Atlas, let go of her, it looks like we're going to trust our new partner for the time being. You can take off the mask, there should be no danger any longer.' For good reasons too, the thing was starting to make him dizzy, more than usual in any other way. It was a miracle in the least that they got that far. 'Better use the lighter and keep it lit, I won't have any more losses of light with those. Those things.' He had finally taken in the scent and hadn't regretted any of it. A hard hit on top of the elevator, it had become obvious that one had leapt in, more than that, perhaps a few of them consecutively. That was a nightmare to merely think about it. But the thumps continued in a most unorthodox manner, which only added to their feeling of isolation in some way which neither could understand. As for the woman, she had lowered herself to the bottom and started weeping uncontrollably now. There wasn't any clear way out and for the time being, that did seem like the best she could do, if others wanted to join as well. 'Should we all resign them and wait for this tiny cabin to be filled?' 'Do you have any idea how hard it is to open an elevator door? We'd have more luck trying to fight through them rather than open it.' Which, as a matter of fact, went without saying. They were trapped in there. Outside, it was rather worse. As on the side in which it had been mysteriously blocked, they have brought engineers to try cutting through. Now that they were set at work, no one dared get through the other side until there was some sort of confirmation that it was safe to come. Until that point, little mattered and even less cared. 'We need to bring something bigger sir, an industrial drill if you don't mind, as normal tools won't do the job, not against this anyway.' 'Go ahead then, it seems that this might take a few days in the least to complete. Do me a favour though and don't tell anyone of the incident, will you?' 'But sir, I don't think it's fair to.' 'Listen, it somehow occurred to me that we may be spending more than a few days here and nothing looks good yet. From what we know they might've planned something there, to which we may not be able to risk the safety of our citizens and those around us, do you understand?' 'Sir, I.' 'Well, I should've been clear from the start, under no circumstance are you allowed to disclose information of what you've seen or what you are to see in the near future. Any rumour that gets out might jeopardise not our people inside there but also our entire operation.' 'I think I understand now.' 'Great, now go on and make sure you're bringing it back fast enough.' The engineer was gone by now, little being left to him in this age of old men. The winter season was offset by an imbalance in the atmosphere, but the least disturbing thing wasn't that in the least, it was the fact that there had been a pregnant woman down there and they knew. They had infiltrated them, but little was known about that fact. With him down there, at least, from the eyewitnesses who saw the woman, she had a stronger chance of survival. But nothing was certain. It had been too long since they had come into contact and the worst could've happened by now. No one dared approach the mouth hole now, most likely because what had happened before, the paranoid lot. It was quite unexplainable how that piece of junk had just appeared out of nowhere but there wasn't anything to be done yet. They were kept back with no say and neither of them could understand the reason behind it. Who or what was down there. 'Push, keep pushing Atlas, you're almost done. I can see them spilling through the cracks, they're trying desperately to get down us as they've done to everyone caught in their traps.' He had come in terms that they would die, but the woman and the Hub, they refused to give in while there seemed to be a slight chance of survival. At least from the looks of which, they were still able to push through with little to no downside to it. There was the big guy doing most of the grunting and the slanting off. 'We're almost there, keep going big guy, just one more push, that's it.' He was doing it, pushing little by little in, reaching that point where one man with a smaller frame could crawl in. 'It's hard, so very hard.' 'Keep at it, that's it, we're all going to get through, don't worry Atlas, we still need you for this. Hub, let's go and pull from the other side.' The unlit room seemed to radiate in the bleakest sense of the word. Nothing could make it seem any better, only that there was a creeping sensation, which was more of a fair trade than the expected death. 'Come in, fast and take the woman with you.' No sense in carrying on with it, for that alone was a fact for them. They passed through and seemed to have abandoned their way back, seeing fall from grace. Those blobby blocks of white fell with it, mostly from the weight and that they had taken the cords off. Its gates had been closed in order to prevent any attempt they might've had of trying to get away. No one seemed to care about that in the least. They stood at each other's throats now, confused. Only the radiance from the lighter took them out of the dark, but other than that, there wasn't anything stopping them from going at each other. 'May we proceed then?' 'Still looking for a way to get rich, aren't you? Have you learned nothing yet? Don't you value your life in the least?' 'Don't you value yours?' He had his pistol in his hand, but it wasn't the best position he could've been in. For, Hubert still had a knife, at the back of the shirt, under his pants, easily attainable and even quicker to get through. It was even more obvious that, if something were to go down, that'd be it. He'd stab him in the throat and make it for the gun, that was he could deal with the giant and find a way out. At least, in his mind, it went well, other than the fact that he'd get shot before getting to do anything there. The dorm they were in was getting colder, which didn't help with his decision. He hated cold for some reason. It reminded him of how much he loathed the human touch and form as well as the warmth which accompanied it. Something about the woman, especially her since he could feel, rather, he sensed another kind of life in there. 'What now? Shall we, do you desire to bring this to an end and kill both of us here? It could be dangerous to walk around this unkempt place, this cold and endearing waste.' Though one less annoyance would be better than being forced to listen to it talk. 'Move then, I'll wait for no misstep, if you trip, you'll lose your life, understood?' Loud and clear. There was a smirk of some kind, for which there wasn't much room left on his face. Something had changed indeed and he was sure that it had been his fault that he kept him, of all people, still alive and walking. He was in the process of changing and it was a curious thing to look and observe the strange metamorphosis in its fledged prime. No one dared look in any other direction, neither could they grasp why it was that there were parts of homes and entire street corners stored below. The cold had almost shattered the windows and most of the glass had become indistinguishable from ice. With that in mind, they came again to a street corner in which they had been, it had been warmed up by the likes of a flame-producing device. A hole had been dug inside the street which led below. 'We won't make it through the cold if we keep it this way.' 'I guess we won't, what about you lass?' They were seated in the hole, standing on a twisted tunnel which had been covered all along by the top side of a car. That small detail was enough to reveal that there had been someone there with whom they'd share the same fate. Alas, he had left no provisions, only this hiding place, no writings of the wall, just. She looked rather pale, her eyes started like two pieces of frozen ponds. Not even the acquired warmth could revive her from the state she was in. What laid in front of them was nothing but a jewel of the cold, lifeless to touch and stare. There had been a child in there. 'We won't make it, I know we won't. Bad plan, worst plan, it's all your fault.' Said Atlas, rather caught up in his own misery. He took the sanest action, which was as if to ignore what was going on in the fantasy he had been in, the pure rivers of gold he'd see or those of which he was promised. The mountains of silver and statues of platinum, covered in ornaments of copper. Even the lowest forms sold through to the lowest bidder he could find. Now, his fantasies of greed were no more, he could be sure of it. No one spoke a word of conquest, brought up nothing about a reward. They were in the same room with a dead woman, it couldn't get worse than that. 'You both realise we will have to eat her and her child if we're willing to stay alive. At least for a few more hours until we find out a way to stop the cold.' Boulevard was already set too deeply for anyone else to understand what was going on in his mind. He was going from one side to another, trying to roll off or fall asleep. His motions made it far more confusing than it had to be. Despite that, there was a simple fact alone. 'I think you may be right, about what you said. We need to conserve our strength and the only way to do that is if for us to get back on our feet.' 'Shall we use her clothes for fire?' He considered it for a moment. In that case, the clothes should've been cold or wet, surprisingly they weren't. They couldn't be farther than that. It was awkward nonetheless, as the three of them proceeded into undressing her and throwing all of the clothes in a pile. The lass looked splendid for her age, too much so in her skin-dress and with her cold eyes. 'Hubert, you got a knife, haven't you?' 'I haven't realised you made the fire yet.' 'So you're willing to get through this, great. I didn't think I could come to count on your help for something like this, but it looks as if I'm becoming rather desperate.' It had been a mistake to go ahead and admit that to him, especially because of the position it put him in. He'd take it as a weakness and eventually find a way to exploit it, that was sure. Atlas came and helped with the blowing, right after he had been given his lighter back. That was hardly a challenge, as the real one was about to come. One by one they would go out and try finding something which would keep the fire up. 'This is how it's going to be done, one stays and chops her up, one will be outside looking for a bundle of sticks or anything which would fuel our fire, and alas, the last one will stay as a guard.' 'You still don't trust me, do you?' 'I wouldn't dare trust someone as willing to cut a lass like her, especially while knowing she's the reason you got yourself caught in all of this.' He had been wearing it for a while, the hair.

Perhaps it had been a sort of tactic to make him feel a lot more paranoid than before, that way he would make a mistake. But the fire was great, the fire had been well lit and kept. Boulevard could fall asleep near that fire, if the fear of not being caught off guard and killed in his sleep laid there. He had become dreadful, that peckish little man, eating pieces of the girl. It had been a girl. She had been formed, at least to the point where she was recognisable as a creature of meat and skin. Dangerously thin, by the looks of which they would enjoy a few days out of her. There was some dread, little being said about the way he treated each piece of the corpse. Without a doubt, they were going to stay there a while. Outside, there had come the dreaded night, when streets were empty but the nearby buildings had been occupied for official business. As a matter of fact, there was little doubt of how long the siege would last since they had received proper documents. Of course, this couldn't happen during the night. Procedures got in the way, the likes of which wouldn't help in any case. Some sort of papers would come right and left but one day, that's how much they were given and they could get through. It was dangerous to have them scout, but they had to look for those things at night. Would they stumble? Yes, they came. After arriving at the least important moment of the night, they were drawn in massed underneath the earth. Despite having only one hole left to get through, there wasn't any attempt to melt through the blocked path. 'Hey, Lawrence, go and wake up the chief-in-charge, and be quick about it, he's going to want to see this.' With a nod, he appeared to have come out of the stoop and left whatever was there behind him. There was little said then, in the span of minutes. Least of all the silence was interrupted as each floor had been ruffled out of sleep, only to watch them march in the glory of the empty night sky. 'Well, what was it you called me for? Better make it great. There wasn't any chance to call or say, to respond with any sort of snarky comment related to their need and breed. They were there, as they had been every previous night, somewhere, somehow in the town. But this was a first, as it had never happened for them to be organised. 'I have a bad feeling about this. Whatever they're doing down there might not spare us of the trouble yet.' 'What do you suppose though? Should we barge in and try following after them?' 'No, that would suicide, with their numbers against ours, there's no chance it may come to that anyway, but against them, nonetheless, I don't think anyone in this entire city could survive.' There could be an invasion at some grander scale, but no one wanted to think of that. As easily as they came inside, they followed through and broke what was left of the wall, swarming from each side, only to begin. It would be hard, as easily as they had it trying to skim through gravel or the flesh of men, this metal would be hard to digest or be broken down into the most basic elements before being disintegrated. It was a task of destruction, one of lesser and greater action which may be taken as least suprising by the fact of which there came the bigger ones. From darkness and their groups of three, they knet in front one another and spat below the level of the sea. And from their bile and needless taint, there came some blasphemous form, primordian in all but mind, another servant which was stronger. Looking at its feet, those flat blocks of skin had larger veins which would flow through the body, pumping the muscles belonging to its bulging arms. Another set of eyewear from a pushed behind giant barnacle which stood for its head. Countless small eyes laid there, giving the impression of smallpox on some unknown animal gland, though it could see. It followed. Dampness everywhere around the place, the likes of which could take anyone by surprise. Men had been there, roaming around and locking behind them, but they couldn't be recognised. Stones, tinder, pieces of wood, there as well. 'You'll be done eating Atlas, and we'll march immediately, understood?' Neither of them had been proud, but they couldn't finish her either, making it seem that they were stuck.

Either they would eat her so and leave what was left of the minds inside the hole or burn her body and erase whatever evidence remained that it happened. One of them wasn't as sad or shocked by what he's done. As disgusted as Atlas was, he looked at Hubert who still took bites out of the raw woman, or what was left of her. 'I don't think I'll be able to eat any longer.' 'Keep at it or you'll be sorry, I won't have to deal with if you go down on me there.' 'Where's this place he's taking us? Atlas, out of all, thought about asking but reminded himself that he would interrupt Boulevard and startle him even more. As long as it was important to him. Little more so, they spend the remaining of the meal there, before they set out. It had warmed a little, to the point where it was bearable again. No frostbite or anything which would jeopardise their whole walk. 'No time to look around, let's try keeping our heads in for a moment.' It seemed like a dream there, the whole scenery, in terms of looking deeper into it, a way of looking at the glass melt. Something was indeed that way, the floor was being mashed, to put in less consideration, it was melting under their feet. There was nought to it. Nothing more than that, especially since there came some peculiarity which hadn't lasted a bit. 'Will this continue longer?' 'I don't know, we'll have to wear it out and see what's going on. Until then, keep your heads up and don't try struggling too hard, it will only make things worse for us.' Both Atlas and Hubert both shrugged and nodded before making an effort to look away at something less important. A block was in the way, where the other elevator had been. The plainness of the stairs was quite repulsing. But it would be the only way to get through, unnoticed and missed by their steps. The upper floor had been blocked off, which in terms of the eventual return, it didn't show any sign of there being a way to get through. As much as he had looked at it that way, there was a simple fact that the others hadn't known. He could hear them, feel them, walking above. It's almost as if they had resonated with him, being kind enough to alarm him of their coming. Not that it would matter for the others who were still in peril, but followed. Next floor, out of many, the system wasn't quite the best in terms of how the entrance to each of the floors was done. For they ended there and most likely, the next pair of stairs would be on the other side of it. Alas, the prison in check, where the bars had been inexplicably removed, probably salvaged by some poor soul who got there before them. What was left in their place were the holes in which the cylindrical bars would've been. From there, there came a dark succour, blue in colour, which almost sparked from the light. 'That's gas, damn it Hubert, turn down the lights before you blow us to smithereens.' A glowing type of gas nonetheless, which gave them the overall image of what was once a place where the criminals had been. Were they? It looked too strange for a prison, the more they advance, the easier it had become to notice that there were too many corpses in the wrong places. On both sides to be certain. 'Put on the oxygen mask now, Atlas, Hubert, the two of you will have to share, as long as it is necessary from the looks of it.' 'I don't actually need one if you'll excuse me from it.' As much as the suspicion came and went, there wasn't anything either of them could do to force him to wear it. His end. Outside, it had stopped, the march had brought all of them down where they laid. This could be the greatest moment, the only chance they might get, it had to be acted upon. 'What will we lose if we detonate a bunch of explosives there? We won't even have to wait for anything as it comes. They'll be trapped there for as long as that block remains and the citizens of the city will finally be safe. Doesn't that sound like some sort of goal to you?' 'It's dangerous and there are men down there.' 'Not anymore, you saw the size of their army, if it suddenly decided to turn around and head for our buildings, there'd be no way to stop them from cleansing us. Let's admit it, there's no way we know of in which we can get rid of them, so we may well just try this.' 'It's not only dangerous but borderline insane, you're proposing acts of destructions, I swear. There's nothing which might take away the thought of men once you've done that, people won't forget. We're supposed to be the force that stands between them and.' He was interrupted, his vision being affected by his sleep. Without a way to know about what he'd done, he placed a hand on top of his forehead and brushed over his eyes. Again, he looked outside and tried to think of a way, if any would be there, some easy solution he hadn't thought off which would kind of help either of them to get through. But there wasn't any sort of way, nothing, at least nothing which wouldn't involve risking his men's lives. He looked around, most of them being partially asleep if not faded from this commotion and exhaustion and rethought his place over. 'What do you propose then?' 'I'm glad you started reconsidering your plan. Well, I think there's only one way possible, at least from the way we might salvage this entire encounter.' 'You're not talking about something really heavy, are you?' 'It's already been called for, just in case, sir, I may have sent a few words to someone and got approved for a common class explosive just for this instance. Everything I needed was your approval, sir.' This was ludicrous, it was mad, what were they thinking? In plain sight, they weren't. It wasn't as if they might've thought of anything of the sort, but it did seem to be peculiar, in some way, that they cared for the safety of the people, yet refused to take a stance against them. 'Shall we proceed?' Men started talking to one another and followed. It had been placed in the basement apparently, the bottom of which had only one globe of light dangling from left to right and a single table. The rest was filled with pipes, dust and everything of little consequence which was stored. 'I wish places like this one was cleaned more often, it wouldn't make our stay as much of a mass if they were.' 'This it then?' Despite the nod, he came by to the cardboard and started ripping it away from around the device. For something as commonly called, the box appeared like some alien device to them, at least from the technological point of view. There was a damned thing about it which was unexplainable. First being the beeping, and the lights, the recognition that there was cold inside the basement and it started regulating its own heat. Not only had the room become hotter, but that also made the device far more dangerous than it originally looked like being. 'Is this your damn plan? To detonate it under the building and take everyone down there?' 'Relax captain, it's safe, there's nothing dangerous about it unless you count every change it makes or every flash of blue or red light. It's safe, at least until armed.' 'And as far as the plan goes?' 'We take it by the entrance, go as deep as to reach the tunnel and leave the device at the bottom.' 'Wait, that could take down the entire tunnel and destroy the whole road, did you even think as far as that when you asked for it? Who even approved it?' There was no time for answers, it was time to bring it down there and arm it. Most of them, around the tablet, acted in the same way councilmen had, rather being set on doing what they had to. It was even more obvious by the way everyone else agreed that this had been planned a long time ago and they were only deciding to get through it now. 'Indeed, them coming here and being stuck wasn't planned but it rather seems as if it's going to be the cherry on top. No one will suspect a thing anyway as long as we keep our mouths shut and make sure of a great cover-up.'Which led them to the most important question, who was the one going in?Regardless of what happened next, it would be irrelevant, even if they were seen by others, taking them down was more important.First them, together, a blinding flash revealed something which had stopped their advance. It was blocked by another set of thick metal tubing there. Something wanted them as far away from the place, especially with that device.'Alas, look, our problems are solved. Is there something else we need to stand for?'No, it's not, they're still down there, unstopped, they could get through the tunnels and end up invading any point in the city if they mobilised. This device has to get down there one way or another."How do you know that? Who are you exactly then?"Blastisch Andrew, special forces.'Pulling out some sort of old and starred card left the impression he had just returned from war and jumped into another conflict. He should've known that something was wrong with the fellow, ever since the wrong happened, his mind had been affected.Something had taken some of it off, scraped at it during his dreams and night.'You're in charge, I presume."I've been so for a while, the only thing being that I didn't want to alarm you as of yet, it wasn't safe, too much suspicion, you see?'But they had almost managed to cut through the other side, he had been sure of it. Back there, it was still locked, blocked, with no mark of anyone having been through at it. As long as they lost time there, no one was going to make any progress whatsoever.'We'll use a small blowing device then. I'm afraid our time is running short and this may get out of hand.'Down there, their rough screeches ran as their claws and putrid bile filled the place. They desperately tried eating through, helping the metal decay in a most peculiar manner which seemed to do well for the time being. It was that which pushed and brooded and forced the metal to melt in the pool which laid at their feet.Bigger one's stroke at the walls and tried breaking through, having nothing even close to some weakness to justify the damage it was done there. Out of all, they had been the most effective in bring everything down. Hedges were coming off, whatever device was in there, now malfunctioning in a most disturbing manner.Sounds came distorted and it felt as if there was some sort of device in there which kept it going.There'd be no time nor need for an explosive device. The corrosion had reached through the ceiling and subsequently through the floor above, soon enough it caved in.Pieces of the road fell below as they had been revealed.

'Do you see now what I'm talking about? I'm afraid that there's no other way than this, we will have to either go against them or surrender our rights to be human. But don't expect any sort of mercy from these creatures though, the only thing they seek is destruction in any shape and form.'

More dread filled the air, their stench and little desires, the morose which crept inside. They were filled with confusion, which dragged in themselves but rather crept too often.For far too long they had denied themselves the truth, only to be called what they were. No longer in the city but in some sort of construct of peculiar colours and unnamable materials which seemed to have grown the buildings than them being built in there. It felt like nothing strange had happened there, rather that they could finally see themselves for what they were. Pseudo-humanoids, with dark coven-like skin, which resembled more so like feathers than the texture which would belong to the skin. Even with their weak folded eyes, they could see how deep and sullen were they teeth, forced in as they came.The plan hadn't changed either and the device only seemed strange to an untrained eye. More vulgar and spiked in form.'Shall we go on then, how is this supposed to be armed?'Press those three and open in.'All three lights had been pressed together, revealing the secrecy behind the manufactured device. There was something which didn't belong there, as the device revealed the wicked wires and the moving sets of round sickening globes of glass. It was as if they held strong floating visible photons which emitted long wires of pure light in their small huts of glass. A few minuscule and almost indistinguishable claps were pulled before anything further could be done. It was getting closer though and little would be set aside. More metal wiring pulled connections and wires which held it together. As a rule of thumb, nothing inside the device was important, rather, the small glass hut with the glowing thing in it. 'Twas done. There were little or small words to be carried over between the two of them, not only did it look as if it was dangerous but there was little consideration of what was going to happen to either them or the plane above. 'I don't suppose there's going to be a road any longer, will there?' Aarndew almost gave a startling chuckle at the thought of it. No more chuckles were heard after that. Below, they came through, another one of the strangeness of the empty holes was the fact that air freely travelled through them. One could simply switch the air with gas for the most disastrous result. At least from the looks of which, neither of them seemed to listen to the sounds which came from below. They sounded like that of torture, which was impossible. Hubert, out of all was almost interested in that, even though the chances of someone having survived what happened there had been slim. It had to be the rust there, while the air passed through. 'Drop a needle in there, let's hear how deep they go.' 'Do you suppose that's a good idea? I think.' 'Just do it, there shouldn't be any repercussions whatsoever. It's unlikely that there's actually gas down there, it might've been a false alarm.' 'And if it isn't?' 'Then hope for the best, that this place won't blow up with us in it.' Atlas was the one remaining silent now, listening like a kid who has been taught not to play with candles and with fire. He looked especially afraid for his own life, at least by likes of which there wasn't any hope he felt. He walked in a place he didn't want to be in and hadn't understood the purpose of the room they were in. As a matter of fact, neither of them have. It was a mystery that they even stumbled on the matter of there being a few gases being combined in the same room. Most of all, the main composition, that of which still kept them alive was air, being the major component of the affair. There wasn't anything else of the sort in any other place, without even being a chance for him to properly enjoy looking at the stars above. 'Look, I think I see another one.' 'Those aren't stars, you oaf, they're metallic pins and I don't think I like the way they're placed.' 'Triangular in shapes, they seemed to have only the glimmer without the dying notion while they flashed from time to time.' 'The men around us had to die somehow, and it's most likely had been caused by those things, one way or the other.' 'It was an immersion which drove them through, only to be careful where they stepped or what their choices made them do.' 'Atlas, what did you do?' He stumbled in the wrong order, managing to somehow get to be in the wrong place. What was it about him that made him such hard-headed? There wasn't any certainty about it in any case, especially when it came off the roundness of his bolting skull. The top of which could've been no more. It was a chamber of gasses, with no visible exit or way out. Somehow on the way, it had been concealed and lost. From below, a yellow gas started pouring in the room. All three of them backed away as far as they could, having reminded themselves of their own masks. Even though they were mightily infallible, they only appeared that way, without a doubt, no one could've prevented it from happening, especially not then. 'This may be the end of us, it seems there's no way out.' 'We could try blasting it with the light if it is indeed what I think it is.' 'How could you think of something as dangerous and perilous as that? What if this entire room gets blasted in return?' 'Trust me on this, will you? I've got a great feeling about this, so, both of you, with your backs against the walls and cover your eyes. There might be some flash there.' Seeing how it was useless to argue with the man, they both retreated in their way and seemed to peer around. Without a doubt, the sound which came blasted the room. It shook the floor in an amalgamation of red and yellow hues before being replaced by a black smog. The smoke was immediately being pulled by the tubes, alas. 'I was right, I was right, see? I think I.' Both had been covered in gravel and had been cowering in fear or being hit by pieces of junk. Hubert had been impaled by a couple of pieces from everywhere ranging down from his neck, near his major arteries and right through his knees. There was a square-like hole in the middle of the room, some sort of invitation it seemed. As well as it had looked, they had to climb down. 'Come on, what are you both waiting for?' Both men had apparently been caught in some sort of shock there, without proper knowledge, he couldn't tell if they suffered from some sort of shell-shock or anything else of the related kind. Both of them refused to listen or even pay any sort of attention to him and he wasn't even trying to sabotage them yet. Like a bunch of small bodies caught by a molten ray, they stood there, trying to catch any kind of peace, neither of them has opened their eyes yet. Had they been dead there? Were they ever going to get up? Hubert had a bad feeling of it all, as a matter of fact, it was all he had. Maybe some piece of rock had pierced either of their skulls, which may be a great explanation on why they acted as bizarre or rather catatonic in nature. Nevertheless, he couldn't wait, the noise above made sure of that. It looked as if it worked the same way for either of them. 'I'm sorry then, for our journey together had been well enough, but I didn't think we'd enjoy getting through together.' In a way, he knew they couldn't hear nor understand what he was talking about. They looked peaceful, which wasn't as great of a loss, even though there wasn't any certainty this whole structure would be held together by any means by the time he was done with it. Perhaps the explosion or the means of living had gone from the shock. Without a doubt, they were of no use any longer. He was being called down there, through the tubes. There had apparently been a second explosion somewhere around the upper levels, one of which he couldn't have been less aware of. As a matter of fact, no one cared enough to wager on the fact that people were hiding in plain sight now after the explosion had occurred. More than the road had gone off into the fiery decimation. It had spread through and reached some of the upper buildings and pulled them below. The shocking thing destabilised the entire region, from the likes of which there wasn't a man or a woman in sight not to be awakened by it. Most of them watched from the distance and leered and what happened, while the amount of destruction wasn't even comparable to the lower levels. It broke through every safe and every level of its prison. Eventually, it had even reached the dreadful bottom where Huebert was heading towards. The coldness which dripped from between the tubes should've been a dead giveaway that he wasn't going to return. Some sort of strange encounter happened, that of which made it so they weren't as many of them around as they once seemed to be. Down in their hole they had each made a lair for themselves. Luckily they were large enough that Hueber only had to crawl on his hands and knees to check every single one in order to see what had happened to them. Some of the larval stage cocoons had been partially assimilated by the walls and the metal, leaving only the disposable carcass rot until it would be no more. Even now it broke in pieces, but there was no sign where the thing which had lived inside of it was. A bad feeling roamed through, as he had become aware of the hundreds if not thousands of incubation lairs which had been spread around. There wasn't a single way to know or to attempt understanding what had happened that so many of them found themselves going through. It couldn't have been the explosion generated by him, that wasn't even deeper than two feet under the flash which had ruined the tube-filled room.No, they have gone down, as to know where he was going. Lair after lair, all of which were apparently closed off by various hard blocks of resin. Not even the great kind either, there was some sort of degenerative thing to it which melted the soles off his fingertips. So far, this journey had become a disaster in every imaginable way whatsoever, he had been forced alone and occasionally fell on distant metal platforms where he stood like a puppet with a broken spine.Yet, unexplainably, he could get back up and walk as if nothing had happened there. While in that sitting position though, he Huebert had noticed the various mucous type of slough-satiated texture which had tied itself between his fingers and crawled on his hands.That was repulsing in a way he couldn't have called in. But looking above made him remember what he had gone through, what was there to be.Nothing could stop him any longer, at least not as well as he continued walking without being interrupted.He had been there, while others had sealed their lives in the world above and refused to go exploring. The call hadn't stopped and he could only feed his won curiosity by going ahead and harming himself by hurling his body against the walls.It dirtied most of what was to be called his manners of speech and way of moving. Hueber was soon slurring words while walking on a straight path to the place where the lairs had gone and there was nothing but the emptiness.As soon as the tunnel ended he had understood. One single peer of light glistened from another farther hole above. The place was huge, this neolithic-kind of structure, rounded or squared, from which innumerable holes swamped and dripped into the pool which laid below.Down there they swam with their kind, the parasitical kind of creatures which had always lived apart. What Huebert had failed to know or notice was the fact that the room which had been blown up started regrowing, as was the tunnel, right up to the streets. No one would find this place, while they would enjoy going ahead and devour what the spoils of this so-called war had wrought.'What are you dreadful things supposed to be?'He asked himself in an unfamiliar tone. Though he was right to inquire of the strangeness and their vulgar appearance, he was in no shape nor form to fight not to go ahead and roam through.For now, he could only observe and watch for a way to get through.Though in the middle of the room, there was a growth of metal or wood, the embodiment of the slough, perhaps fashioned of human bodies, huge, to the point of giving the impression that the lair was alive in its own way.Slimy, decaying thing, the matter of which, he couldn't tell whether or not it was a lair, their god or just an amalgam of their spoils of war.Undoubtedly so, they could most likely head to war if need called, they looked more than dreadful in nature and too morbid not to have eaten men. Speaking of which the many holes, the entries in the walls had finally brought back what they were waiting for. Many bodies had been delivered, the likes of which ended up in the pools with their source of hunger.It had almost winced, he managed to see it. Somewhere in the pool below, it had to have mouths, it couldn't be just a moving pile of dirt, that was mainly its cover. It hid from sight at any cost, but he would find out why.Sturdy as they appeared to be, none of the larvae had grown past their stages, rather, there remained the way they were, in the most dreadful manner as well. With as much as their needle complexion seemed to bear through, they were pulled from their holes as soon as the corpses rained.So many of them had come from the below the murky pools, the depths of which didn't appear like it hid so many of them there.The whole thing was a mystery of its own. How have they survived malnourishment for so long?There were just too many of them down there, swimming amongst pairs, innumerable, other than their counterparts who had hidden in the dark, closer to the ceiling, as it had appeared. He had to look hard in order to notice them blending with the environment, the speed of which might've taken days or weeks for them in order to get up there. But a lot of them were trying to escape, much faster than the rest of them as well. Either they were carrying colonies or had fed themselves into gluttonous despair. Regardless of it, this place was of no reason and he had no idea if there had even been a treasure down there, other than what he saw with his own eyes. It wasn't pleasant to look upon them in any sort of way. He wouldn't try anything yet, that's why he waited, looking rather ill from face to bottom. 'What am I doing here?' The self-doubt began, as soon as he looked at the rounded side of the wall, then past and beyond it. He could see that there was one close, far too close for comfort. It edged itself to blow in motion, pushing its body in a sort of pump, which grasped as soon as there was some. The thought of how they had survived for a possible month on the walls had occurred to him. A reason which may also have accounted for their colour change as well as their strange forms and muddy coloured carapace. He wanted to try there, he was starving after having been there for so long. It's been a while since he had a piece of her, and the memory of the ordeal still hadn't left his mind. Would it? Could it ever be possible for him to forget? Only now could he feel how wrong the act he had committed was, he was unsure of it until that point. Unable to comprehend the means of what had driven him to do it. The cumulative effect on his memory was getting him closer to the means of self-harm. Whatever the green plant on the wall was, it was damaging him from the inside, mostly so when it came to his brain. Something about it felt like it had a direct impact on his neurons, thing which had done irreversible damage which couldn't be accounted for in any other sort of way. Neither men spoke, he could see them still standing there in that room. With the only problem being that he didn't dare move a step closer from that point. They were still walking but he only came to be in his body in the previous time. Sitting down below managed to prop him to feel that he was still there, near the edge of the hole. But this was forwarded, seeing how he was more of a passenger than anything else. A stranger, likely, most of the work having been done in this observation. His feet were static but apparently, he was moving at the same pace as the others. Of course, after forcing himself to take additional bites despite having noticed the damned effects the plant had on his mind, he started hearing a turn from their normal speech to a blur. They couldn't be understood by any normal means now, even their features were being moulded together and misunderstood. He could even forget he was a human but that wasn't important yet. Priorities, remember about your priorities, my friend. We need to get through to that point and get rid of it. The woman, the woman she loved, he loved, there, dead. They had eaten her, piece by piece, like some sort of pork chop, out of which, nothing had ever tasted as it had before. He was salivating and despite his partial control, he couldn't help but remember the taste she had by the time his hand reached points he wasn't supposed to. It appeared that the fellow in the room had taken considerations and looked away while he undertook liberties. Strange how the most important act of desecration had been pushed away from the farthest corners of his mind. Only more gulp of the plant, on which he almost choked. A part of his brain had been flooded by now, which meant that he was solemnly compromised. She was unrecognisable as a female, but rather as an animal carcass, which had been recovered and used by them for sustenance. That must've been it, there wasn't any other explanation for the strange unrecognisable creature. Almost there. But her name, her overall form and the fact that he knew she was there with them accounted for more than a virtual proof that she was there. He had to take everything out of his mind, their encounter, far memories of having seen her around the city as well, most of what was left now had left him on his knees chocking and stumbling like an infant. 'Have I done too much damage?' Most of what he spat was a bloody mouth-full of plants and red chewy meat which had come from inside of him. The rest was a blur, but he had managed to come too far in front of him and fell below the grandness of it all. A blow came to his body from below, as a cushion had almost come to be. He held on it as hard as he could, without trying to look for a way out. What happened is that he fell through one of the residents of the place and somehow managed to break through the carapace, landing inside a small hardened but soft slime. Those had been its organs apparently, mostly because of that green stuff which had grown on the sides on its carapace inside. How many of them had become that way? Overrun by the grown and taken in motion? Were the ones that tried escaping even alive or was it the plant which had taken over their bodies and turned them into walking machines of dread? He couldn't even fathom the thought either, as he tried to keep himself still against the walls. If he were to slip, there'd be no return any longer, as he'd sink too deep inside to struggle. There'd be no chance to escape as soon as that happened. Huebert knew better than that and took no chances, as soon as he snapped out of the delusional vision, he grabbed started punching until he made a hole through the husk. From there he climbed and got through the way he came. There was no one down there, at least no one either human or alive. Soon enough, he would slip and fall, straight into that sickly mud. At least he was certain of it, as there were no sources to make it known, the last men who had moved or had shown signs of being as living had been killed by the blast. He had survived now, but not for long. Many of the ripples had made it hard for him to hide away from the upcoming parasites. They had been squirming in their own filth for far too long and now it was time for something more dangerous to happen. More than before, when there were only corpses which offered no resistance. Those had been easy prey, to which most of those who had come towards were taken away. No one could tell whether it was going to be a worse death if he were to throw himself and be eaten by them. He had already sickly mistreated his body and his mind, out of which not enough was left to function. Not to mention that there wasn't any way out and slowly he was sinking while those darn fresh-meat hounds were trying to come towards. There wasn't anything less disturbing in it all. They were coming and he wasn't ready in a bit. Once the realisation came in, there'd be no way to get away from their fangs. And they had been shown as crisp and long, black and steady as they were. It was a dreadful thing, nonetheless, as the saliva kept pouring and mixing with the rest of the pool below. The mix was a maddening thing by now, a concoction of the dreadful and the least humane which belonged to a man. Once he had focused enough into it, he had realised that there were too many impurities inside, being mixed with the most deceitful stuff. An odour, the stench, the wretched thing which popped out of its carapace. He could see some of them squirming as hard in their own shell, breaking it apart in the excitement. It was almost as if the head of his body or his meat had awakened the most dreadful instincts known to any being out there. This wasn't meant for their survival, but merely for something much worse, their pleasure. It was the taste they were after, that's why as many as four of them had sprouted, five or six, more than that. It came to the fact that they were drawn to him as if he had stolen their precious honey and had taken it on himself to taunt them. If there's hope for me to escape, it's down there, but what if I can't return? Who might mourn for me? There was little in mind, without a doubt, as long as he tried or attempted to do anything rash, they would break him apart. But he was sinking down too slow, far too slow for his comfort. They wouldn't let him get away, as soon as it happened, there'd be no chance to escape. He had to get that, he eventually did. He snapped out of his delusional stance, in which he waited. And in an attempt to push himself through, he pushed through the liquid and swam below. Multiple floating twisting shadows came inside and swam towards him. Even as dirty as he had become, his flesh would still taste well for them. Even better now that he was wholly covered in their own liquid, that of which belonged to their birth. It was there that he saw a way out, not one in which he would escape, but some sort of excuse to hide away from there. There were thorns there, the root of all the problems. Farther away, he could see that the giant creature in the middle of the room had no beginning, other than its rounded bottom and many of its long limbs which held it in its place. Other than those, he knew it was alive, but there wasn't any chance of knowing if it would be safer. He had to hide between the thorns, even if his breath caught him off guard. He struggled as much as he could until eventually he had been gulped entirely by one mouth-full. There wasn't anything else he could do about it, as he was noticed by the prime entity of the place. One of its large mouths had enveloped him and swallowed him inside, pushing the parasites away. Inside there, he could finally rest and breathe in peace, for he was in a sort of sanctuary inside of which he undoubtedly knew there had been other men who had discovered it. He couldn't be entirely sure of the overturn, but he knew of one thing in the least. It was as much of a fortress inside as it had been outside. The hardened skin inside looked like a darkened purple as well as its touch had felt like stone. He could feel the walls pulsating at every touch, especially the bumps around of which he tried his best yet to ignore, the openings and more of the holes from which came the bile. It puked inside its body seamlessly and didn't even feel him there, as much as he had been aware. There was some danger, in case the creature had some acid which would take care of him immediately. But this was an unexplored territory for him. One turn and it appeared he was lost. Something about how the insides were twisted and inter-connected before the supreme realisation came that he was going through its inner gut tubes. 'It looks like those mouths outside weren't yours after all.' Silently he spoke and looked around. Far behind there was noise, and explainable so, as it had seemed that he wasn't alone. Another one of those dreadful things, which bore as much resentment for him as he bore for them. Most peculiarly, as it seemed that he hadn't noticed it snicking behind him. Slowly, it moved its legs and prepared its sharp incisors, but stopped. It knew he had noticed it and waited there, excepting two or four small legs from underneath that fold of peculiar cover it bore and started cleaning its beak-like resting form. United in a way, those incisors looked as sharp as a bird while it was waiting for him to make a move and turn his back. As soon as that happened, it would snap and start chasing him. Huebert could see away as well that there was a long way down there, from which there'd be no chance to get away from. As soon as it got a hold of him anyway. With a few scenarios down in his mind, he'd be caught and forced-stopped inside the tube. From there, he'd be quickly immobilised in place and be eaten with the least amount of hope in store. There'd be more, as a sort of gore went through his spine. He could still remember images of a woman being abused and eaten. Perhaps she had been alive, or parts of her in any case. It was a case of hypocrisy that he knew of but he didn't want to share the same fate as her. An awful way to go altogether, especially while he was as alive as one could be. The images of her had failed to be completely erased, and worst of all was that he feared now, oh, how much he feared yet he ran. Though knowing that it'd follow might've done something to have him prepared, he wasn't as sure of it any longer. The way was far too twisted and too strange for any kind of thing to happen. Too much had undergone in the first tube that he knew, as well as it wasn't structured as he expected. Not only was it flat after reaching a bottom but it felt like he was going downstairs, ready to climb again from the looks of it. Which wasn't dangerous nor did it come to his surprise that the parasite had a worse pace while attempting to follow him through. At least he could look through and see for himself that there was little he would know and do. His hands were a mess as well, yet he held to hard pieces which had been lodged inside the nearest flatness he could lay hands upon. Those were the first pools he had seen and he was at least certain that he wasn't even supposed to be near them. Not only was the danger pressing from behind but he felt like his skin was burning while he swam through. He shouted in agony but swam through. It had been the only way and what he had paid with were a few layers of his outer-cover and most of his hair. Huebert had kept his head high to avoid being completely blinded, but splashes in the pools had done more than enough to break through. Unaware of that, it came as no surprise any longer that it wouldn't be affected, as long as it was covered, it could travel through the pools while fully diving through. 'Burn you, drown in, drink of it, something which should take care of you once and forever. Why won't you leave me alone and sink down where you belong?' He hadn't had the opportunity to take any precaution whatsoever and for that, the suffering approached. There'd be nought to do and least to say, once it came near enough to splash its body around him. While the rest of the pools were barely knee-deep, this gave him an amount of start to get through and start climbing. It wasn't easy, nor could he beg for anything more. Was he at the end of his wits? Could he suffer more? It wasn't as if he was he had had a chance any longer. Once a sharp trimmed angled tongue came from inside and impaled him in it, missing his heart and the chance to instantly kill him right then and there. He had looked mightily down for someone who had almost been broken apart. There had been no shouting, nor any struggle, in other words, he was tired. Tired of being followed and pushed towards whatever hardness he'd be forced to endure. No one came to guide him, nor to help, he was slowly dragged to the point of tongues, at the bottom of which all of the tubes ended. Though there hadn't been acid there, it seemed as if another entity had taken its place. It was made of many black and oil-like tongues, all coming together from a small organ which pumped back and forth and seemed to have all of its tongues used. Many of the corpses which had fallen in the pool, as well as some of the unlucky parasites, ended up being drained of any kind of nutrition which had once laid inside their bodies. Slowly they were suffering, as he himself could feel his body being drained completely. Seeing how it had reached a point of no return, it found out something which wasn't meant to be in him, some sort of puerile thing, which was alien to his body got in the way of a full absorption. Huebert was just as soon abandoned and thrown by the side of the toe-deep murk it stood in. He was hurt, he was broken, most of his life-force had been taken away from him in that attempt, leaving nothing of him but his broken body. There was some unexplainable act which happened just as soon as the parasite which had trailed him followed through. It was something totally unexpected, but it seemed that it went with it. With one of the tongue pulling as much of a bulk as it could, Hueber had been impaled again, only this time he wasn't finished off, rather he would be fed with as much as he could take. It was another hole which had been made in his abdomen, still alive, by the likes of which he would be turned it something bigger. He had no way of telling whether or not he was still alive or human, after all, which had happened and regardless of how much time had passed, he no longer felt that way. Something strange to his body, which was to say, there would be nought to anyone else in there, to know that sooner or later, the other fiend would die. Once he stopped growing anyway, but who knew how far inside, for the host creature grew the same and soon enough it would penetrate the walls and the Colosseum as well. It had become a dream of woe, the growth as he emerged and pulled himself closer, only to assimilate all of the tongues and have them sprout out of his body. This would be his hiding place, where corpses came and carried their diseased inside, making him stronger since he could never die.'I can't explain what happened on the streets, first, there was an explosion, which was followed by another and now? Now there's nothing there, no crater and not even a mark that something had happened there.They have covered it all up somehow, which is unexplainable."Shut up Bertha, this is neither your concern nor deal then, I'm plainly sick of hearing of your tricks time and time again, of how things disappear when they're not supposed to or this kind of delusion you're trying to force onto me."I'm not trying to force anything on you my dear, just listen and look. Some things aren't right any longer and I think that explosion might've upset the entire world, to force such an irreversible change."What change are you talking about anyway? I see no such thing of any kind, believe me when I tell you that you lost it this time."I'll prove it, Frank, you'll see, I'll be out there if you have any urgent inquiry."Bertha, please don't do that, the children, they."They can wait, but I won't, I had this meeting planned, you see? Since I'm not the only one who saw this thing happening. I found a great partner in him and without a doubt, with his help, I'll find a way to prove you wrong."Is this what's it about?"No, this isn't just about my pride, this is about finding the truth, which I think we've been lacking for the longest time.'She closed the door. Back on the street, the empty bulb of light floated in a sky of ultramarine, too saturated for the case. The buildings had been tall and gave the impression that they could still take a farther step and pull themselves from below.It was brought to her attention that she was being watched.Above her head, from one of the many towers places around the town, flashes of light, which accounted for the reflections behind the various old binoculars used gave them away. There were a few of them as well, which had been stalking her ever since her mission or search for truth started.Now and again, the men and the women who walked past her seemed not to notice and act normal.But she, herself and her husband remembered what life was like, or what it looked like before the chance. It had gone with a flash in her memory.Bertha loved her brown leather around the around the house. Everything either enveloped or satiated with a coat of brown leather would make her deepen her senses to a sense of supreme content. It didn't matter where it came from either, as she could've found out it had come from animal or man, though there had been some disturbing incidents in the past.There were parts which didn't below in there. At least not anything she had ever seen before either.Under one of her pillows on a moody day.She and her husband were standing in front of static on the tv because of the weather. Now, she wasn't always one to chatter with her husband who was busy himself around one of the rooms, trying to fix some kind of old toolbox he found.But her, she couldn't help but feel the need to clean around the house, as something felt horribly wrong or out of place. It hadn't taken her long to find the source of that feeling, as it was revealed to be under one of the pillows on the couch. One small and thin limb, with two black scissor-like incisors, had almost penetrated the bottom of the couch. It was an outrageous little violent thing, as soon as it was found, it started thrashing around as to reach her. The thing had no shame and it wouldn't give away at any attempt to make it stop.'Frank, come here, Frank there's something vile here, please!'He had stopped whatever he was doing and almost leapt from his room and right next to his wife.At the time, it had appeared that most of the dreadful things inside of the room had crept on as near as they could. Everything even remotely covered in fur or skin appeared to bear some kind of maddening creeping movement which would come in defence of their nearest kin.'Frank, they're moving, I swear, I saw the stuffed animals almost come to life. I don't feel safe here any longer, could we just leave?"Leave our house Berthas? Because some small leg which hadn't been properly removed at the time of its conception?That's ridiculous, look, I'll just take care of it now and we won't have to worry any longer about either of them.'Without an ounce of sense, he came closer and ripped the leg apart from the skin and threw it away. It hadn't crawled but a shriek was audible, as the scream of woe came as it had been removed.Others had suddenly shrieked as well before becoming silent. Most of those went back into their hiding, much more aware of the coming threat that laid into the house.'See? Those are nothing more but a couple of insects which attached themselves to our furniture and dirtied our other stuff around the house. Nothing to be afraid of.'At least it hadn't been so yet. Neither of them pressed on to carry on with the search and properly exterminate everything which laid in sight.That night, inside their room, they had checked the mattress and their pillows and the result was that there was nothing there which had snicked behind them.During the course of it though, there had been a couple of occurrences which didn't seem to do much, other than the fact that there was a stillness of death in their eyes during the night. Both of them had their eyes open, revealed, rather to a bunch of small insect-like limbs, just like the things they themselves had revealed.It came as no surprise either that, both had been awakened by a rush of fear, which prompted the light only to look around the empty room.'What exactly is going in the house Berthas?'I don't know, but I saw something crawling on my eyes, you saw it too, right?'I think I saw it as well but I don't know what it was. Something almost crawled inside my eye, it came on my nose.Dear me, what have you uncovered in our house?'Something dangerous, it seems, it must've crawled through the open door I wager.'As soon as she went and closed the door, she managed to track down a couple of fleeing bodies which looked like humans but crawled on their bellies. Not only that but their long heads were disgustingly pushing some kind of odourless substance which made everything into a mess of growths.It seemed like there wasn't an any better solution than what she had thought off during that moment, which came as fast as he feet trampled over both of them, which she wiped as soon as she took out one of the bloody napkins from the drawer.There had been another incident as well, it would seem. She hadn't told Frank that time, but during the night she'd use the napkins to stop the profusely bleeding coming from her.It wasn't that great, nor sanitary but it had dried in the meantime, and there was nothing to it any longer.As much as it came to him noticing, he was already in the bed, shaking from the cold. Joined together, this time would be safe for both of them, knowing that the threat had been stamped out.Next, during the night, came the violent knocking on the various board of wood and metal across the room. Something was desperately trying to get their attention, the likes of which didn't seem to breed some kind but others types of sounds.There were vibrations and seemingly, the entire house had been shaken by something inside of it. Without a doubt, it couldn't have been those little pieces which proved to be nothing more than slight annoyances. But, if there was something which crept more so than it was expected, it would have to be that violence.It hadn't mattered what had previously happened, as both had been awakened by the likes of a quake.'Bertha, grab hold of me, we need to get down.'She barely came to her senses, still delusional over the fact that she had missed hours of sleep, yet again disturbed by it. Another strange occurrence which had happened around the house.Neither of them had dared move or come close to the windows once they heard the car alarms go out in the night. That was enough of a threat on itself, for something as big to happen as to alert them in such a manner.Not only was it dangerous but Bertha could still see those tiny creatures crawling on walls and pushing themselves past everything which had remotely caused an entryway of common sense.They were forcefully growing, as the case had been, to adapt to their violent aggressors. One of the small limbs, which had seemingly survived had grown what appeared to be four or even five incisors with which it crawled on walls. To be called in such a manner wasn't even much to them. It hadn't even become clear what was it to them that kept them alive, other than the dread and the desire to fight and exterminate them in turn. She had trampled two of their kind while Frank had ripped out one of them. It wasn't as if they wouldn't have been justified in any case. He wasn't in the mood to get out his hard calibre gun but they had grown beyond any questionable proportions. Nothing could be worse than what was there, nothing of any kind and they had outpassed any questionable levels which might've driven any sane man or woman to madness. He had pulled it out of the drawer and started loading each shell inside. The gun looked like some kind of rail-shooting kind of phaser which couldn't have been legal in any case. At least nothing which would be allowed to be carried outside. 'Frank, what are you going to do?' Bertha asked, with her down to her weak knees, the pain in her throat and many of her toes having been wrapped together. This feigned territory had been alien to her so far. Without a doubt, she wouldn't have expected any kind of invasion, especially from this type of kind, a most peculiar group of pieces which must've pulled themselves, no longer attached to the various objects or appliances around the house. It was dreadful to watch and even worse to feel, he could tell. 'Bertha, I need you to turn on another level on the light, make it as bright as you can.' The neighbours would hear, as she expected the sound it produced to bounce against the walls and travel throughout the entirety of the building. At the first sign of an aggression, the first shot went on. It looked like some rubbery hole had been a bore through one of them, which fell on the floor, with the bullet never having penetrated it. A fiasco in the least, so it seemed, for the likes of which there was no more doubt, as something worse was yet to come. It smelled like burning inside the room, that's when they finally turned towards them for an attack. Most of them dropped in that single instance, everywhere across the room, trying to bite and grab as much of the furniture and mostly trying to find a way to lunge at them. Frank screamed as one pierced his shoulder and crawled on his belly. It would've come down to piercing him and going through if she hadn't come and thrown it on the bed. It bounced there for a moment before Frank got the chance to recoil and pull the trigger a second time. For this one shot, it passed through, going through the mattress and the decrepit thing, while mixing feathers with blood as they went through together. Worse than that, it had become even more obvious that there was nothing either of them could do. This was a disgrace, a kind of unevenly sick type of behaviour to look upon. He was bleeding in front of her but couldn't stop until every single tiny one of them had been killed off and sent burning in the distance. The dreadful, dreadful thing which it had been, he felt pain in his chest. 'What's going on? Has it got you my dear, are they at fault?' 'No, stay back, it's my chest acting up again, you need to run, get away.' She considered the repercussions for a moment and it was then that, in the midst of fever, as some sick animal sounded by others inside a cage, he acted up. He pointed his gun at her, bloodshot eyes threateningly watching and trying not to shoot what looked to be his wife. He hadn't been aware of what going on in the least, not that it mattered to him. Soon enough it'd be over. Bertha came out of the room and seemed to have pushed herself in a silent corner in which she cried. There was a dreadful hour there where she heard no more shots, only seeing the half-way open door and her husband laying down. From that point on, she passed out of all. But in her dream, the image continued and she saw them walk on him, entering him, suddenly shrinking as they expelled their sick substances inside his mouth and through his nostrils, forcing him to swallow. There was nothing remotely more dreadful than that and it had become rather obvious that she was hopeless. Without a doubt, she wanted to do something, but she just laid there, half-asleep, silently waiting for her sight to fade into the night. In a few minutes, the light would turn out if left unattended and after that. It went off. That night was the worst thing which had happened to either of them, that of which she knew or could remember. Mostly because in the morning, it just so happened that all of those creatures disappeared. She hadn't asked Frank when did he have the chance to place his gun back into its original spot or whether or not there had been bullets missing, but that wasn't the point. One bullet at least went through the bed and that was there. But the liquid which had splattered through wasn't there any longer. It had gone away, as well as they had. Of course Frank would just shrug it off, he was Frank, being Frank. Acting it like Frank, all along. But since that commotion, she hadn't forgotten that something was fishy and not just around her house. The streets weren't as clean any longer and this time she would find out exactly what's going to happen. It was mid-afternoon, the new square, forty miles from this point and you could take a few turns which would lead you to a small concession where they sold the most disturbing things, ranging from fake ears which somehow looked like the real deal, dead rats of milk-pale hairless rats. Despite not being important, it was a tight spot hidden in the dark alleys between the large spaces which had been left behind every building in the city. Somehow it looked as if they live in their own world there, and as long as no one was there to disturb them, there'd be nothing wrong going on. That's the way it seemed at least. It wasn't as if she dared head into one of them or try talking with the vagrants who were hiding from the light. That was a constant at least, the dampness and the dark which spread around as if it was nothing. She was deepening in thought, which lead to her going on the darkest of the roads she could lay her flat feet upon. There weren't many around, especially lately when someone had taken a special amount of care, mostly around the strangeness which would breed enough to distract them. The four of them were coming from behind. Four men who had their hands pushed underneath their coats. As much as she had noticed, no one else around her appeared to keep an eye on them or their intent. It was rather rude and awfully still, to think about it in such a way, but she chose to walk away faster, perhaps more so because people were starting to pay attention. Not to them, but to her. It was the mere amount of noise she made, squandering about because they were dangerous but no one seemed to care. At a point, she wanted to leave and see whether someone might react. To the avail of which, she knew they wouldn't. Why was it that they walked in such a manner, right between the passing peons who were minding their own deals. They were moving in a totally slippery way, that was in, or their bodies were thinner underneath their clothes and somehow they were managing to hold their bones and bodies underneath. They were carrying themselves rather mindful to the likes of others. No one had been pushed or bumped upon, even though they rubbed themselves and their bodies against the con-goers. Still, there was no reaction whatsoever. It felt odd. First, they were only them, then she noticed more coming from the front, trying to flank her. Decadently, she took a turn as well as she could and entered the dark. It was strange but they stopped. An inner circle formed around the outside, everyone watching from every single side, making sure there'd be no sign she might return. 'Shouldn't you come near? Weren't you supposed to follow me?' There was no authority in her voice, none whatsoever. It came as easily as it could that she found herself lucky. It was an entrance in one of the old abandoned buildings. As a matter of fact, all either or ten of them which laid around were kind of absent in terms of there being any kind of life. It didn't bother any of them whatsoever, that she'd be locked in there for the rest of her short life. One more time, as she came face to face to them, noticing that they couldn't even reach with their hands through. 'You'll never get to me, I'll make sure of that. From now on, nothing will stop me from finding out the truth and exposing you for what you are.' Indeed, they had to be part of it, the cause. It looked like a lot more people than she expected were involved with it and her meeting with this partner of hers would be delayed. For now, this was it, getting through. Someone had been around recently in any case, it was clear just after looking at the broken boards of wood and getting through the holes. Sometimes Berthas swore she could see something on the other side, it being a turned-on light or her not seeing well. That wasn't what she desired. This would come as no surprise, but there were other, more recent marks, cuts on the walls, against the wires, a short circuit on a black panel. More than that, there had been plenty of things which fell from above and broke through. By someone running, in part. Even the tiniest screech disturbed her and left her staring at a corner. A pure black of the mill feline champion. Tender meat and jade-like eyes from which came terror. It showed signs of someone laying behind her but she didn't believe it until she felt that arm on her shoulder, a thing which didn't belong to a man. From the sides, it was arched in a direction and it felt slippery as if it had no bones inside. That's what left it there for a few moments, the fact that she was distracted and the lack of anything solid inside. The second arms suddenly flailed and wrapped around her shoulder. Berthas turned and saw nothing, in a sudden burst of emotion she realised that there was nothing she could do any longer. It would be soon enough that she could try going for it again. But for now, everything she could do was stand in a crawling parcel inside this old and cheap motel and weep. The noise came out of her nose and ears. The ringing wouldn't stop, at least not until someone was near, someone she wished to be here and comfort her, Frank. He'd be in bed by now, trying to count his blessings, wondering where did his wife go and what was his deal with it. One could draw conclusions where they didn't belong. 'That's not him, that's not my Frank. Ahh, who's there?' Her eyes sprinkled with some annoyance. It was clear that one of the bad folk must've followed her through after deciding they needed to mess with her. There could be no other explanation. At least none that she could think off the top of her head as quickly as she had done now. Crickets going by the sound. By the time she realised she was closing her eyes, a hand had almost slipped above her head and grabbed her. Exhausted as she was, she woke up and pulled herself, running up the stairs without trying to think of the service which ran around this place. She dreaded to turn around but came to the first floor. Automatically, the lights turned on as soon as her first step had reached around. Repulsed by the thought of being followed, she picked up the first door she could lay hands upon and entered it. Room number forty-seven, it wasn't locked either. Not until she entered it and turned down the lock from inside. Twenty clicks, she wasn't alone. Another man was hiding in this apartment with her. Rather young by the looks of it, he, as opposed to her looked prepared in any case. His full gear betrayed him, by the corners of his eyes, the glasses, the brown shirt and pants, the backpack and the attitude which brought her to the state of mind that she was the one spelunking there. 'Oh, hello there ma'am, I wasn't expecting to find any company here, in this abandoned.' He was interrupted again by a pair of screams which rang throughout the building. It seemed rather obvious that there had been some kind of confusion there. The voices did belong to people, at least from what either of them could tell, they belonged to a couple who was arguing together. 'Dear me, you came here all alone?' 'I was accompanied by two of my fellows, Giaro and Rossi. Excuse me ma'am, I almost forgot to introduce myself. My name would be Pierrot.' Berthas introduced herself and immediately turned her hidden frown into a grimace. She was being nervous over the things she was seeing on the walls. There wasn't any way to determine whether or not they were real or figments of her imagination this time and she wouldn't even dare scare her company anyway. The company that had two others with her. With a sudden stop to the argument upstairs, there came the high pitched pair of screams. Not one but four distinct screams were audible, the likes of which just alarmed not only the two of them but everyone in the adjacent rooms. 'It may be dangerous, you should.' 'I'll handle myself well enough young man, there's no need for you to bother yourself with an old lady such as myself, as a matter of fact, I'm far more capable than I look.' So, no questioning involved it appeared, she only followed through the next room, where the living room wall had been taken down and revealed the next building which had been almost tied together. Multiple holes led to the basement below, from which the underneath structure which held the building together was revealed. This place was a mess, but at least there they were. It must've been them, Giaro and Rossi. Two of the other young fellows who took their times and gave their bows as standing ovations, only to be met by frustration. 'Have you heard the screams? I swear something was going on upstairs, but I couldn't put my finger on it.' Their accent was flowing right through their mouths if their names weren't a dead giveaway that they were foreigners. It came as no surprise that there was a damned thing about that as well, as Berthas was expecting the worst to happen. At least, she had a deep feeling in her gut that one of them could die right there and be forgotten. Perhaps it was just the omen of the black wood where there was no fire. The bottom stench was more than enough to bring her back in thought. 'Shall we go then or are we going to stop here and listen to those poor girls screaming?' 'Berthas, if you don't mind, the path ahead is quite dangerous. The ceiling could fall at any moment, not to mention of the ground, it's no place for an old lady like yourself. Rossi, could you stay behind with her and make sure she won't do something which may damn herself for the rest of her beautiful life?' The tone of irritation and somewhat condescence left her quite annoyed. Pierrot and Giaro were already half-way through the stairs once the sounds of screams started again. And most of all, it looked as if there'd be no argument against standing there with the young man. 'It should be on the fourth of the fifth floor, I think.' Said Giaro, his chin was rather up and he laid in a jovial mood, from which there wasn't much of anything which could take him down. One could go ahead and say that he was pleased of leaving Rossi behind. 'You sure about that?' 'He could die from all I care, I never cared about that double-crossing man. The least he could do now is take care of the old lady, but I have my doubts about him being capable enough to hold her in place.' The second floor, most of the rooms in the hall were closed, picked clean most likely, by the time everyone left. It looked like the building had remained in good conditions, but the problem wasn't with the insides. It laid with the foundation, which was getting much worse. The fourth flood already, that's when the screams had started coming again. 'I told you they were here.' 'You should be careful so you don't do something you'll regret later. We have no way of knowing what might be on the other side.' 'I don't particularly care of your opinion, at least not when I'm as close to saving a few donnas.' Downstairs it wasn't getting any better. For they were there with her, though they couldn't have followed through. Most of the small bits which had been attached to the furniture seemed to be only in her minds there. But their actions appeared to be making way to crawl on the young man, Rossi. She desperately wanted to warn him but bit her tongue at the thought of being seen as insane. Her every move was seen and nothing which would jeopardise their stroll above would be permitted. All she knew though was that they positioned themselves to fall on his head and pierce right through his skull, which was more than enough. This wasn't what he expected back there. As soon as the door opened, Giaro found himself trapped. His hand was still on the handle but he had found the source of the screams. It was an old gramophone pushing the sounds out, and the echoes which gave them life. The system of strings attached to the door constantly worked at a mechanism which seemed to work constantly whilst moving from up and down, swirling sticks in the box which across the room. Those strings and metal wires were spread in the rounded room and all of them lead to one point. A cannon aimed at him, directly placed so that, if he were to release his hand off the handle, he'd not only lose it but just as much as half of his chest, if the projection was right. 'Don't move, don't get any closer, do you hear me, Pierrot?' He was getting much more nervous by the moment, mostly from his constant twitching of the fingers and because he wanted to let go. 'What is it? I could go ahead and.' 'No, just get as far as you can from here, it's dangerous for both of us to stand.' He stopped talking, seeing how that only made it worse. A few steps to the side and Pierrot understood, there wasn't any way to determine exactly how the mechanism which in turn fired at him. It could be timed, it could be instant, he might've had a chance or not. Bottom line was the fact that the walls could be taken down as well, so even if the chances of survival were on his side and he avoided the cannon fire, he'd still have the chance of blocking off his access as the building almost collapsed. It was dreadful in the least of senses, that there crept a feeling of almost disgust. Definitely so. Directed towards Pierrot who saw the threat and immediately fled from sight, most likely to alert the others so they could get away. He had to have had the worst feeling in his head by now, the most tainted and the dirtiest ways in which he thought of both of them for having been brought there. It wasn't even his idea in the first place. Both of them could rot and get off from what I care. He reached Rossi already who was much more surprised to see him than he expected. It had gotten to a much more disturbing level at which Berthas had to have witnessed them entering the man through his various holes in the head and cover up for themselves. In other words, there wasn't any proper way to determine whether or not they would go ahead and try milking it for more time. 'We need to get out, now.' 'What's going on, where's your friend gone at?' 'There's no time to explain that, lady, you either follow us or you stay here at your own risk, but know that I've done my duty so far.' The sounds of the screams came again from the sound-machine upstairs. It was almost as close as the last sign that there'd be no way to go after that. 'What happened to Giaro, Pierrot? Is he still somewhere upstairs?' 'He's making sure we can escape with our lives, I don't have the time to explain.' Pierrot had already crossed the room and passed Berthas, looking for a way out, straight ahead where there hadn't fallen anything on or near the entrance. 'Are the two of you coming or enjoying the atmosphere?' Reluctantly so, they did without noticing. And as the sounds of the screams ended, there came the blow. It sounded as if it came from upstairs, a single shot which sounded like it could've blown a piece of the very building they were in. As the stonework shook, they looked like the stairs and way upstairs have been buried completely under their own eyes. Whatever happened upstairs, it took a great deal of the facts that no one was called for any longer. 'Pierrot, what was going down in your head? Did you leave Giaro there to die? He.' He listened to the recollection as soon as he was questioned. There wasn't any way that could've been, hard-wired as it were, their friend had died. 'What are we going to tell his family then? That he lost his life exploring an abandoned building or that he blew half of his body off before being buried there?' 'I know this sounds off, but I can't help it if that's how it happened.' That one, Rossi, was it? He was getting mad. Too mad, too quickly for Bertha not to notice and to perhaps be driven to the conclusion that he may have been indeed infested by those strange concoctions she dreamed of seeing. It didn't reveal itself at first, inside the building, where he was rather calm, but here when his true mood revealed itself. He wouldn't even dare look at her for the first few minutes, not that it seemed they avoided her. But no suspicion would be tolerated and his voice seemed to be too raspy to be held by a man alone. 'You're the one at fault and you'll pay for this, we're not leaving without him, do you understand? Even if we have to find a way to climb up there, I think it's worth it if there's a chance he may still be alive.' There was a canon there and the ceiling of the corridor might've fallen on top of him. If either of those hadn't killed him. 'That's a damnably great if, if you were to ask me.' Neither of them wanted to give in, knowing she was listening as well. 'You're as involved as us by this time, so I think it'd be fair to ask you, what do you think we should do?' Again, she couldn't focus on Pierrot, seeing how those things still had their pieces crawling out of Rossi's ear and nose. He looked as if he already came half-way of adapting to its form, growing two tunnel-like skin formations being the top of his head, which extended to his back. His face had always looked rather twisted, being where it wasn't supposed to be, has been lacking in any aspects which might've even remotely been related to beauty. It was an ironing thing which spoke to her. The way it moved its lips, with the fangs cutting through as if they were of some kin in terms of regrowing material. That was well enough for he cared little and looked even less interested in the fact that there had been a dreadful lot of houses around to look at. For once, Rossi wasn't even surprised nor had he cared any longer. As soon as they progressed inside his head, he was aware of the fact that there'd be no return in his mind. He would be just as dead if roles were reversed. Only that, there was one thing which ate at his, inside the mind. There was something in there, which he himself couldn't explain. A dreadful feeling. 'Please follow me.' He said with the least emotion and a rather monotone rat-like voice which seemed to creep about as far as one could talk. Despite speaking in tongues, which didn't help, he seemed to have a great idea where they were headed, definitely not in the streets either. Berthas knew that it was dangerous to be headed there, at least, the likes of which she couldn't be certain of her safety. One look was more than enough to reveal the fact that they were still there, just as dreadful, emissaries of woe which appeared to be present only to creep while they were covered by the sheep around them. Neither of the men had observed it yet, rather, it had become obvious that she was still afraid of what they hid. At least if her doubts were wrong, but she felt as if she saw beneath their clothes. Long bodies with arm-width finger-like thick legs which went around the spine tendrils from bottom to the well above. With the human heads, of which they hadn't been any longer, that they stole from some lesser being. It was dreadful, unnerving, she wanted to fade. That's when she followed beneath the many growths of the fauna which wasn't supposed to grow in a place where organic growth took over most objects. Straight into another one, they went and this time they closed the door. Neither of them spoke but froze by the time she arrived, driven by the looks of which she noticed the man. It was the dead one, Giaro. His face was split into halves. From inside his eyes, the pupils were rotating through his skull, he walked slowly as a rather cruel apparition which spoke no word but rather grinned. It felt surreal as if he had been some creeping thing of sin which was there only to scare them away. 'What have I to say, other than to wish you welcome back, my dear fellows, my lady.' It was his voice so far, that was true enough. The various pieces of stone had been lodged in his throat unevenly, but more important was the fact that there was something off about his chest. Something was missing, the canon, so it had been. It was shrugged off and hidden, but a quick look underneath as he revealed a stump, a growth, something which wasn't supposed to be there. By looking alone it was determined that it had been something organic which had developed and saved his life. Despite his wicked appearance, he didn't say a word which would intend to make either of them panic, only if it weren't for the fact that he was dreadful enough to make the rest of the trip unpleasant. Which wasn't an option any longer. 'Should we take the bait and follow? It could be a trick, just take a look at him.' Both of them thought he was far beyond saving, at least by any means which didn't involve finding a weapon and finishing the job. But if that failed, who knew if he was able to die or if he would continue living in more of a morbid manner. His waiting made him less content, at least by the likes of which he appeared to have grinned and swam in his own applause. There was nothing less than that any longer. From it alone, he couldn't be more prone to those dreadful things which dawned upon him. 'Oh let's make a fire if you decided to wait, it's getting cold and I'm sure the night time might make you afraid.' 'Listen, it's not like that, you were our friend, but something happened to you which, make no mistake, won't erase the fact that we were once supposed to be together. We were all like brothers and I would choose the memory of whom you are rather than what you have become.' Pierrot left Giaro quite confused, having been holding as boldly to the sticks he gathered in the pile. The fire would be started soon. Berthas didn't speak a word out of fear of retaliation. She had worse of thoughts to bear, continuing over the fact that there was something inside the man. Neither of them was healthy in the head any longer, despite how much she attempted to make it seem as normal and healthy as it were. 'You'll thank me later for this.' Said Pierrot before he charged through and knocked Giaro to the side. He felt much lighter than a man should've been, colder at that, his eyes were filled with sadness, as well, as if he was betrayed. 'Come, I think there's a way between the buildings but we need to reach the last floor.' Getting through the building felt as if they were heading through some kind of coma. It was a mess, as it dragged over their toes, the danger of the place wasn't the fact that it had decayed but rather, what it had looked like as soon as they were inside. Their mere touches over stone made them feel heavy, which wasn't something Berthas could take for too long of a period. No one wanted to be the one who failed to escape, especially since doors opened and many others were there. Compared to them, the part of three was healthy and well. But these were mad-men who seemed to have been darker and much more impaired than either of them could've been, if one were to ignore Giaro. They move in pairs of four or five, moving like some symbioses. One mouth was bigger than the others, most eyes were closed other than hers. She spoke in tongues but didn't bother with them. Despite that, her disgusting skin made it as if she wouldn't be touched by the lesser creatures who delved and followed Berthas through her mind. That creature stopped at what could be made as being forty to fifty meters away from where they stood. It was clear that it tired itself with the effort but chose to lay awake. At least, it could not be said of the others. They enjoyed roaming around the areas where the humidity and the heat were high. Somehow they had achieved with, which was in all sense a mystery in its sense. One thing was highly disturbing, given that he was a reeking scent of corpses, the three were not set on the fact that it was safe to roam around. Not to mention the dangers of those around them but it came to mind to stick around past them in their rooms. Many of them were in that condition, four, three, groups of two, all who had to have been born that way, as there had been some sings, alas, the umbilical cords still floating around, long as if were, was kept fleshy and still meaty on every creature they've seen. As far as they went, they were passive, until one point, when looking behind, he had been watching, followed and made a lot of noise. In a room filled with them, it appeared that their attention had changed from being passive to Giaro. Whatever was left in the two halves of his mind weren't going to let them get away from him without even relaying any kind of warning first. They had become aggressive as soon as it began. The nearest was taken down, as soon as there laid Pierrot into the right position, righteously looking into it again. He was in pain from the bashing, while Rossi had returned from the door. 'It's locked, we're going to have to help Pierrot take down the wall then.' Both of which nodded, which only infuriated Giaro more. He was intent on taking them, while those around them were too distracted by the constant noise making a machine in front of them to be bothered by the pounding on the wall. There had been a dreadful approach if the only one knew, dreadful at that, he couldn't tell whether or not he'd be watched. But he came out of the shadow, a body as thin as if to prove he wasn't there. It was the lack of eyes, the thinness of its body, the crooked clothes and long black hair which were the most surprising of all. The thing looked like a twisted man, who had his feet pointed in the wrong direction but bore a small pocket knife. His speed was unfathomable for the human eye and that's when he came, like a flea or a greyish black grasshopper, with his small switchblade turned in the air, cutting dryly. He approached like a drunk would, too precise and too fast. Despite the peculiar look, as soon as he stepped out of his hiding, he went by the many bulks of meat which laid around him without even touching them and stabbed Giaro in the gut, then slashed both of his knees. As soon as that was over, he went out of the door, never to be seen. The man from Italy seemed to have lost it when he shouted, most inflammatory offences which could be told to another human being without cause of being disturbed. 'Done, we can go through, the other side appeared to be at least empty. Berthas, are you listening?' 'Right, I am, I beg your pardon, but shouldn't we be concerned with that dark creature which came out of the dark? I wouldn't very much like walking to the other side only to be met by it.' But she hadn't noticed that staying there was being worse. As soon as they grabbed a hold of Giaro, they started ripping him apart. 'Better now watch that, come on, I'll help you through.' The moment she was over, they followed, while grabbing on the nearest bed and turning it upside down. With the amount of wood that was used, there shouldn't be any trouble any longer if it were for them to try. 'Are you going to be alright Berthas?' He had utmost sincerity in his eyes. At least looking at the way it appeared, they had been set off. Rossi was still acting up while she was silent. Pierrot started walking across the room trying to think for as long as he might since they were planning on spending some time inside the room. They were safe there, at least for the time being. Least of all, would they go outside, where, not only it wasn't safe but they would have to deal with seeing what had happened to their friend again? Now that they were set, he thought of what he saw. Berthas did as well, as soon as she had reminded herself that they broke through a wall which felt like a body. The ribs had to be taken care off in order for them to escape, they had no choice in that but as much as she had been aware, they were at fault at hurting another great being. 'Does either of you smell a fire? I mean burning, in any sense?' 'I can see no smoke, but my lord knows I am too old to be able to smell, dear.' She looked at the clock, which had stood in place since she had entered the previous building. It came as nothing more but pity when she found out that she had missed on that appointment she had set herself to. What would Frank think of her if she were to relay to him everything which had happened? Would he still feel her like he used to? Would she remain the same woman by the time she returned? There came no time like the present, where the knock on the door made all three of them bounce to their feet. It was so pleasant to hear some kind of manners in such a forsaken place, but not as pleasant not to weep. 'May I come in? I seem to be a stranger who had lost himself as well.' 'Carry on then, but know that we're.' He couldn't finish, nor could he end what laid in his mind. The appearance of the stranger did much to shake him off the trail of vagueness and into suspicion. Too formal, too normal, this was a man taken directly from the street. No dirt laid on his shirt, no dust, not a single sign of wear or any sort of shock. Rather than that, he looked confused. 'What exactly is going on in here? Are the two of you trying to harm this older lady? Because, if you are, I'll have none of that, I have to let you know.' The place looked rather suspicious, especially beyond the door and behind the man. His side of the hotel, per se, looked clean and unaffected by what had gone behind their backs. Worse than that was the fact that it seemed like he noticed it as well after hearing some knocks on the bed as well. His hand motion hadn't betrayed him enough, though it had become clear to all three of them that he was signalling for someone else to come. Dreadful as it seemed, they were all men, dressed in fine suits, who looked as if they had been caught at the worst of moments after being invited to a party. It would explain even less though enough to have them going. Of course, a note would suffice to say that Berthas still thought they looked wrong, despite what they wore. Most likely, it had come from the strangeness which bore around their bodies and how they appeared to bear scales now than skin. Slippery, rather, to the point where they looked as if they might be a liar of some kind, any kind if all. 'I'm well enough in case the two of you were wondering that as well. These kind young lads were actually helping me get up when my bed fell over.' Both Pierrot and Rossi looked from one another then back at her, as if expecting neither of them to take on that story. 'Alright, I think I can handle this one myself then.' With a coming hand, he dismissed the fellows and seemed to have grasped this whole thing by himself. He was rather pale now. In a whisper-like tone, he seemed to have said. 'I don't think I believe that story but something's wrong there, I can see something akin to a hand trying to push through. Look, I don't know from where you came out of, but there's a wardrobe at the end of the corridor, it's not locked or anything in case you were wondering. Take two of the suits and one of the dresses and try blending in. I'll see what I can make of it.' They hadn't wasted a moment yet and got themselves out of the room. Berthas were following slowly, as if not to disturb the waters and appeared to be coming closer rather than distancing herself from him. 'Why are you helping us? There's nothing for you to gain out of this.' 'I know that, but I couldn't just have left you locked with that thing there. It wouldn't be, well, humane of me.' Quite the pity, for he jingled a key-chain around. He seemed rather aware and set on taking care of whatever he thought them to be. From one corridor to the other, it looked like the young lads had already taken care of their disguises and lost themselves out there. She was clearly set on the fact that she wouldn't get to see the man again, not after asking him of the plan. 'I'll lock myself in, easily at that and make sure no one's hurt on the other side.' 'That's not a great idea, oh dear, I'm afraid your stubbornness might lead to your death as well as theirs.' Berthas didn't look surprised any longer at him but slowly made her way through. 'Don't worry, I'll just check and if anything dangerous happens, I'll make sure to cover whatever hole or damage was done to the wall. There's no need to close it off with the help of the bed.' A dreadful experience altogether, as she was kicked out, the door was locked. The walls were neatly decorated on the other side, the lights were pure, the carpets were freshly made. Even as she followed the trail towards the spot she was sent towards, she could feel the material of the closed curtains. 'The windows, this should make everything clear.' She said to herself, suddenly pulling them on both sides and revealing the night. It didn't do much other than confuse her. All of what she had been aware of was the fact that they had been in the abandoned building, with nothing on the side. Certainly, there were other buildings but it didn't look like it was closed off any longer. As a matter of fact, it looked clean below. The streets stretched to eye's reach, as far as she could see, there were parked cars that didn't belong to their era either. In other words, they have snuck through a nightmare and ended up in a dream. 'This way, madame.' The Majordomo had arrived, right in time, to remind her that she was needed to be formally dressed rather than bear her dirty and bizarre rags.'Non, this won't do. You cannot go with the other guests dressed like that, your rags are unwashed. They are, there, how do you say, vulgar. Do come closer, the guest wardrobe is over here.'His accent had been tainted, but he looked, suddenly that she was aware of, human. Most looked that way around here, from the observations she had taken while looking behind. People were already talking and gossiping around her at an inevitable level. It was a mess in the greatest sense of the word, as she put on the black dress, in which she barely fit. The way she held herself out there was, in other words, which didn't belong to her.

'Magnifique.' Life was great, in so far to say that she was for the time being rather content than anything else. One detail bothered her as she walked by, seemingly mesmerised by the whole illusion. It was room four hundred forty-four, which was the room the man had locked himself in. Also, the same room from which they had taken off. That wasn't right, it wasn't right all n' all. Something there would try coming out and she had nothing but fear and a desire to get away as soon as possible. Plus, this night was enjoyable, and she hadn't drunk in the longest while. It wasn't dangerous yet, at least there weren't any signs that whatever happened behind wasn't under his control. But after passing through the long corridor and glancing at the rooms, she had arrived at the main event, which alone was more than grand. The lights, the wide room, the scent of candles and the elegant dancers made her feel young again. Only if Frank was here, this night would've been perfect, she thought. But nothing came that easily she knew. A pair of hands came from behind and covered her eyes. 'Guess who it is.' The familiar voice said, and for a moment there, she had almost come to the conclusion he was there. 'Frank, is that you, could that be you?' But the short-lived silence and excitement faded as he took his hands back. It was one of the lads who had accompanied her there, now he only seemed rather apologetic, as if he had been part of some unheavenly prank. But it hadn't ended, their attention near, straight towards the middle of the room. From there, the light had disappeared in a living ball of darkness from which the audience suddenly formed a circle and danced around it. 'What's happening now? Is this supposed to be part of the dace?' 'I don't know, but I'm not sure it's safe to be around here any longer.' From the ground, as it shattered, there came a fat body, hardened, with its robust pair of twisted humanoid-shaped beaks coming from its head. Under which there laid one giant eye, under each one of the beaks, which started with utmost disgust. Its hands were filled with gluteus bulbs of cancerous muscle which pumped and pumped until there came out the tainted sponges which fell around the floor. As if it had waited for her and what had been in her mind, the many pieces which flew around the ceiling and those which had entered Rossi came below its hole where it had dwelled, but this was no diving malignant thing, barely as it appeared, a servant at best. The dark tongue revealed itself, right at from behind they broke through. Soon the contamination would resume, but there'd be no pity nor wonder for it any longer as this creature suddenly beckoned them to come. As it lowered itself past any kind of nightmarish abomination they may wretche inside of, it ate four of the guests and went into that hole. Everyone followed it after. The stairs were something near to floating piles of weeping black stones which were unutterably flagrant in their need to be touched. Each step felt like it released another tear in that shallow realm of winds. Dark winds, blue and purple, an array of magentas which rolled around a tunnel and through it the fiend made its way. It felt like an eternity as they all made their way through something which would have no return, but the festivity wasn't over yet. Not even close, farther than that as a matter of fact and farther than the truth as it came to mind. A guest brought their candles, seemingly not surprised. 'I wish I would lose myself inside the vortex so I may live forever in the dark.' Said one of them before plunging inside. His body had been instantly obliterated and absorbed inside the never-ending twist inside the dark. The servant grinned at that, the guests were laughing. Another one came at a crossroads, seemingly bearing the same body but a different head. The legs appeared to be weak, made of barely any sort of bone marrow, but kept the bottom soles and fingers, sharp and long, crawling like some sort of wicked platform. This other servant's hand was a mule, one big blocky head which hand expanded and looked like it had been the example of punishment in the way the marks around it had been. A giant worm had to have crawled a few meters deeps inside his head to have left it looking that way. But the bigger one only joined, nonetheless, turning to reveal a small empty chamber-like hole, with gloom inside the head. The emptiness had just revealed, that the malignant being had lost most of its appeal once they realised he was so empty inside. Just the shell of something greater, which was revealed in its movement alone. Aggressive in nature, despite being stronger than the four beaked one. It smashed through the vortex, losing a piece of its arm. But that wasn't even the least distracting from the madness which was going on. This appeal was being lost. Don't do it now, I cannot stand to see them like that again. Berthas thought. She had looked at them and how they have reverted into being degenerates yet again, seemingly tainted by the likes of something which wasn't even supposed to be there. Not only did they not look human any longer, the same as before, but their suits had changed as well, even the nicely combed dressed like the one belonging to her. They looked as if they had aged eight decades through, darkened and served as a reflection of the vortex which laid around. 'What is this place? Rossi? Pierrot? Are the two of you still well?' Though she could only let out a tone of sarcasm, she looked mightily surprised as that appeared to be a deformed pair of shells. Their bodies might've hardened but their minds remained the same. It was still the two of them, as much as it appeared that they had features belonging to objects rather than creatures. Sharp corners, cubical sides which came from the back of their skulls and pushed behind or little spheres being stuck between their fingers. There was no other way to look at it other than to admit to the fact that they were deformed. 'I don't know where we're heading towards but it cannot be much worse than staying behind.' He pointed towards somewhere but it was a lost place, something which wasn't there any longer, it just appeared to have disappeared. A strange thought. To have looked behind only to realise that neither the hole nor the floating stones were there for your return. The distance was great, so that might account for the illusion that they might be looking at something much greater. It was when the vortex started sealing an entire side of the way back that things got difficult to explain. In the least of ways, they were dismissing it entirely. Berthas had been looking wrong at it as well. The way she seemed to grab at a stranger who didn't know whether or not would make it through the night. By now they came to a full-fledged turn-around and wait as the two giants stopped to converse with one another. Dreadful, as if were, to listen to them and their voice wasn't what either of them had expected in the least. There'd be some kind of feast sooner or later and the thought had always crept along as the guests spoke. 'What will we do if they suddenly turn their heads towards us? Their hunger might come and strike at the unaware, we may lose friends of closest of a kind if my suspicion is true.' 'You, my friend are nothing but a schizoid, a man who can't make out the reality any longer. Don't look at them the way you think you do, this path will only bring the loss of your mind. Just have faith and wait for it through, just like the rest of us.' He said it with a malevolent way, the same one with which a father would lecture his sons. They listened at least, that wasn't a problem, but what was distracting was the end of their talk. That's when the two creatures turned around and started inspecting them. Each guest took a step forward, only to be followed by the adjacent one who stood behind.

Neither of them took a stroll nor have they thought of making a run for it, but they couldn't stand properly nor formally there. As much as there wasn't enough space for them to move around nor could they improvise in the way they wanted to. Another batch would have to do. Past them, there had been another hole, or an opening per se, in the distance. Same as before, there came a greater fiend to walk and greet the ones from the point where the portal ended. But this one leading them was mad. It suddenly turned as well as pushing one of its beaks inside the vortex.

There wasn't any surprise how it was entirely, or close to be entirely destroyed, its matter being absorbed by the mass of that vortex around them. What was left of it was that stump which vaguely looking like the piece of a melted candle. It was harrowing to be there, but they followed once the order or the shriek to continue was made. 'I'm starting to be frightened by this, shouldn't there be some way of return? I don't think I can continue going this way any longer, at least not if it means what I think it means by the end of this journey.' 'Have faith, brother, this is bigger than us or than them. Have you not seen their acts of sacrifice? They're not mere guides or guardians, they're servants just like the two of us, willing to sacrifice pieces of themselves to the greatness of the vortex.' But the path ahead wasn't clear, at least not in an expected way. More stairs formed out of the stone below, but this time there wasn't any hole through which they could enter another dimension or another world. No, this was far more dangerous than your average ritual, as it came to be, the stones formed a small platform, on which they waited for every single one of them to get on. It was at least frightening to be that close to them, but neither could complain. For they saw the endless stretch as they laid above the entire infinity which was the vortex. Above its bottom outstretched reach, the vortex still was there, but in another form. Despite being partially invisible and almost free of a form, pieces of it, of pure energy floated and phased in and out of existence. Dreadful and magnificent as it were, there wasn't any way to take this trough. Many others would try looking for an excuse to get away. One had thought of jumping and ending it quickly, the way he wouldn't have done if it were a straight run. But they waited and even the guardians were silently watching as it went ahead and hovered through. 'Berthas, are you seeing what I'm seeing?

Right there, over that place, in the sky.' She looked at Pierrot's contempt and noticed the large, unevenly hatched things and their hatching long cocoon. It seemed like they were stuck there, with their giant legs standing on a solid mass of air, rather phased as well out of them but not entirely. An entire army by the looks of it, colossal but stuck in there. Even by the soles of their feet, they had that dreadful appearance, as if they had been made for the most peculiar and damning ways possible. Shallow gases filled the air and went away. No one was affected. 'What is going to happen to us then? We've been on this platform for.' One of the fellows appeared to have been struck by something after looking at the clock. That was a sight indeed, as the small device spasmed into uncontrollable motions which wouldn't do. He shut his mouth as soon as it had been opened and turned his motions towards the rest of the guests. 'Of course, it wouldn't work here unless you think the laws that govern nature have a place in this forsaken spot. Shall we also think our souls leave our bodies when we are in fact absorbed by the vortex upon our deaths?' It froze even the little hairs on his chin. There was danger in the sky above, that laid everywhere as far from the space below. It felt strange as they were dragged through the crossroads between the giants and the vortex. 'What do you think they are? Neither of them appears to be alive, rather, how do you call it? Statues, perhaps?' 'No, that ain't right, just take a look at those cocoons inside of them, those things aren't normal in the least. Sure, it can't be called upon us to say things yet but I think.. "We should focus on not die before we reach the final destination, maybe? In all fairness, we are bound and need to remain as strong as we can. Those that are out there must be watching us in fear." Who are you talking about? Who could fear us in a world filled with things like them? Compared with them we're ants, lesser. Can they even feel pain like we do? It would seem like that isn't so either, as I have observed one of them sacrificing a beak while the other an arm. That was damning in the worst possible way. He went on to recall every piece of information which was tied to the damning of the place and the giants, to the point of no return. Most of them had seen that already but had apparently missed one important detail. I've seen another one of them behind. And he was important, or he appeared to be wearing himself over such standards. The hairs on his forehead had received beyond saving. Now he was stroking a large bald spot around it, where there appeared to be no hope of ever growth. Caught by it a few seconds at least, he appeared to be looking at his fingers with dismay. Well, I wish I could do a lot more than that, but I'm afraid there's just no hope for me left. The creature was there and it bore a net behind its back, filled with other races. Most of them were tied too hard to be able to breathe or do anything at all. If I didn't know any better, I would've thought they looked like us, with the exact features, if not the suits which weren't there, no distinction would've laid. "That's preposterous, how dare you compare us with a bunch of vile creatures brought at the end of their lives? And to throw such accusations off the board?" Now, one of the giant ones turned its beak towards the crowd below and flash a wicked eyed. It had suddenly signalled that it'd pay its entire attention towards them, with little to be said and mostly it observed. There was a damning amount of evidence laying around, judged by the sudden movements or twichings that it knew or had a vague understanding of their language. While its partner seemed to navigate through the endless void, it suddenly decided to pay a little attention to the ruckus which happened behind of them. It wasn't totally unexpected, in the sense that it dreaded itself as much as the others. Look, all I'm trying to say is that we got replaced, or at least some bodies might be planted where we used to be in order to avoid suspicion, that's all. "But you said they looked like us, right after saying they were a bunch of creatures there." Intermediate, that's what they were, between their monstrous appearances and what seemed to morph in humans. That's what I saw and what I can recall with undoubtful certainty. He stepped just a few more blocks in the back. They had formed another semi-circle again. This time, it seemed that he was to be judged for what he said. Could it be that there wasn't any chance for him to be saved? It appeared so. He said too much and had realised that he accused the creatures of the vilest of plans. The calculations and machinations couldn't have matched for their feeble human minds and to hear it coming from one of their own was dreadful in the least. Pagan, missionary, you're only trying to distract us from our destiny. I say we throw him for saying such damning words of insolence, for which we should be rewarded! The crowd seemed to be a party in agreement, while the rest were unsure. Rossi, Pierrot and Berthas remained silent in their corners, watching in the distance, mesmerised by the scenery if not all. This was the opportunity of a lifetime to see such a sphere of conduits which lead to their world. Humans weren't prepared to see such things and most of them appeared to be caught by the most mundane objections. Execution, I say we hold a vote and decide what's to be done against this heresy! We should be able to find out things, rather than continue on a path of false lies driven by one who'd call himself a prophet. "I have only said what I had seen with my own eyes. I've not declared anything but rather gave you an insight into what was going on behind our backs. Should I be punished for relaying information of the greater plans?

Are we not supposed to be observers here as we are brought towards that?' He points and suddenly they turned to see. Straight ahead there was a rock formation standing above, at the heart where the vortex was the thickest and most spread around the outside areas. It had become fluctuating, rather in head and cold. They paid attention to what was falling from above. But on it, even from the distance, they could see that there was a form hiding in its stone hold, where it had withered despite its size. It had been thought during its initial sightings that the hold around it was only its shell, formed around a far greater body, now it laid in ruin. 'It would seem like you are to be placed on hold, at least until we decide what's to be done with you.' 'It's a bit late for that, don't you think?' Others had appeared from unknown places. They came to pop into existence as they reached the point. It was likely that they were the infantry when it came to the defence, either way, they looked too violent to be approached. Unlike the two of them who now appeared to be docile in comparison, these ones had three to four additional legs and seemingly grown extra heads which were still stuck through infancy. These ones would be the future generation, at least from the looks alone.

One thing was noticed again, it felt like out of them, he was the only one who had noticed the details, or even appeared to care. To look upon it in a fanciful way, he found himself staring at some kind of towering set of pieces which had been forcefully attached. Nothing could've been worse than that, especially for the ones ahead who were rather pale and looking like they were partially dead. But one bore a piece of an arm and that distinct beak which did still belong to a certain creature that had a remaining three of them still intact. A pause in his mind occurred, at least from the fanciful way he seemed to delect himself. It came as nothing more than a strange sensation, the lack of action which bore him through. He had noticed something and was noticed back. In any case, it meant that whatever went through the vortex ended up as a piece of them, caught in desperation of some kind, at this alone, he wasn't blind. Rather aware, that they were there, already marching with his peers. He would go ahead and let down a stream of tears in some mad attempt to return, but it was late for that, he wanted to go ahead and do something. The chance might've come but he was unaware of the dread he'd feel, the thing that would freeze his legs and stop any action or everything which might've been achieved. Soon enough, they came to walk through the tunnel, with the vanguard at hand, on both sides, sneering and leering at them with their weird forms and strange twisted ways of talking. As for intelligence, they showed as much as grunts had. Not all of them had arms either since those were kept only for the important ones, the ones who'd make utmost use of their additions. But there they were, a small group in front of it. This one looked like nothing, in particular, rather, it seemed to be just a small part of something colossal. It pumped, revealing the fact that it had survived some twisted or tormented form of great destruction or total annihilation, but other than, it laid flaccid, like a gulp of fat twisted and turned with a belly. That thing was disgusting, for which there were little words of unflattering grace left. 'Was this the reason we had come? To witness this thing that won't even grow or get away from its small estuary?' 'I don't think it was supposed to live that long. How do you even suppose it had?' Looking at the tubes and how most of them lead towards some place above, the reason came to mind. 'It must be draining those ones above, either the statues or their wicked cocoons, I wager.' 'Are you certain of that? It could be, I mean there could be any other explanation to it.' Neither one of them appeared to join his train of thought. It was then that Berthas stepped out of the circle and came closer. The so-called guards had nothing to do with them, nor did they bother, since such small creatures couldn't do any harm whatsoever to such a concoction of vileness as it were. 'I think you won't be able to understand me, will you?' She examined it from the distance and the more she had, the easier it got to comprehend the mindlessness it bore. There was nought, and this comprehension was even shorter when it came to its servants and those around them, who seemed to worship it in an awkward out of the place way. Most had already bowed to it and started praying, all in tongues which came instinctually rather than prepared. As soon as they were caught, both Pierrot and Rossi, there had been a disconnect between them and her. She was there in front of them, almost unreal, feeling as if she could fade in the vortex, even if it were at such a distance. Dread felt at her skin and she was pale. The woman wanted to kneel and rest, but what if this was a test? Bertha asked herself that as she turned around to merge with it. Most of her mind and what had made her human got lost after a touch. What she carried over wasn't a piece of her but rather the infection which had somewhat crept in her mind. Others followed her sacrifice such as a sign would be, unsure, uncertain. Both of the companions had been pushed and forced inside. They had been a small addition, but important nonetheless. Small, dirty and peculiar primates but they had added to the creation of the tiny network which would be a mind. Back inside the building, where the hole had closed, the only good room laid filled with corpses of every kind. Those that had looked like the guests and those who were sick and now laid dying amongst the corpses. Something about them reeled them in and pushed the fumes out of their bodies which forced the metabolism of the living but tainted being around them received. It was a dreadful way in which it followed the gas, but the room had been a trap, from which there was no escape whatsoever. Even a mere interaction between the many corpses and those around would be damning for the healthiest of men. An imitation of body and sin had crawled, finally, followed by a pair of suits. He and his fellows were there, looking at the entrance, and creeping back after feeling the scent of evil which permeated from inside the room. Coming there, or rather, following the lady who was asking too many questions had been a grave mistake from which every single one of them would've suffered a fate which was worse than death. For they could see that those, if not their bodies, their minds were kept alive and somehow pulsated through the ears. There were certain motions and hormones released in the air which were rather recognisable for those who paid a special kind of attention. But the main part of the course was the fact that the place was almost indistinguishable from what it had been. There hadn't been any sort of evidence left of a portal which might've opened in the middle of the room. Whatever imagery was left in the bodies alone had been erased to the point that even the slightest signs of life were peculiar concoctions of some half-consciousness which wasn't there at all. Dread filled the room and out there, some young man stood waiting for an old lady to come. She had cleared her schedule completely in order to meet him and now, the likes of her had betrayed her purpose. By the window, next to the dinner he stood, the chef in charge sometimes took breaks and sat down at one of the tables outside, by which the lad remained. One of the metal poles appeared to be well enough on its way to falling, perhaps the times deemed it so. 'Well, she isn't coming any time sooner, fellow. You'd better have a greater chance of just doing something around. See that broom over there? I betcha you could make something out of it until she came if she even decided on coming.' The chef had a grin on his face, which lighted his greatest sets of moustaches. He wasn't sure what he meant by it, perhaps out of context, he looked like he was waiting on a date rather than for an important meeting of the kind. It was clear then. A few steps ahead from him stood the young waitress who was blowing puffs of smoke at the dark grin which was the sky. It looked like it darkened but neither of them was a fool, as they knew that rains weren't coming as often as the people wanted. There didn't seem to happen much though, at least not at that particular hour. Mostly, it could've been the stress with this new law or something could've happened at the other side of the city which dragged most of their attention. But this was a slow day, regardless of the reason. The metal grates and covers around which laid on the various building tops were new additions. At least ever since the last time he had looked at them. Ridiculous as it sounded, he had run of things to think off, as well as others to observe. His glance hadn't travelled to the waitress though, even if a sign inside his belly thicked him off for being infatuated with her. Dreadful, dreadful thing, as it came near to the mind. If it were to become more obvious, he would've become blind. 'May I?' She was surprised to be asked in such a manner. 'I'm Flinch Eddias.' 'Charlene, pleased to meet you.' He took one of her smokes then got to work as soon as he was lit. One long deep pull in his lungs and he had been over it. The outside had been filled with dust and fallen leaves but at least he couldn't pretend he was standing for nothing. 'Finish the smoke at least, that way you won't spread it around and make more of a mess while working.' 'Relax sir, I was planning on doing that anyway.' From table to table, he appeared to have left his cigar resting in one of the ashtrays before going on to stroke the floor. He was rather good at it, at least, from the looks of it. Almost there, immediate results. The floor seemed to have changed a bit, but that might've been a result of the dizzy headedness he felt inside his mind. Apparently, that cigar had taken more than half of his mind there, mint could it have been? No, mint alone hadn't had that effect on him. But he knew he smelled at least a well enough amount of opium inside it. Matthew could've stopped immediately, at least as soon as he had felt the taste inside his mouth, but he didn't. Now he was tasting his own blood and the two of them weren't there. Was it night already? 'Have I waited through the day with the broom in my hand?' Firmly, he placed it from the corner he had taken it and started on a stroll. It was silent outside, there were no street lights that were working, at least neither of the ones which had been close to him. Some at least were rather caught by the trap of having been smashed by a bunch of teenagers with rocks. Awful thing, he knew, but he's done it as well when he was young. Strangely, there hadn't been a mark on the floor, nothing, the noise was missing and everything was clean. 'What in the?' His gaze went back from the top and straight below. He felt like the mark of ash which laid below and rubbed his hand there. No spot on his hands, no marks, nothing which would indicate that the steps were filthy. It looked like it was part of it as if some strange design of a splatter of paint had found its way there, but that wasn't the case. 'Could anyone, if you hear me, respond.' 'Here, over here.' It was the voice of a, of a, something which came to sound to him as the voice of Charlene, the waitress. At least she was there, somewhere, ready to put away his fears and loneliness. He had to find her somehow, in all of the mess which had been that place. 'I'm coming to Charlene, wait for me, will you? I'm as close to you as I can but I cannot find you unless you give me some directions.' 'It's dark, so dark, I don't know what to say.' Her voice faded and it appeared to be pointless, as he was pushed towards restlessly roaming out there, where he wasn't welcome. Doors were closed, the walls were unreachable. He was almost dying to try climbing and he would've if it weren't for the fact that the ledges were picked clean and slippery. A damning thing as well, for the night had been more vibrant than the day before. Neither could it have been worse than that. But he could see to it that there were other things in store which would creep him through the waste. In his mind, they were mostly lost, shoved in some places during the night, having left nothing of their presence behind. As soon as it had become obvious that it wasn't the case, he had become estranged of the world. 'I swear, this must be something which doesn't belong here. Everything's is just a fake.' He bashed and smashed upon the door, ignoring the plea of the girl. He wouldn't be aware of much, neither could they see to it either, as a matter of fact, he's been alone for a considerable amount of time. It was unacceptable in the least of sense, he wasn't even sure of it but wanted to put it to some test. First, he broke through the door. One-fifth of the scent was an odour which didn't belong there, as no man would care to make that difference, still. He couldn't believe they would force him to wake to that. Believed to be a rather cocky rat, he entered but looked on the floor. There had been no remained below. The least he had expected was some crumbles or some pieces of the cardboard-like wood that he had broken. Without a doubt, this place wasn't the city he'd grown up in. 'I will not take the girl unless you show yourself. I know you're there, you're the one who orchestrated this, aren't you?' The shallow dance of silence rose. There was a light upstairs which revealed a pink rose which outstretched amongst the wall. At least he could be sure of it now, in the place of the little-known realm, he could walk and see, the maker, the creator. The man who was holding on his mask. He stood against the open window, ready to flee into the moonlight sky. There was a doubt there, at least, why had left the knife, the candle and the note there? On a round table in the middle of the room, it stood. Unable to properly get to it, he shouted to himself, go forth! 'Go forth, I say, don't bother me any longer your silly spectre, I know what you stand for.' 'If you do, then you have no place here, henceforth, you should leave. There shouldn't be a place for insolent children, unaware of the world which surrounds them. Alas, I will leave you with that choice which lays on the table.' 'Wait, don't!' Before he could reach him, the man flew off the window and was never seen after. There came the doubt again, whether or not the man was still alive remained a mystery to himself and others. Others? He could hear sounds below, the voices of a party. By the time he was halfway down the stairs, he realised that there were none there. No guests, no gentlemen with their ladies near the curtains, just the open, broken hole in the door. Eddias didn't know how to react against this new threat, at least by the time he had come back on his feet, he wasn't sure any longer. There was doubt, he was afraid, there were no telltale signs that something might happen if he were to touch the letter. For starters, he had been afraid of the fact that he might receive a dagger in his chest as soon as there was a clear shot of him there. It wasn't open said or commented upon himself, there was a threat out there but not now. What made him realised that it wasn't all properly made to be seemed to have sprouted from it, the letter. 'Eddias Flinch, dear fellow, I have come upon the realisation that you are aware of my presence by now, even now in the dark where I peer upon the lady you have brought here in my realm. Our meeting here might've been nothing but some sign of mad delight but I should make it properly known that I have watched the two of you enough to have come upon this delightful decision. One of us must die if the others are to get her in the most delightful fashion, a duel if you might. Even now she is upon me, laying rather flaccid from what I expect her to act and be. It would be a shame if one of my hands were to slip inside her and do some horrible things in your absence but such bitter words would serve no man. What I ask of you is simple, take the candle, bring the blade and let us hunt each other in the spirit of the knave.' The letter wasn't even signed, which left some doubt about the name of the contender. Not that it was important in the least, as that was no man but rather some decrepit beast which didn't deserve his attention. And he wouldn't have received it if it weren't for the threat, damned one. A better fate for him would be the gallows. 'But if this is what he wants, this is what he'll get. For his so-called realm. I won't leave without you, Charlene.' Flinch promised to himself in a rather concrete fashion. He wasn't the most important pick, but he thought he would do. The mood was set, the night was shallow, the fires came instead of the gallows. It started as soon as he had reached the stairs, which came with a swipe, as soon as he had gathered the papers which lay around. He had been awake for a few moments then, after realising what he had done and of the little consequences which belonged to his actions. There was little shame to it, at least as soon as he had come to the realisation he had been taken by surprise. Another one of them, dressed like a fool, with a mask, split in colours of pink-hued red and ultramarine. He shone in the dark with his smile, quick to grab at him one more time. 'May I help you find master in this dark evening?' He asked with utmost honesty, at least as much as he could muster in the few moments which dictated their encounter. It wasn't as dreadful as it had originally appeared but he was rather set on staring down the strange man. Most of the moments shared between the two were rather vague, as he had barely met the woman, but somehow he knew that he needed to see the woman. By any means possible at least, he had a feeling which made him want to creep and scream. 'The fires, indeed, I see. Does destruction belong to your world? Will you bring more of it?' 'What are you talking about?' 'The order you have brought here, in this world where there's no fear. It doesn't belong in this place, don't you understand?' He had a strange elation which purged some of his confusion towards the strange creature. At least he could be sure he was being watched now. Something in the nature of those things, as more of them, seemed to have arrived. All of them dressed like court bards of in the likes of the jester, with their wicked coloured masks which grinned and laughed. As much as he wanted to distance himself from it, he couldn't do it. He wasn't in the least aware of what was going around the surrounding areas, other than the fact that the fire had begun to spread. It was horrible and tainted, he couldn't be certain whether or not it had been a great idea or not. But the group of jesters seemed to beg to differ. At least as much as he had expected. It had become more obvious to him that they would follow. 'Let us go then, together, we're going to meet your master then, once and for all, at least until this dreadful place collapses unto itself because of the flames.' They cheered him like some sort of leader, marching towards the destruction of some blasted tyrant. None of them appeared to comprehend the destruction brought by the fire, which, stopped? During one key moment, it appeared to have completely been blown out of the flame, with the smoke having been spread around in the ether. It wasn't even more obvious than that, but he expected a firing impulse which would leap forever until the place got engulfed. Looking back at it was the moment when he realised that it had been all for nothing. Whatever he had done seemed to have disappeared as soon as the fire was gone. No structural damage left there, it seemed like there had been no fire. Worst of all was the fact that he stood there, almost looking over him on top of one of the non-working lampposts. He looked rather disappointed at the fact that they suddenly stopped. It wasn't as interesting to watch any longer, to laugh or to act in any mad fashion when the master was there. 'Won't you join me against him? Go on then, he cannot fight all of us at once if we were to unite. Look, he even challenged me to a duel.' Their faces went pale, at least under their masks, it felt now, of all moments that they were reflective of who they were. Dreadful things, it did appear, out of fear, that they knew, it was expected. A more dreadful thing made itself known. As they watched, in fear of retaliation. He came to be surprised himself by the fact that he had flown right into the middle of the small crowd. 'My great fellow, but you have played cheap and I'm afraid a simple duel won't satisfy. Just look at your blade now, as it's obvious to my eyes that it's no longer fit for plunging, nor common for spelunking. It may serve you nought now unless you want to throw it or reforge it. But cast no shadow of a doubt, the woman shall be mine.' 'Never, I'll never leave Charlene's side.' 'Then become my servant and bid farewell to the normal world, for you belong to us, another jester caught by the nets of my realm. You'll start to notice there's no way out.'He turned around and walked. Despite what he had said about the blade, as it slowly melted, becoming rather unusable for him in the least, he wagered that it was at least neat enough for one last attempt at a strike. Eddias charged and seemed not to be caught by any feeling of betrayal or shame whatsoever. This was not a duel, he had become a rogue after this malignant act. It appeared that their master had been wrong about him and about the weapon he had used. As soon as he had been poised, on his knees, the metal has merged with his body and stuck there like poison, wagered. 'Master, master, master.' Their voices came quickly, perhaps sooner than their march towards him in the dark. He was done for though, that weak being in a costume, too self-absorbed. 'I have thought you to be some kind of immortal being in this place. Why have you challenged me? Why did you let me stab you like that.' Those jesters, as much as they brought something silly amongst them, appeared to bear some kind of teeth behind their masks. One moment they would weep, while in the next one, they'd be ready to avenge their master. It wasn't even fast, the way it continued. 'Stop, I do not wish you to harm him. I only want to talk now.' With which he revealed his body, after how ill he had become, what laid under the mask of another man. 'In this place, we are all cursed to live this way, like beasts creatures in the hiding. Truth be told, there is no escape from this place, there never had been.' Said the jester who masked himself like a man. Now, it was his turn to die. The little thing had a spear stashed inside his coat, one which was much longer than it could manage to fit. As long as it was, the sharp side of it stretched as an arrow and impaled him in the chest. The dreadful amount of pain was unnecessarily hard and it came to be the strongest feeling he had ever felt. 'Charlene, where are you?' He yelled as he had made him the way through the jesters' congregation. The metal shaft of the spear had missed his heart by inches but he had been bleeding profoundly ever since. In other words, he was done for. Without a way for recovery, he was only going to suffer as he looked around, forever hearing her plea. 'Help me, please, I'm locked inside his chamber, can't you hear me Eddias?' Flinch hadn't the slightest clue whether or not he'd be taken for a fool or anything of the kind. He wanted her but his time was up. By the time he realised that it wasn't so, he had distanced himself from the jesters only to realise that there, there, there wasn't any way to die. His wound healed as if there wasn't any possible way he could deny himself the dreadful thing. It wasn't fair, he couldn't tell any longer whether she was truly there, hidden, or lost.

Had she even come to the realm or was it yet another mistake coming from a desire to trick him? He couldn't tell. 'Need some help, stranger? You appear to be lost, I think you may enjoy the company I can give you.' It was another one of the mongrels with their strange ways and peculiarness. Whatever it was that had been dreaded for so long he couldn't say it any longer. 'Have you seen the woman? Her name was Charlene.' But the answer given was unsatisfactory and he moved away. There wasn't any kind of way in which he might turn it around. He came to check every door, every piece which required him to break through and check inside. They were empty, to the lousiest core, with nothing in-so-much, in the least which could be close enough to dust or cobwebs. Whatever damage even occurred soon enough disappeared. It was him and that jester, who was awfully silent for one of his kind. Both of them had gotten to the point where they stood at the bottom of the floor, in front of a fire he had started both in the middle of the room and one in the furnace. It was warm, at least that enough he could feel for himself. There wasn't anything which he felt like hiding from this one strange creature who remained with him after so long. The length of which had been lost a long time ago. Both of them were miserable nonetheless. It had become a habit for him to count as many times as it took to determine whether or not there was someone under that mask.

Whether or not there was a man who had a mind or some dumbly animated creature. Despite the fact that it had crept him ever-so-slowly, over the fact that it tried crawling on him during nights, it refused to talk. 'Well, what do you want to do then? Stay here the warmth until your body gives in?' 'I wasn't ever going to do that, what are you trying to imply here?' 'Sooner or later you will have to pull yourself by the boots and return to your senses. There's just no other way in which it can be done.' There were fear and a lack of sense in his head, but he thought he understood the tiny creature and what it said. 'They won't help you if you continue living as an outsider, refusing to adapt to their, our customs, as you may have known, there had been an attempt at our master.' He didn't know, how about that? The little creature which seemed to have his interests at best wasn't even aware of the dangers which crept inside of him or ever so near. He hadn't realised yet, but he was being taken by the steps. Flinch was brought to one of the under wardrobes, much of the clothes and attires in it being similar to what they were wearing, with the exception that there were others there with different sizes, for much taller men than himself. There was evidence that there were more. 'Where are they?' Startled by it, he seemed to have lost count of what he was doing and what he was trying to find. There was some dreadful thing implied as well. What if they couldn't die, where would they be hiding?' 'No, I won't take in your customs until I get to see them if they're still here.' He knew that no one could get away, but that wasn't a way in which he'd give himself over. There was still enough differences between the two of them that he'd be denied any kind of consideration when it came to trust. 'Are you about to follow me then? We shall see one of them at any moment now.' They have turned their walk into a crawl as soon as they found the hole in the ground. Apparently, only this one thing refused to grow or push itself black closed, as it came to his understanding that the man had dug up his own hole then laid inside of it for as long as it was. With a bit of an effort, they have arrived inside a small spherical room which had less than nothing inside of it, other than the door. 'Is he hiding inside? One of the only men that remain caught in this realm and he's here?' 'You were the one who inquired of him, knock yourself over then.' As soon as he was prepared, the tiny jester had made himself be unknown as well. Either he popped out of existence or he crawled like some wicked worm back through the hole. He was left there alone, wondering whether or not there'd be something to make of it. As soon as the door opened he was greeted inside. In more than one way he had been rather aware and was expected to come there. No more would he try going around and trying to hide, this was another man and his excitement was undeniable. 'You're, well, I wasn't expecting you to be here.' Rather bored by the fact that he was there, it looked like the man wasn't trying to communicate well enough for him to understand. They were two strangers to one another and it looked like he wasn't assimilated yet. This man wasn't old but seemed to wear the jester's clothes, which fit him rather well. A bit taller than him in height, he seemed to have connected some sort of television there and laid watching on a couch made out of a pair of logs. It wasn't the greatest of sights, seeing him trying to drink out of an empty beer can, especially after finding him, but it was the best thing he'd get so far. 'Well, aren't you excited that there's another one here?' 'Another was, would that be exactly?' 'I'm talking by another man in the room with you.' That seemed to signal something to him, which wasn't exactly what he wanted. He was surprised at the fact that he'd done so much to himself but never even thought of looking for one of his own. It was awful, too much to be spoken out-loud, this was the man he had been looking for and apparently, he wasn't any different than the ones in the world. 'Do yourself a favour kid, and grab one of the beers.'He pointed at the box. It was filled with dirt and planted in it were the beers. They looked like some sort of man-made explosives, with only the wires missing, but as much as he had wanted them to be war-like sticky bombs, he was content with them being empty. But that thought made him ask nonetheless. 'Did you fight in the war?' It was that sudden that he turned off the machine and stared at the kid with a burst of unmet awareness. He'd been set off for the last time, and now, he couldn't believe how sharp the kid was. 'Indeed I was, field soldier, why? You got any experience I presume? What, do they send scrawny kids on the field nowadays? We must've gone far too low if it means we're sending children there.' 'No sir, it's no that, it's something else entirely. Quite the opposite if I might add.

There hasn't been a war in twenty of forty years in which we were involved. Even at that, the closest thing to it might've been some sort of conflict rather than a battle.' Now it appeared that his attention was captivated. He was there for some reason, and now he understood why the jester had left. It came as soon as he had dropped him can that he understood what he was talking about, or rather, to whom he was talking to. 'Son, you must be out of your mind, the war couldn't have ended. Even our generals predicted it would be something akin to ten to twenty years back and forth.' 'No, sir, there hasn't been one, as I said, it's been made obsolete with the weapons they created.' What a devilish concept he had brought to him. Some morbid curiosity made him stand flaccid in front of the dreadful news he heard. Now, he had been unaware of what was supposed to happen to him any longer. He had been made obsolete, a soldier who thought he had waited to be enlisted again. 'I don't know why I expected you to be some kind of postman, at least not this, this.' 'Are you feeling right?' It went on slowly, as soon as he had dropped his empty bottle. As soon as it broke, the dirt at the bottom revealed a wicked plant with a wicked black and creeping seed which had bored itself in there for far too long. The pain he felt was excruciating, it felt like he was growing from the outside back in, shrinking in his own clothes. His skin darkened and turned into a moist substance which eventually spilt on the floor and spread around, like some sort of substance that might've laid in the bottle. Eddias knelt and touched the wet clay-like remains, what was left of the clothes and seemed to have reminded himself of something much worse. Far worse than the death of the man he had met. It was the girl, Charlene, she could be somewhere over there waiting for him to bring her back home. But as soon as someone came before him and told her he would never get to see her again, that would be it. There wouldn't be any other way to reach her time. 'I see that you have done what needed to be done. Are you content with taking the life of a man who didn't do anything to deserve it? At least not from you.' 'This what you brought me for? To take care of some loose ends for you?' 'We should talk outside before this den of his collapses.' He was as honest as he could be. The dirt was starting to pound on it now that the man had made what he had been. By the time they were outside, he was reminded that this wouldn't do. 'He'll be back, do not worry, but I needed something from him before doing so.' The jester came closer and almost leapt at the sight. He grabbed some small trinket from inside the clothes, where the man had been inside and suddenly made haste. 'Wait, wait, you still have some explaining to do, you can't just leave now, not when, not after you made me take the life of a man.' 'Have I done such a thing? I have no recollection of it, rather, I have left you to go in there alone.' 'Where are you taking me towards if there's no war?' It looked like the restoration process had already taken place. Despite holding what seemed to be the remains inside the suit, he had already grown a head and a body while he wasn't aware. 'There's no escape from this is there? Not even in the place of rest, it would appear.' 'Where are you taking me than a young man and what happened to my home?' 'I'm afraid that your house is no more, as soon as you died, it looked like there was nothing keeping it together any longer.'The man nodded seemingly hurt by the fact, even disappointed by some accounts. It looked like the world was going to be pale for some time, at least until they would be there.'Where are we heading now? I don't know where you're taking me.'You're getting heavier by the minute, I think that in the least you could walk up on your own.'The man had grown feet again and in the few moments where he was on his own, he had become whole again.'My name is Birch, youngster, for you, it's Sargent Birch.'He presented himself rather quickly as it was. No other circumstance required him to act as quickly as he had.'It's a pleasure to meet you Sargent, do you? Wait, you used to have some medal on you, right under your shirt, possibly?'Not that I'm aware of, as an army man, I have never been decorated in my entire military career in any way whatsoever. On the contrary, at least, I think the clothes fit me well because I was much of a coward during the war.'That gave some pause. Something in his breath, the likes of which became only now more clear, he smelled of dirt. Everywhere around. He must've spent his entire time down there in his hole, drinking bottles of air and dirt.'You did what?'Flinch asked, surprised, looking at the man and his widely deceitful smile.'I have never killed a man, that's the truth, but I did manage to run as fast as I can once the fight started. Even got myself shot in the foot on an occasion or two.'And I suppose that got you out of the service?'No, they commission only decided that I had either the choice of returning or to be executed for trying to get out of it through some unlawful way. After that, I deserted.'Or so he thought or told himself plenty of times until he believed it himself. It hit wickedly close to home, seeing the light in the distance.'You know, we used to have large towers, but.'That wasn't supposed to be there at least not yet, with its haunting position holding every thought at bay. Both of them appeared to be solely convinced that there was something wrong with it. That shouldn't have been there in any way.'Look who's here, it would look like you came searching for more.'Are there more men there?'Still no ready to dress into your clothes and take your role as a jester seriously?'He appeared to have listened to some of the previous conversations he might've had. At least, it was certain that he found some words he wasn't supposed to use or hear. It was rather insulting, the way he pronounced the word jester, making it appear rather alien to him. The dreadful thing looked rabid. At least the way his teeth came out from under the mask. Wormish, coloured-striped things which appeared more of the likes of short organs. Now and again, he wasn't sure whether or not this creature could be trusted, yet they followed.'We'll see more of them, and after that, I might reconsider your desire for me to wear that strange costume you keep pushing on.'It's custom, it's custom. Everyone must wear it now and again.'Something's wrong, Eddias?'They passed the same street he had her weep on, as near as one could see, short-sided or not, he was certain of it. Once and again, he'd expect her to begin screaming or waiting for some help. At least he knew she'd be there, driven in some horrible, or nearly-lurid place which a dame like her shouldn't have been locked in. A peculiar thing at least, how else would they come near it? There wasn't any intent or explanation he could lay that they'd follow him through strange streets that lead nowhere, on a fool's errand as well. Both of them stared at him as if he was the one who had to make the choice.'Where is the other man you keep talking about?'I haven't said a word yet, but you may want to keep your insolence away from her, she's in her studies.'All of the sudden, there came a bright light into his eyes and he appeared to be aware of things that weren't there. Her, her, yes. 'Take us to her then, I will see her immediately, where is she?'The library, but for that, we need to the key.'And where's the key then?' Asked Sargent, looking rather surprised as himself, as he hadn't expected to be talking to them at all. Under no circumstance, under that pale moon, which shone with a perfect light. It looked like it had no flaws either. Stuck there, they followed. It seemed that the library was surrounded by a garden offence, long and sharp metal bars popping from every direction, from every side. The building had some sense of the dark, looking like a pale castle which had sunk in the bottom of the ground, at least most of its mass. A light came from that sunken structure and it looked for a moment still, that it could suddenly rise a few levels above. Alas, they beheld how the castle raised itself a few meters in the air, past any possible level, and into the integrity that it held itself in. It was magnificent, in the few words that either of them could conjure. They needed to get inside and see for themselves who laid in there. The level at which it had risen made it so there was the door. But who was she, the one who laid inside? Why was she expecting guests no more? Perhaps she might not be prepared for the type of people she was going to receive. At least, judging by the way they have been invited. The door fringed with a side eye-snapping type of sharpness that almost gnawed at their fingers as they touched the frames. It was dreadful inside, for as soon as both of them came in, the door closed and the castle reeled in below again, making it seem like there was someone down below there, pulling it down. The entire experience was awful, at least from their standpoint, seeing how neither himself nor this fellow knew what they were getting into. The place was huge, seeing how the walls have been converted into some kind of bookshelves, with stacks of books laying just by the side. It seemed like there wasn't any deal there, only some silence, as supreme as one could be. Neither of them was sure of what to expect. 'After you, my friend.' Said Eddias, looking rather content with sending the lamb to sacrifice. He wasn't sure himself whether or not there was something he should say or do. They were just about to enter the main room, from where the maze would be and she was seemingly not there. Most likely, she had been absorbed in her studies, somewhere in the dark planes under the pages, in a spot where she'd be lost forever. It didn't help that they have arrived at a floor which had been made out of raised bookshelves. It looked like the stairs and every path which led below was surrounded by them. 'Look Flinch, these could lead anywhere. Where do you think she is?' 'I don't know, but if we saw her through one of the windows.' 'You should see me here, would that be correct?' Both of them turned their gazes towards the top of the highly raised terrace. It looked like she hadn't taken a break from reading into whatever she was into. A thing which in the least displayed the knowledge she attained during her stay, as she had modified the ramp and blocked herself there at her own command. 'What do you want from me?' She looked rather pale, dressed in normal peasant clothes if one were to say. Might it be that she was the other one who had denied them from wearing those silly clothes? 'Were you in need of something then? Wait, you're new, are you not?' 'That would be a fair assumption.' 'So I regard that you are the reason behind the fire that had almost spread across the city and almost engulfed everything we have?' There was a moment where he almost shrank from it. A thing which not many have managed to set him forth to. But he was just as dreadful now as he had always been, looking for a way into her, as to have as many of his kind. 'You'd be correct if you were to assume I've come here to torch your library as well, with every book and snippets of words. Even yourself, as they used to burn them at the stake for being witches.' 'That is ridiculous, what you're insisting on saying. Do you have any clue what's in this place? The amount of knowledge which had been attained over so long a period of time? If I were in your place, I'd rethink my position. Even if you succeed, you, ingrol, I don't think the fire might permanently destroy anything.' 'Perhaps not, but what of the ink with which they're written? Would you burn one of your own in order to find out?' Their conversation was disturbed. Against one of the

